Pay Board Aerospace Veto Termed 'Tragic' by Labor

Meany Hits Blunders of Nixon Policy

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany summoned the labor movement to "a year of decisive, effective hard work" to win "a victory for all America" next Election Day.

The federation president's New Year's statement coupled a blistering indictment of the Nixon Administration with optimism that its policies can be reversed at the polls.

Political action will be organized labor's "most important undertaking" during 1972, Meany declared.

He charged the Administration with lack of competence in dealing with economic problems, social issues and world affairs.

Unemployment remains unchecked, Meany noted, while "throughout America, the fear of losing their jobs haunts workers."

Prices workers must pay continue to rise under a price control program that lacks effective enforcement machinery. At the same time, Meany stressed, wages are "rigidly controlled" and "are not even catching up with past increases in the cost of living."

Welfare rolls are swollen, school systems stagger under financial and social burdens, the aged have little financial security, and there are few day care centers for the children of the poor.

For all Americans, Meany noted, "the cost of medical care in the nation has grown astronomically while the delivery system for medical care has virtually collapsed."

Despite "hollow campaign promises," crime in America has reached

Two New Programs:

Long-Term Jobless Get Added Benefits

By David L. Perlman

More than a million jobless persons who have used up their unemployment benefits are entitled to a new round of payments this year.

Most of them don't know about it. And unless someone tells them, they won't get it.

Newspaper, radio and television coverage has been skimpy, at best. And despite a prod from the Labor Dept., many state employment services have not yet made an effort to track down persons who have been dropped from the unemployment rolls—and who may be eligible for an additional 13 weeks of payments.

To help close the information gap, the AFL-CIO has called on its affiliates and central bodies to do the job the states should have done.

"Do everything possible to immediately inform jobless workers in your state of the availability of this program," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman urged in telegrams and follow-up letters to affiliated unions and AFL-CIO state labor councils.

Machinists, UAW Set Strategy Talks

By Tom Castor

The five labor members of the Pay Board denounced as "tragic" the decision by other board members to reject and nullify contracts covering more than 200,000 aerospace workers and declared the pacts actually were well within the board's 5.5 percent guideline.

The contracts were won and ratified by members of the Machinists and Auto Workers, and the two unions promptly scheduled a joint strategy session in St. Louis, Jan. 8, to deal with the rejection.

The three-year agreements would have provided 12 percent, or a 51-cent hourly increase, in the first year, and the four public members who voted with five business members for rejection said this was "unreasonably inconsistent" with the board's 5.5 percent guideline.

The board subsequently, by a vote of 12-0, postponed to Jan. 13 action on a resolution by public members to set guidelines for any renegotiated settlement between the two unions and the five aerospace companies.

The five firms involved are Boeing, McDonnell-Douglas, North American Rockwell, Lockheed and the LTV Aerospace Corp.

The labor members, in a statement read to the press by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, charged that "certain business and so-called 'public' members of this board are attempting to use this board to frustrate and destroy the collective bargaining process. In that effort they are threatening to destroy this board."

The statement pointed out that 34 cents of the increase was a catch-up, cost-of-living rise agreed to by the aerospace industry during 1968 bargaining—three years before the wage-price freeze was born.

The industry pledge was given in return for an agreement by aerospace workers to accept a ceiling on cost-of-living escalators. The labor members noted that the agreement had cost the workers about $1,000 apiece which "they can never recover."

"At the time of the 1968 settlement, the industry agreed that this increase would be due the workers at the expiration of that agreement," the statement said.

"As such, by the board's own rules, it was not subject to the board's restrictions.

"The only new money in these aerospace settlements is 17 cents an hour plus one additional paid holiday—the only fringe subject to Pay Board regulations.

"The total of the new money plus this fringe benefit is less than 5.5 percent—well within the approvable limit set by the Pay Board in formal session Nov. 8," about a week before Phase 2 began.

"We cannot believe," the labor members said, "that inflation can be curbed by taking money out of the pockets of 200,000 aerospace workers and their families, especially when they already have

N. Y. Transit Unions Win Gains for 40,000

New York—Two unions representing 40,000 New York City transit workers won new contracts with the Metropolitan Transit Authority providing wage increases totaling 18 percent over 27 months.

The agreements, negotiated by the Transport Workers Union and the Amalgamated Transit Union, were announced at 3 a.m. New Year's Day, just two hours before a scheduled strike deadline.

Meanwhile, members of Fire Fighters Local 94 ratified a 30-month agreement with the city that will provide as much as $2,150 in wage increases for 11,300 firemen.

And 35,000 city clerical workers approved a new agreement granting increases of $1,650 to

Labor Spurs Reporting Of All Price Increases

By Mike Bosch

AFL-CIO price watchdog groups were urged to report all retail price increases to the Internal Revenue Service to offset a limited and ineffectual IRS spot check approach to pricing violations.

In a letter to all local committees, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis urged a continuing survey of retail stores with a report to IRS of every price increase in stores not posting price information.

"No retail store may legally raise any price unless it has posted base price information for consumers," Perlis said citing a Price Commission ruling of last Nov. 11.

Perlis said the ruling "means that no price may be increased on any retail item—no matter whether the increase is legitimate or not—unless the price information has been posted in the store."

He said preliminary reports "indicate that many retail outlets, par-

TRANSIT AGREEMENT is symbolized by handshake between Transport Workers Union Pres. Matthew Guinan, second from left, and Dr. William J. Transit Pacts Win Boosts for 40,000

$2,100 over three years. The pact was negotiated with the city by District Council 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan, whose union represents 38,000 bus and subway workers, hailed the agreement as "fair and reasonable" and predicted that the membership would ratify the pact in a mail referendum.

Dr. William J. Ronan, chairman of the MTA, said the authority was convinced that the agreement met Pay Board guidelines of 5.5 percent.

The 27-month agreement, which contrasts with two-year agreements that have prevailed in the past, was viewed as spelling an end to the cliff-hanging transit negotiations which New Yorkers have come to expect on New Year's Eve.

The contract provides a 6 percent increase effective Jan. 1, and additional 6 percent raises Jan. 1 of 1973 and 1974. Hourly rates of transit workers have ranged from $4.04 for porters to $4.93 for bus drivers, $5.30 for motormen and $5.50 for electronic equipment maintainers.

The workers will receive a 6 percent boost in night differential over the life of the contract.

The agreement also provides an increase from $400 per worker to $450 in the annual city contribution for employe health and welfare, and five weeks of vacation after 15 years of service, an increase of one week.

The MTA four days later put into effect an increase of 5 cents in bus and subway fares, raising them from 30 cents to 35 cents. The action followed passage by the state legislature of a package of bills to aid the deficit-ridden transit system.

The Fire Fighters contract is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1971, when the previous agreement expired.

Effective that date is a $150 increase. A $500 increase is retroactive to last July 1, and the contract calls for additional raises of $750 on Apr. 1, 1972, and Jan. 1, 1973. The contract expires July 1, 1973.

These increases are on top of the base salary of $12,151 effective Jan. 1, 1971.

Retirement benefits had been a key issue in early negotiations, but the legislature failed to approve a pension improvements negotiated by District Council 37 and set up a Permanent Commission on Public Employes' Pension and Retirement Systems to make recommendations for pension guidelines.

Because of this, the city has taken the stand that there can be no meaningful bargaining on pensions until the commission completes its study and makes its report.

The agreement won for clerical workers by District Council 37 is retroactive to July 1, 1971, and will run to June 30, 1974.

Besides wage increases, it provides that the city may develop work performance standards after consultation with the union. The city also agreed to increase the education and training fund.

Another improvement for clerical and related employes in nonmayoral agencies is the provision that, if such agencies agree, the Office of Labor Relations will serve as the last step in the grievance procedure prior to arbitration on fiscal matters.

Union Reports to Public On N.Y. Phone Strike

New York—Negotiations have been "stepped up" in the five-month strike against the New York Telephone Co., by more than 38,000 Communications Workers, according to full-page advertisements run by the CWA in both the New York Times and the Washington Post.

"In recent weeks, the tempo of negotiations between CWA and the New York Telephone have been stepped up," said the advertisement.

The full-page ad was titled "Some Important Questions and Answers About the Strike at New York Telephone," and it was signed by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, Sec.-Treas. Glenn E. Watts and Vice Pres. Morton Bahr.

"A number of federal and state officials have been involved at various levels," the ad said. "At all levels of the union, which includes our bargaining committee in New York, our district headquarters and our international union headquarters, we have had activities connected with bargaining going on night and day."

The advertisement continued with a restatement of the union's determination to win against New York Telephone, which has brought 1,400 supervisory personnel to New York from other Bell System installations in an attempt to maintain service and cope with a backlog of 200,000 installations.

"Make no mistake about it. The CWA is going to win this strike at New York Telephone. In many respects, it has already won. CWA members have demonstrated they have the character and moral resources to take on the vast Bell System and New York Telephone."

The strike, by 38,500 installers, repairmen, switchmen and linemen, began July 14 when the workers—members of 23 separate CWA locals—rejected a final company offer.

The unions are seeking wage increases amounting to $59 weekly for top pay levels immediately and 6 percent in the second and third years of a three-year agreement.

In addition, the strikers seek cost-of-living escalators after the end of the first and second years.

Other proposals include a full union shop, overtime pay for Saturday work, double time for Sunday work, improvements in the company's medical plan, some changes in working conditions and improved pensions.

Some strikers near retirement noted that under the current pension plan, they would receive less than the $75 a week in unemployment compensation they are entitled to collect.

In addition to unemployment benefits, the strikers are being aided by the CWA defense fund in meeting such financial obligations as medical and mortgage payments.

epidemic proportions. And on the world front, "abrupt, unexplained shifts in foreign policy" have raised the question of what principles, "if any," guide the nation's leaders.

"Most seriously of all," Meany declared, public confidence in the government has been "corroded." And there is wide distrust of "an Administration that cannot resist politicizing even its statistical-gathering agencies."

Against this backdrop, Meany cautioned that 1972 will be "a difficult and challenging year" for America's workers and their unions.

But "through our votes, we are firmly convinced we can achieve a fully-employed nation, dedicated to improving the life of her ordinary citizens, protected against the virus of inflation, secure in the knowledge that both the young and the old will be governed with compassion, understanding and concern."

When this is accomplished, Meany said, it will be a victory for all America. "And that is the goal of organized labor for 1972."

Teamsters Lose Airline Raid Bid

An attempted raid by the unaffiliated Teamsters on Northwest Orient Airlines employes represented by the Railway & Airline Clerks has been rebuffed by the National Mediation Board.

The board dismissed an application by the Teamsters for a representation election among the employes with the finding that the union had made no "adequate showing of interest to warrant the conduct of an election."

Church School Dispute Settled In New York

New York—Striking lay teachers in the parochial schools operated by the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New York voted to return to work Dec. 21 after accepting a compromise contract agreement with the archdiocese.

The teachers, members of the Federation of Catholic Teachers, Local 2092 of the American Federation of Teachers, had been on strike since Nov. 21. Local Pres. Barry F. Ryan, acknowledged that the union had been forced to accept a pay package that was not much better, in immediate cash terms, than the offer originally turned down by the strikers.

"However," he added, "we have made some significant gains in non-monetary items that we would not have achieved without the walkout."

The wage package provides increases ranging from $200 to $1,000 a year for the 2,800 teachers employed in the 329 parochial schools in the archdiocesan system. The pact includes provisions for reopening on wages in September 1972 and possible further increases if "sufficient additional funds" become available to the church schools.

The other items in the agreement will remain in effect for two years and include improved provisions concerning tenure, job security, sabbaticals and academic leaves, participation in after-school and week-end activities.

Wage Base Raised For Social Security

Effective Jan. 1, the maximum amount of earnings on which social security contributions are paid was increased from $7,800 to $9,000 a year. There is no increase in the present 5.2 percent contribution rate, and workers earning $7,800 a year or less will not be affected by the change.

The higher wage base will mean an increase of $62.40 in total contributions for the year for those earning $9,000 a year or more but proportionately less for those with annual earnings between $7,800 and $9,000. It will also mean higher social security benefits for those paying the higher amounts since benefits will now be calculated with reference to the higher wage base.

Probe Asked of Report Of Plot Against Chavez

San Francisco—The California AFL-CIO called on State Atty. Gen. Evelle J. Younger to order an investigation by his office of an alleged plot to kill Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

In a wire to Younger, John F. Henning, the state federation's executive secretary-treasurer, said:

"The public testimony of a former federal government agent regarding a plot to kill Cesar Chavez is a matter of grave concern to our state AFL-CIO organization.

"If the charge is true it would not be the first time that acts and threats of violence have been directed at California farm union officials by the powerful enemies of organized labor.

"Cesar Chavez has been obliged to live with lights illuminating the area of his house at night and with police dogs guarding against anti-labor intruders.

"We therefore formerly request your office to investigate the alleged Chavez death plot reported in Bakersfield by Larry Shears, a former undercover agent for the U.S. Treasury Dept."

The alleged plot was first revealed when Shears, 32, appeared on a Bakersfield television station, KERO-TV, and told of the complicated plan involving the destruction of certain union records and the killing of Chavez.

Shears said he had served as an undercover agent for the Alcohol, Tobacco & Fire Arms Division of the Treasury Dept.

Mel Warner, chief of the division's Enforcement Branch in San Francisco, confirmed that Shears had done some work for his office and that Shears had told him of the alleged plot, the state AFL-CIO noted.

Government Issues Labor Law Guide

The Labor Dept. is publishing a new guide to labor laws administered by the Employment Standards Administration. The looseleaf publication, Federal Labor Laws, contains provisions, regulations and interpretive bulletins concerning several key labor laws.

Covered in the guide are the Fair Labor Standards Act, Federal Wage Garnishment Law, Age Discrimination in Employment Act, Service Contracts Act, Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act, Davis-Bacon Act and the Contract Work Hours & Safety Standards Act.

Two-year subscriptions are available for $12 from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402. Subscribers will receive amended pages as changes occur during the two-year period, the Labor Dept. said. Distribution will begin in March.

ticularly food chains, are passing along price increases to consumers in violation of the regulation."

Meanwhile Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson revealed in an interview that the IRS was using its own spot checks rather than consumer complaints to detect price violations.

Grayson said IRS agents had been ordered to make the checks "systematically on schedule," but he conceded that the Nixon Administration's fight against inflation relied largely on the "honor system."

Grayson's statement added a new element of confusion to the Administration's economic stabilization program.

Previously, the IRS had justified its refusal to disclose disposition of complaints with the statement that legal problems prevent "individual notification at this time."

As for the Price Commission's own actions, a study by Consumer Newsweek, a weekly newsletter on consumer affairs, showed that through Dec. 17, the commission, had approved price increases sought by manufacturers averaging 4.05 percent, significantly above the commission's announced guideline of 2.5 percent.

Consumer Newsweek described the price control program as "Haze Two" and suggested the "public has been misled by being encouraged to police retail prices" partly because the IRS cannot investigate the huge volume of complaints and partly because the Price Commission will "pay only passing attention to the service and retail sector."

Grayson said he expected some price controls would be lifted this spring, but added that a curtailed form of government restraint on wages and prices would still be in effect when present control legislation expires on Apr. 30, 1973.

The Price Commission on Dec. 29 announced a policy on rent increases that permits rents for the 24 million apartments and rental houses in the country to go up at least 2.5 percent and as much as 10 percent or more.

The complex ruling makes it virtually impossible for the average tenant to know if he is being overcharged.

The commission itself said it anticipates that rents will increase about 3.5 percent on the average this year.

The rulings refer to two "base rental periods" which are used to determine the method of fixing increases. The method used depends on whether the unit is rented on a month-to-month basis or on a lease.

Landlords may add 2.5 percent to any of the base rents without proving any increase in costs. They are also allowed to fully pass through any cost increases.

If a landlord has not increased any rents since May 1970, he is allowed to raise the rent 5 percent in addition to the 2.5 percent.

He may also add to the rental charge the cost of any capital improvements to the property.

Spokesmen for tenant organizations noted that this allows a landlord to take the total costs of capital improvements over one year even though he will benefit over the lifetime of the building.

All increases must be reported to the IRS but only those of more than 10 percent require advance approval.

The Rent Advisory Board, an arm of the Price Commission, had recommended that rent hikes be limited to a ceiling of 8 percent.

Tenant organizations also protested the lack of any regulations which would require landlords to maintain services. The chief complaint of middle and lower income tenants, they said, is that landlords actually raise rents by cutting back on services and maintenance.

Jailed Newark Teachers Cheered by Yule Rally

Newark, N.J.—Christmas was canceled for 136 Newark school teachers as they spent the holidays in the Essex County Correctional Center.

But their stay behind bars was made a little lighter by about 1,000 trade unionists from the New York City area who brought them season's greeting with a rally outside the penitentiary walls.

In all, 184 members of the Newark Teachers local had been jailed for their participation in a 1970 three-week strike. Forty-eight members, were released Dec. 23—the day of the rally—after serving eight days. The same day, another 128 teachers were photographed, fingerprinted and bused into the institution. They were released New Year's Eve.

However, eight of the local's leaders still remain in the jail under sentences ranging up to 90 days. They started serving their terms Nov. 29.

The rally outside the prison grounds was sponsored by the New York City AFL-CIO. Several hundred members of unions in the central labor council were expected to take part in the demonstration.

But by the time the caravan of buses and autos had arrived at the Caldwell, N.J., facility, the rally had mushroomed to about 1,000 persons.

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO organized the demonstration. It was widely supported by labor officials, including AFL-CIO Regional Director Michael Mann, Pres. Jay Rubin of the New York Motel & Hotel Trades Council, Irving Stern of the Meat Cutters and others.

The AFT leadership was represented by Pres. David Selden, Pres. Albert Shanker of Local 2 and Pres. Israel Kugler of the AFT college division.

Van Arsdale noted in calling the rally that "these professional teachers are in jail at this Christmas season for doing what they believed was their duty in defense of the basic democratic principles."

"This is certainly punishment for them and their families out of all proportion to the offense they are charged with," he declared. "We want to be sure they know that they are in our thoughts and we intend to do what we can to make sure their sacrifice is not in vain."

The 1.2-million member New York City council also appealed to New Jersey Gov. William T. Cahill to extend executive clemency to the teachers.

Besides the jail sentences, the Newark AFT local was fined $40,000 for the 1970 strike. Additional fines of $270,000 and sentences of up 15 months in jail were imposed on 16 leaders of the local for a 1971 strike that lasted 11 weeks.

Appeals of these sentences are scheduled to be heard early this month.

Among the local officials who face the additional jail sentences are the eight serving terms in the correctional center since Nov. 29. They include Local Pres. Carole Graves and Executive Vice Pres. Frank Fiorito, who also is president of the State Federation of Teachers.

Plan Approved To End 9-Year Railroad Strike

A nine-year strike against the Florida East Coast Railroad appeared to be nearing an end.

Eleven unions that struck the line on Jan. 23, 1963, reached a tentative agreement which includes payment of damages by the company to the union and individual workers, plus pay raises and a recall schedule.

The settlement was reached by the coalition of "non-operating" unions, headed by George Leighty, and was approved by a federal judge whose court will administer the penalty payments.

Additional court action will be required before the strike is actually over. And still to settle are train crew strikers, represented by the United Transportation Union and the Locomotive Engineers.

The "non-op" strike was the longest railroad dispute in the nation's history. It began when the company refused to match a 10-cent hourly raise agreed to by all other major railroads.

Taking part in the joint negotiations were the Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railway Carmen, Railroad Signalmen, Sheet Metal Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Boilermakers, Firemen & Oilers, Machinists, Dining Car Employes and the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept.

The settlement plan calls for the railroad to pay $1.5 million through the court as damages for violations of the Railway Labor Act, union agreements and court injunctions.

A 25 percent wage increase over pre-strike levels will be followed by 6 percent raises in each of the next three years.

The railroad agreed to rehire 478 striking "non-op" employes on a seniority basis, taking on 100 initially. Many of the original strikers have since taken other jobs.

One of the holdups to final settlement has been the need to resolve a maze of litigation arising out of the long dispute.

60% of Adults Have High School Diplomas

The Census Bureau reports that the number of American adults with at least a high school education rose from 43 percent in 1960 to 60 percent in 1971. The rate of increase was greater for Negroes—rising from 24 to 40 percent—although the rate for whites climbed from 45 to 62 percent.

Hope for UN Expressed In Salute to Waldheim

The AFL-CIO expressed its compliments on the election of Kurt Waldheim as secretary-general of the United Nations. Waldheim, Austria's chief delegate to the world body, succeeded U Thant of Burma in the top UN post Jan. 1.

The federation's reaction to the election was expressed in a message from Pres. George Meany to Earl Warren, chairman of the United Nations Association of the United States.

In a separate statement, Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers also extended congratulations to the new UN chief.

Meany's message said that the AFL-CIO "expresses its compliments" on the election of Waldheim, and added:

"Mindful of the trust that is placed on the office and the man, the working men and women of the United States no less than the population of the world look to this new leadership to effectively demonstrate its commitment to the UN charter and Declaration of Human Rights.

"Individual liberty, political democracy and free societies progressing in a world at peace cannot be achieved by costly or cheap public relations and shallow maneuver. They must be won by dedicated, sincere diplomacy buttressed by the strength of free men everywhere.

"The AFL-CIO renews its interest in the United Nations and the international agencies which it directs."

Abel said: "The United Steelworkers of America supports and believes in the UN as man's best hope for a world at peace in which human rights and dignity become the priority concern of all nations. We extend to Sec.-Gen. Waldheim our best wishes in his efforts to increase the UN's capabilities."

The statements were among many messages reproduced in a full-page New York Times advertisement sponsored by the UNA-USA.

Jobless Rate Still Tops 6% In Key Areas

Unemployment of 6 percent or more continued to grip 60 of the nation's 150 major job centers in December—the same level as in November—while the number of smaller employment centers with severe joblessness increased by five to 808, the Labor Dept. reported.

Six smaller areas were added to the "substantial" unemployment list last month and one was removed. The additions are Lutcher, La.; Bay St. Louis, Miss.; Lexington, Mo.; Ft. Pierre, S.D.; Springfield, Tenn., and Parsons, W. Va. Removed from the list was Clarksburg, W. Va.

In December 1970, there were 37 major areas and 617 smaller areas listed by the Labor Dept. as having "substantial" or "persistent" unemployment.

The Labor Dept. defines substantial unemployment as a jobless rate of 6 percent or more, with the trend expected to continue at least two more months. Persistent unemployment is defined as an annual average jobless rate of 6 percent or more for the last calendar year and at least 50 percent above the national average for several years.

Political Super Bowl

THE 1972 ELECTION campaign is on. All of the candidates for the presidency have announced or otherwise indicated their intentions—including Pres. Nixon who made his bid for re-election plain in a recent television interview.

Candidates for the full House and 34 Senate seats as well as 19 gubernatorial chairs and countless other state and local offices also are coming into fuller view as a string of state primaries and conventions draws nearer.

In two months, New Hampshire and Florida will open the primary season. The major attention will be on presidential candidates on the Democratic side. The primary challenges to Pres. Nixon are of political interest, but are not expected to impede his nomination for a second term.

The focus to this point has been mainly on names and personalities, and this is likely to increase as the primaries spur new attention and interest. But there are a goodly number of critical issues—most of them centering on Pres. Nixon's performance versus his promises over the past three years.

MEMO FROM COPE puts it this way:

"Early in his presidency, Nixon asked Americans to judge his deeds, not his words. Applying his own yardstick he has come up short.

"On the economy, he said on Jan. 27, 1969, '. . . we can control inflation without an increase in unemployment.' His promise proved vastly better than his performance on both counts.

"Still early in his term, July 10, 1969, he described a 'crisis' in the nation's health care and predicted if something were not done 'we will have a breakdown in our medical care system which could have consequences affecting millions of people.'

"More than a year later—only when it became obvious health care was building as a major issue with Americans—the President sent a health care message to Congress. He proposed a totally inadequate program that would rely on the private health insurance industry, which helped create the health mess in the first place.

"So it has gone on, issue after issue—performance has fallen short of promise."

THE THREE YEARS of the Nixon presidency can be viewed in the President's own favorite football terminology as a "game plan" for his re-election. This is a widespread feeling that his sudden and dramatic shifts in policies and programs in a short three years reflect a planned opportunism to assure victory in 1972.

The job in the next 10 months is to focus a sharp and constant spotlight on the presidency in terms of the real issues—the deeds and the hard results—as well as on the programs and the records of those who are challenging Nixon for the White House.

The 1972 elections may well turn out to be the biggest game of all.

White House 'Memcon' Exposes Nixon Gambit at 'Confrontation'

By John P. Roche

RECENTLY IT WAS SUGGESTED here that Pres. Nixon had handled the AFL-CIO "confrontation" in Miami Beach very clumsily, that it was a patent attempt to set up George Meany as the economic spoilsport in the event the President's policies failed to bring an upswing. The President, I submitted, was obviously out of practice if he thought he could pull that one off on a bunch of hard-nosed political professionals like the leaders of the labor movement.

This column brought a batch of letters attacking me for impugning the President's morality, for daring to indicate that he would "stoop to such a dirty political trick," in the words of one irate correspondent.

Let me take some space to clear this up. I was not accusing Mr. Nixon of immorality or anything remotely approaching it.

There is nothing un-American or un-constitutional about trying to set up your political opponents. Indeed, I pride myself on having persuaded Pres. Johnson to kill George Romney with love after the latter's Hartford speech on Vietnam in April 1967. The President was actually furious at Romney for insulting his credibility, but was finally convinced he should congratulate the Michigan governor on his bipartisan statesmanship. Exit Romney.

There was nothing dirty or dishonest about this. Romney had worked both sides of the street in his speech and it all depended on which sections you emphasized.

There was nothing dirty or dishonest about Pres. Nixon's trying to put the monkey on George Meany's back at Miami Beach. My complaint is that he bungled it, that it came off as theater, not politics, that it was one of the most transparent finagles of the epoch, unworthy of a poker player of Mr. Nixon's reputation.

So first of all, then, I was not assaulting the President's morality. Second, in reply to those who think I dreamed the whole thing up in a paranoidal seizure, it is now clear that Pres. Nixon went to the AFL-CIO convention with the precise design of setting Meany up.

Tucked away in the Executive Office of the President is an outfit called the Office of Emergency Preparedness (OEP), known irreverently as the Office of Empty Plans. It is, and has been for years, a useful payroll for political operatives, most of whom are now busily engaged in what might be called political economy.

AMONG THEM is George T. Bell, Special Assistant to the President and aide to Presidential Counsel Charles Colson. Mr. Bell took a special interest in the AFL-CIO convention, and is addicted to "Memcons," that is, to making summaries of all conversations for the file. On Nov. 19, 1971, Bell sent off to the files and to other interested parties the following summary of a report from his man in Miami Beach, Pasquale (Pat) Jiuliano, a former unionist from Philadelphia:

"Mr. Jiuliano called at 9:30. He is at the AFL-CIO Convention. President Nixon is going to speak at 10:30 AM. They will chastise him; and that will be the best thing that could happen. Geo. Meany will be trying to make himself look like a big deal; but the Am. people will see the spectacle; and decide for themselves on the merit of what Nixon is trying to do. Mr. Jiuliano will use the same experience he did when he invited Gov. Romney to an AFL-CIO meeting to speak B-4 he was elected Gov. of Michigan. It was televised and the labor group gave Romney a rough time of it. But in the end he won.

"Mr. Jiuliano will give Mr. Bell a full report upon his return from the meeting. He thinks it will make President Nixon look greater in the eyes of the Am. electorate.

"Mr. Bell wants Mr. Jiuliano to call him after Nixon speaks and let him know how things went. Discreetly and indirectly to get the reaction of others."

Thus the Memcon which, in my capacity as a teacher, I would indicate violates the first principle of a good setup: leave no tracks.

Public Confidence Corroded:

Administration's Failings Mar Prospects for Nation in 1972

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made the following New Year's statement:

FOR THE WORKERS and unions of the United States, 1972 will be a difficult and challenging year. The economic roadsigns are not encouraging; the social problems grave; the foreign outlook bleak. The present leadership of America has shown no competence for dealing with these problems which spell suffering and hardship to millions of our citizens.

To itemize America's problems is to demonstrate the magnitude of the tasks ahead:

Unemployment remains unchecked with 5 million jobless, millions more underemployed and uncounted thousands too discouraged to even seek gainful employment. Throughout America, the fear of losing their job haunts workers.

The prices workers must pay for everything they buy continue to mount while the much publicized price control program, with no effective enforcement mechanism, promises much and delivers little.

Workers' wages are rigidly controlled by a governmental mechanism which provides no elasticity to meet inequitable situations and which is undermining collective bargaining. As a result, wages are not even catching up with past increases in the cost of living.

The ranks of the poverty stricken continue to swell at an alarming rate. Welfare rolls are at the highest level in history, sapping the financial strength of the already over-burdened states and cities which continue to underpay their employes.

School systems stagger under the burden of trying to meet the equally vital needs for quality education, equal opportunity for children without regard to any barrier of race, creed or color and the rights of teachers and other school personnel to decent salaries and proper status.

The aged in America have little financial security in their twilight years as social security benefits fail to match the economic needs of the time.

The children of the poor face the prospect of dim years ahead because the nation fails to provide jobs for mothers who would work and day care centers for the young while their mothers are working.

Everyone in America fears illness of any sort for the cost of medical care in the nation has grown astronomically while the delivery system for medical care has virtually collapsed.

Crime in America has reached epidemic proportions despite the hollow campaign promises of the current Administration. In the year just passed, fatal assaults on peace officers hit a record high, demonstrating the crying need for law, order and justice in the nation.

The Administration's abrupt, unexplained shifts in foreign policy confuse the people of America who no longer know what, if any, principles govern the international policies of the United States.

And, most serious of all, the public's confidence in its government has been seriously corroded as a result of sudden and disconcerting changes in policies, abandonment of principles for momentary political gain and the reliance on gimmickry, government by surprise and the wholesale destruction of candor by an Administration that cannot resist politicizing even its statistical-gathering agencies.

YET AMERICAN WORKERS and their unions face the uncertain year ahead with a marked degree of confidence born from the knowledge that self-delivery is available through the most precious possession of free people—the ballot.

That is why the organized labor movement of the United States will make political action our most important undertaking of the coming year.

Through our votes, we are firmly convinced we can achieve a fully-employed nation, dedicated to improving the life of her ordinary citizens, protected against the virus of inflation, secure in the knowledge that both the young and the old will be governed with compassion, understanding and concern.

We are convinced we can achieve a government whose policies will be based on equity, dedicated to peace, determined to end the misery, privation and suffering of her people.

All this we are confident we can do with our votes in November. And to assure that result, we dedicate ourselves to a year of decisive, effective hard work.

The victory which we are certain we will achieve will be a victory for all America. And that is the goal of organized labor for 1972.

Benefits Inadequate:

Little Relief for Elderly Poor Expected from Nixon Programs

FIVE MILLION elderly Americans now living in poverty can expect little if any help from the programs, policies and proposals advanced by Pres. Nixon, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman declared.

Seidman said that the recent White House Conference on Aging, to which he was a labor delegate, focused sharply on the two most acute problems facing older Americans today and in the years ahead—substandard income and inadequate health care. He said that the conference "did shape some very important recommendations" that will be "heard by the Congress and by others who make policy in this country."

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman said that the $4,500 minimum yearly income for a couple "is a good immediate objective," noting that "one-third of the retired population now lives on less."

But once that level is reached, he noted, there must be continual improvement, "not just to reflect increases in the cost of living, but in real terms . . . of what that income can purchase." Seidman said he doubts that "the President's new economic policies will help the older people" by holding down living costs.

Because of the way the Phase 2 programs have been set up, Seidman said that "it's almost impossible for consumers—including elderly consumers—to monitor prices."

Pointing out that most Americans now qualify for social security when they retire, Seidman urged a substantial boost of those benefits for the greatest impact on the income problems of the elderly. He said the 5 percent increase Pres. Nixon wants is far from "adequate at a time when 5 million elderly Americans are living in poverty."

TO MAKE A REAL IMPACT on the severe economic plight of retired workers and "permit them to live in decency and dignity" Seidman called for an immediate 15 percent boost in social security benefits, with a view to a full 50 percent increase, in steps, in the near future. That kind of improvement, he said, is readily achievable through introduction of general federal revenue financing of "one-third of the total funds which go into the system."

Turning to the President's so-called pension reform plan, Seidman said the obvious thrust is to open "a new avenue for banks, for insurance companies, for mutual funds to reap substantial profits," by encouraging workers to speculate and invest in the financial marketplace as individuals, rather than as a group.

Seidman also said many unions would try to improve benefits for retired workers through contract negotiations even though the Supreme Court ruled recently that employers need not bargain with unions on the matter. Seidman termed the court decision "unfortunate and not very realistic."

Reporters questioning him were J. Y. Smith of the Washington Post and Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance. The interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

SHORTLY AFTER the second session of the 92nd Congress convenes on Jan. 18, Pres. Nixon will appear before a joint session and deliver his fourth State of the Union address.

One year ago when the President delivered his State of the Union message he proposed "six great goals" which he said would "restructure the government . . . turn power back to the people," and bring about a "new American Revolution."

The "new American Revolution" died with hardly a shot fired.

Nixon's "six great goals" should be recalled, though, for two reasons: One, so that history will not be distorted, and two, to understand a little more about the occupant in the White House.

Here, are the "six great goals" and how they disappeared:

Revenue Sharing—The President, noting that our states and cities are financially starving, proposed sharing $16 billion in revenues with them in fiscal 1972. A total of $11 billion would be earmarked for urban development, rural development, education, transportation, job training and law enforcement. However, only $1 billion of this total would be in new funds. The $10 billion would be realized by abolishing or consolidating some 105 programs doing substantially the same things.

And when Phase I of the new Nixon economic program got under way, the President, himself, put revenue sharing on the back burner.

Government Reorganization—The President proposed reducing the present 12 Cabinet departments to eight. Only the Departments of State, Treasury, Defense and Justice would remain untouched.

Labor, business, and many sections of agriculture openly opposed the plan and they had strong support in Congress. Hearings were begun, but no action was ever taken.

Environment—The President said he would propose "a strong new set of initiatives to clean up our air and water, to combat noise and to preserve and restore our surroundings."

New water pollution control legislation, to replace expiring federal programs, formed a major part of the Nixon environmental message. However, when the Senate passed by an 86-to-0 roll call vote a strong, four-year $16.9 billion bill aimed at making the nation's waterways virtually pollution-free by 1985, the Administration opposed it.

Now, the White House wants a far weaker bill in the House.

Welfare Reform—The President called on Congress to pass his Family Assistance Plan which placed a floor of $1,600 under the income of a family of four.

After extensive hearings by the House Ways & Means Committee, the House reported out a bill which would set a federally guaranteed floor of $2,400 a year for a family of four with no income.

The Senate Finance Committee completed hearings on a different measure but all this was halted when the White House shifted the priority from welfare reform to its new economic program.

Health Insurance Reform—When the public outcry for restructuring of the medical care system reached a fever pitch, the President finally included health insurance reform in his "great goals."

However, rather than support a basic reorganization of health care delivery—as provided in the Kennedy-Griffiths bill—he sent to Congress a proposal that would require employers to provide basic health insurance coverage for their workers, federal health benefits for the poor and approval of health services.

Full Employment—At the time that the President announced this "great goal" the rate of unemployment was 6 percent. It has not varied far from this figure throughout the year.

The President vetoed three measures which could have eased the unemployment problem: a $5.7 billion public works bill to give jobs to the unemployed; a $6.3 billion Office of Economic Opportunity extension and a $2.1 billion child care program.

This, then, is the "new American Revolution" for turning "power back to the people." It has scant tie to the new rhetoric and new "goals" we hear about today.

LITTLE IF ANY HELP for 5 million Americans now living in poverty can be found in Pres. Nixon's programs, policies and proposals, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Theodor Schuchat, left, of the North American Newspaper Alliance and J. W. Smith of the Washington Post.

A DESERTED BULLDOZER is inspected as a possible vocational teaching tool at the Gulf Coast Trades Center which is supported by the Houston-Gulf Coast Building & Construction Trades Council. Jack Stubbs of the Bricklayers and Donald W. Bridges of the Human Resources Development Institute check out the machine. The center gives special academic and vocational training to boys age 14-16.

Gulf Coast Crafts Train Teenage 'Problem' Boys

New Waverly, Tex.—Teenage boys with academic and social problems are taking special courses at a training center set up by AFL-CIO organizations at an abandoned Job Corps installation.

The first class of nearly 100 young men from the 13-county Houston area entered the Gulf Coast Trades Center in October for 18 weeks of vocational and academic instruction. The center is eventually expected to accommodate 224 live-in students.

The opening of the center was the culmination of more than a year of ground work by the Houston-Gulf Coast Building & Construction Trades Council and representatives of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute.

Working through Donald W. Bridges, HRDI area manpower representatives, the trades council landed three one-year government contracts totaling more than $800,000 for the operation of the center.

Grants came from the Justice Dept. Law Enforcement Assistance Fund for $308,000, Housing & Urban Development Dept. Model Cities Project for $305,000 and from the Texas Criminal Justice Council for $191,000.

Once the funds were nailed down, volunteers from the building trades council renovated and spruced up the facilities at the deserted Job Corps camp. The 50-acre site is situated in the Sam Houston National Forest, about 45 miles from Houston.

Boys between 14 and 16 who are likely to become high school dropouts or delinquents are referred to the center by academic counselors, juvenile probation officers and social workers.

The boys receive instruction in courses that are tailored to their particular capabilities and needs. All courses are fully accredited by the state education agency.

The center staffs one teacher for 10 students on academic subjects, while the student-teacher ratio for vocational subjects is 5 to 1.

Teachers in vocational courses are experienced instructors in apprenticeship training who hold full teaching certificates and are members of building and construction trades unions.

A student self-government plan was instituted at the center which helps to determine when a student has qualified for graduation. After completing the courses, students are returned to regular schools and are given special counseling.

A halfway house is being planned for students who have no parents or a suitable place to live.

Operations of the center are directed by a 12-member board of trustees with seven labor representatives. Other representatives include police, school, juvenile court and probation officials.

While the center is open to any boy between the ages of 14-16, the focus is on youths who have difficulties in school or are dropouts. Youths living in disadvantaged environments or who have had minor incidents with the law also are enrolled.

Strike Damage Charge Voided By U.S. Court

Baton Rouge, La.—Property damage or picket line scuffling during a legitimate strike isn't a federal offense, a U.S. district court ruled here.

Judge E. Gordon West dismissed an indictment obtained by the Justice Dept. against four strikers who were charged with violating the Hobbs Act, an anti-racketeering law adopted nearly 30 years ago.

The law is intended to bar extortion of money or property by violence or threats of violence.

It certainly doesn't apply, Judge West said, to the lawful strike for higher wages by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against Gulf States Utilities Co.

The indictment charged the defendants with causing property damage, including "malfunctioning of transformers" as part of a "conspiracy" to force the company to agree to a contract "calling for higher wages and other monetary benefits."

The judge noted that violence or property damage alleged in the indictment "are undoubtedly punishable by state law."

But, he concluded, the Justice Dept. indictment "does not charge an offense punishable under the Hobbs Act."

Prices Rise As Pay Drops In November

Wages moved down and prices edged up during November, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Both Pres. Nixon and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson ignored the earnings decline but issued statements hailing the modest two-tenths of 1 percent rise in consumer prices as evidence that the anti-inflation program has been a success.

The combination of the earnings and price data, however, resulted in a sharp drop of seven-tenths of 1 percent in buying power for America's workers from the previous month.

Average earnings, before taxes, dropped 74 cents a week to $128.74. The BLS said this was "attributable entirely to a 2-cent dip in average hourly earnings."

About half the November price rise, the BLS said, stemmed from items exempt from price controls.

The November consumer price index rose to 122.6. This meant consumers were paying $12.26 for the same goods and services that cost $10 in 1967. The rise from a year ago was 3.5 percent.

Nearly all of the prices used in the November survey were collected before the end of the 90-day wage-price freeze on Nov. 15. Herbert Stein, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said the index for the next several months might show a bigger spurt as a result of the less stringent price restrictions in Phase 2 of the Administration's stabilization program.

Hodgson, nevertheless, hailed the November price data as "evidence that Pres. Nixon's wage and price program is working."

And the President said 1971 was ending "on a most encouraging economic note."

Kirkland Named to Public TV Board

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland has been appointed to the board of directors of the National Public Affairs Center for Television.

NPACT, with headquarters in Washington, is the new production center for the Public Broadcasting Service.

Kirkland is among the initial 12 appointees who will serve on the 15-member NPACT board.

Biggest Risk to Workers:

5 Hazards Targeted In Job Health Probe

Five toxic substances dangerous to more than 4 million workers were given top priority in a new Target Health Hazards program instituted by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

The five are asbestos, cotton dust, silica, lead and carbon monoxide. They will be the focus of attention in industrial hygiene inspections by OSHA and the National Institute for Occupational Health & Safety in several thousand workplaces.

The program was announced by OSHA as the National Advisory Committee for the job safety administration began a two-day meeting.

Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther said the action was taken in response to findings that 60 percent of the complaints from workers since the safety act went into effect last April involved health hazards.

In describing the hazards of the five substances, Guenther noted:

- Asbestos can produce severe lung disease and exposure to its fibers can lead to cancer. He estimated that more than 200,000 workers are exposed to the dangers, although labor specialists contend the number runs into the millions.
- Cotton dust can produce silicosis, another disabling lung disease. More than 800,000 workers are affected in all kinds of cotton processing operations, according to OSHA.
- Silica also causes silicosis, posing hazards to more than 1.1 million workers in abrasives manufacturing, iron and mineral processing, sandblasting and other occupations.
- Lead can produce severe gastrointestinal, blood and central nervous system disabilities. More than 1.6 million workers face this risk in the manufacture of ammunition, paint, batteries, autos and other products.
- Carbon monoxide can produce brain damage or death. Uncountable numbers of workers in metal processing or users of gasoline-powered equipment are affected.

Labor representatives on the advisory panel—George H. R. Taylor of the AFL-CIO and John J. Sheehan of the Steelworkers—said trade unions would cooperate fully in the policing and effective enforcement of measures to guard against the five target health hazards.

But they also noted that the list should be expanded to include many other dangerous substances.

NIOSH has about 8,000 toxic substances listed as dangerous to workers. But only 500 are covered by health and safety standards and many of these need updating, Taylor said.

Recently, the standard on asbestos was updated by OSHA, which ordered the permissible level of asbestos dust reduced from 12 fibers per milliliter to 5 for an eight-hour period.

Meanwhile, union safety specialists were preparing for a hearing in Albuquerque, N.M., that would allow variances from tighter standards affecting miners of radioactive materials.

The Environmental Protection Agency had dropped the permissible exposure to radon daughters gas from 12 working level months to four.

But the Bureau of Mines is asking for a six-year delay before the standard becomes fully effective, said Sheldon W. Samuels, director of job safety for the Industrial Union Dept.

Southern Labor School Explores Critical Issues

Hot Springs, Ark.—The advanced institute of the Southern Labor School explored the economic, social, health and political issues facing organized labor during a six-day seminar here.

The 40 participants also focused on the foreign trade problems affecting the South, efforts to improve job safety and health, and relations with young union members.

The Institute is conducted annually for full-time staff members of AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central labor bodies in the 11 southern states.

A review of new programs being offered by southern state bodies was presented by state AFL-CIO Presidents Claude Ramsey of Mississippi and Barney Weeks of Alabama and Pres. Vincent Moretti of the Norfolk, Va., AFL-CIO.

Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute described a number of the pertinent issues in the coming political campaigns and 1972 elections. John Lewis of the Voter Education Project and COPE Area Director Daniel A. Powell also spoke on the topic.

A blueprint for modernizing state legislatures was presented by Donald Herzberg, a political science institute director at Rutgers University.

The health care needs of the rural South were described by Pres. Joseph Volker of the University of Alabama. Volker called for the increased development of educational programs to train medical paraprofessionals and explored the possibility of setting up a volunteers' corps of recent medical school graduates in efforts to overcome the shortage of doctors in poor rural sections.

Volker also announced that his university has received a $150,000 grant from the state to set up a school of labor studies.

A program designed to help unions reach their young members was conducted by George T. Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Al Wickman, education director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and Ed Ball, education coordinator of Steelworkers District 37.

Veteran Organizer Louis Krainock Dies

Louis Krainock, a veteran labor organizer and educator, died recently in San Francisco.

He had been a CIO organizer in the South, education director of the Packinghouse Workers, an organizer of farm workers and public employes. Krainock had also homesteaded and taught school in Alaska and, from 1964 until his retirement in 1971, served on the staff of the California Division of Industrial Welfare.

AFL-CIO Organizing Director William L. Kircher received news of Krainock's death from his widow, Mrs. Ursula Krainock.

For Those Who Apply:

Two New Programs Extend Duration of Jobless Benefits

There are actually two new programs that take effect this month and next—both based on laws passed by Congress to extend the normal 26 weeks of unemployment compensation during periods when jobs are scarce.

More important than the details and complexities of the new programs, the AFL-CIO stressed, is the urgency of getting the word to those who might be eligible for extended benefits.

Every unemployed person who fits the circumstances listed below should check with his nearest employment service office to find out if he or she is eligible for additional payments:

1. A person who has received unemployment benefits at some time during the past 12 months, and

2. He no longer is receiving benefits, but is still unemployed.

Persons who are currently on the benefit rolls will receive any extension automatically. But those who have used up their benefits and were dropped from the rolls before the new programs took effect will have to file new applications.

One of the new programs dates from a 1970 law that took effect in two stages. It provided for 50 percent federal financing of up to 13 weeks of extended benefits during periods of high unemployment.

The period of the extension is one-half of the duration of regular state benefits which the applicant received, up to a maximum of 13 additional weeks or 39 weeks in all. If, for example, a person was entitled to only 22 weeks of state benefits, the extension would only be for 11 additional weeks.

There were two types of "triggers" provided by the law to put the program into effect—and to halt the program when job conditions improve. One is for a national program; the other triggers state programs when there is no national program in effect.

Under the law, the program would take effect nationwide when the "insured unemployment rate" has been 4.5 percent or higher for three consecutive months. When the rate drops below that level for a comparable period, the program is phased out.

The insured rate of unemployment is always less than the figure most people refer to as the unemployment rate—which is based on a census-type survey of the workforce and counts all people who are looking for jobs, regardless of whether or not they are drawing unemployment insurance.

The rate used to "trigger" the extended benefits is based on the number of persons drawing unemployment insurance as a percentage of the number of persons working in jobs covered by the unemployment insurance law.

The earliest date the nationwide trigger could be applied was Jan. 1, 1972. And that's the date it went into effect because the insured unemployment rate for the last three months of available statistics stayed above 4.5 percent.

That put the program immediately into effect in every state except Kentucky, where the legislature had not yet passed a required enabling law. Kentucky was expected to complete action shortly.

Even before the national program took effect, some states already were under the extended benefit program because of the state trigger feature of the 1970 law.

Under this provision, when there is no nationwide program, extended benefits will be paid in any state with an insured unemployment rate of at least 4 percent for three consecutive months—provided the rate is at least 20 percent higher than the average of the past two years for the same period of time.

During the period before Jan. 1, 1972, 22 states qualified under the state trigger point formula. But eight of them subsequently were "triggered off," leaving 14 states paying extended benefits at the end of 1971.

One of the weaknesses of the state triggering formula is that it is keyed to continually rising unemployment—not just high unemployment.

Thus, Alaska with a 7.2 percent insured unemployment rate in November was triggered off that month because this came to only 106 percent of the average for the previous two years. But Hawaii stayed under the program with a 4.8 percent rate which was 190 percent of the comparable period in the previous two years.

When the national program took effect this Jan. 1, it didn't matter what the state jobless rate was. Only if the national program is triggered off will the situation vary from state to state.

What of the unemployed workers in states which have had the extended benefit programs in effect—and who already have used up their 13-week extension?

They are not affected by the national program because they have already been covered by its provisions.

But most of them, starting in February, will be eligible for still another 13-week extension under the Magnuson Act that Congress passed last month.

This is a temporary law, scheduled to be phased out in July. But even so, Pres. Nixon expressed misgivings when he signed it Dec. 29 "only as a temporary expedient." The Administration had tried unsuccessfully to block its passage.

It provides a further 13 weeks of benefits—bringing the maximum duration to 52 weeks—in states with the highest unemployment.

To trigger eligibility under the Magnuson bill, the state's insured unemployment rate must be at least 6.5 percent. But the method of computing the rate is somewhat liberalized by including as insured unemployed a portion of workers who have already exhausted their unemployment benefits.

Because the data to determine eligibility when the program begins on Jan. 30 is not yet available, the Labor Dept. was unable to list the states where the program will be put into operation.

Earlier data indicated that these jurisdictions will probably be covered: Alaska, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nevada, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington.

Other states that might qualify include Oregon and New York.

The list includes most of the states that have been paying extended benefits under the 1970 law, which means that more than half a million workers in those states who have used up 39 weeks of regular and extended benefits without finding a job will be able to receive an additional 13 weeks of payments.

AL H. CHESSER

JOSEPH BELSKY

Meat, Railroad Unions Install New Presidents

Two new union presidents assumed office Jan. 1 to succeed officers who had retired. Joseph Belsky became president of the Meat Cutters and Al H. Chesser took over the top post of the United Transportation Union.

Chesser, 57, replaced Charles Luna, the first president of the UTU who had reached the union's mandatory retirement age of 65. Chesser had been the UTU's national legislative director in Washington.

Belsky, 69, was senior vice president and district director for the New York-New Jersey area before succeeding T. J. Lloyd who had been president of the Meat Cutters for 14 years. Lloyd now holds the post of president-emeritus.

Belsky joined the Hebrew Butcher Workers Union in New York City in the mid-1920s and was elected its secretary in 1926. He continued to serve as an officer of the union, now Local 234 of the Meat Cutters.

Belsky was elected a vice president of the Meat Cutters in 1936. As director of the union's District 1, he was responsible for 17 locals with a membership of nearly 80,000 workers in a two-state area.

Patrick E. Gorman continues as secretary-treasurer and chief executive officer of the Meat Cutters.

Chesser began his railroad career in 1941 as a brakeman on the Santa Fe in Wellington, Kan. After his transfer to Texas, he joined Lodge 608 of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Chesser served the lodge in various official capacities and later was elected Texas state legislative representative for the BRT.

He assumed direction of BRT national legislative affairs in 1962 and continued in that post after the UTU was formed with the 1969 merger of the BRT and three other railroad operating unions.

Luna became president-emeritus of the UTU on his retirement and will continue to serve on the AFL-CIO Executive Council as a federation vice president. He also retains his post on the Amtrak executive board representing labor.

The new UTU national legislative director is James R. Snyder, who had assisted Chesser in Washington for the past 12 years.

Labor, Senior Citizens Mourn John Edelman

John W. Edelman, a trade union activist for six decades on two continents and former president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, died of cancer. He was 78.

Edelman helped organize textile workers first in England and later in the United States. He also was an early member of the Newspaper Guild and was active with consumer groups for a number of years. And as head of the NCSC, he was instrumental in the enactment of the Medicare health program for the elderly.

In a message to the NCSC, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that Edelman was a "true disciple of democracy."

"His lifetime of devoted service to the trade union movement was capped by his sound and progressive leadership" to the NCSC "during many crucial years," Meany and Kirkland noted.

Edelman was born in Belleville, N.J., and moved to England with his parents at an early age. He worked for several newspapers in London before becoming an organizer of British textile mill workers. He also served as the youngest branch secretary of Britain's Independent Labor Party when he was 14.

He returned to the United States in 1916 and served in the Army during World War I. After the war, he worked as a reporter for newspapers in Massachusetts, New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

In 1926, Edelman became education and research director of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers, a forerunner union to the Textile Workers Union of America. He held that post for 11 years while also editing the union's newspaper, the Hosiery Worker.

He was appointed eastern Pennsylvania regional director of the CIO in 1937 and served in that post for two years.

During the 1930s, Edelman emerged as an advocate of public housing for low-income families and in the formation of the Labor Housing Conference of the AFL. He also was a consultant to the Federal Housing Administration and to the Resettlement Administration early in the Roosevelt presidency.

Edelman was the Washington representative for the TWUA from 1943 until his retirement 20 years later. He then served as president of the 3-million member NCSC from 1963 to 1969.

He was long active with the National Consumers League and was chairman of the board of the National Consumers Union from 1961 to 1969.

For his contributions to the organization of the Newspaper Guild, he received a Man of the Year Award from the Philadelphia local. The Washington - Baltimore Guild recently honored him with its Arthur Reardon award.

J. Pat Daniels, Shipbuilders' Leader, Dies

J. Pat Daniels, secretary-treasurer of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, died Christmas Day in Georgetown University Hospital after a long illness. He was 30 years old.

Daniels was unanimously elected to the Shipbuilders' key leadership post in October 1970. He had been a member of the union since he was 17 when he started working in Southern California shipyards.

Pres. Andrew J. Pettis of the union said, "for one so young, J. Pat Daniels played an increasing important role in our organization and leadership." He "embodied our hopes and aspirations for the younger generation," Pettis added.

Daniels joined the union in 1957 and was elected shop steward at the San Pedro shipyard the following year. He was elected secretary-treasurer of the San Pedro local in 1963.

In 1966, he was elevated to executive secretary of the local and later the same year was elected to the union's national executive board. From 1966 to 1968 he also served as secretary-treasurer of the Maritime Trades Council for Southern California ports.

His father, James E. Daniels, is the West Coast regional director for the union.

Besides his parents, Daniels is survived by three children, a sister and two brothers. Memorial services were held in Washington, D.C., and in Long Beach, Calif., where he was buried Dec. 30.

Unions Set Strategy Talks:

Pay Board Aerospace Veto Scored by Labor as 'Tragic'

contributed so much to that anti-inflation struggle."

It was amid the aura of confusion that has surrounded the board since its inception that the aerospace contracts were rejected.

Pay Board Chairman Judge George H. Boldt called the 12 percent increase "unreasonably inconsistent with the purposes and objectives of the Economic Stabilization Act and contrary to the standards established by the Pay Board."

But Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock said labor members had been formally assured that aerospace wage contracts would be accepted if they conformed to settlements reached in the automobile industry last year.

He pointed out that, in fact, the aerospace settlements were somewhat lower than the wage increases won in the automotive industry.

IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith was prompted by the situation to declare that "the judge doesn't know what we are talking about."

And Woodcock, although he did not specify any particular board member, said "I have confidence in neither the competence nor the integrity of some public members of the board."

But he did say that Boldt was unqualified for the job of Pay Board chairman simply because he has no background in collective bargaining, and he described the board as "incredibly incompetent."

"Its incompetence does not justify its survival," Woodcock declared.

He called the rejection of the aerospace pacts "a naked power attempt by industry members . . . unfortunately supported by public members, to try and pick out one industry and make it an example."

"This is a cynical perversion of the duties of this board," the UAW leader said.

UAW Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse, a board alternate, made the motion to approve the contracts in full and was seconded by Smith.

In defending the board's action, Boldt suggested, in effect, that the two unions return to the bargaining table and obtain an agreement with a first-year increase "in the range of 8 percent."

But this attempt to dictate a settlement brought a stinging rejoinder from Greathouse who declared, "we'd like for the Pay Board at this point to keep its mouth shut. It's done enough damage already."

"How can we sit in our ivory tower and tell those West Coast Machinists what they ought to negotiate?"

The labor members of the board also maintained that the Pay Board's authority did not extend beyond accepting or rejecting settlements, but some of the public members disagreed.

In a related development, the public affairs director of the Pay Board resigned in a policy dispute with the board's executive director, Robert Tiernan.

Herbert Wurth, a former military officer and once a public information officer for the Post Office Dept., said he submitted his resignation to Boldt "because of policy differences with the executive director over the handling of your information program."

Wurth told newsmen that he had wanted to keep the media and the public informed of what was happening in Pay Board sessions, but that Tiernan had directed him to withhold information.

For example, he said Tiernan had directed him not to tell reporters of the Pay Board's rejection of the aerospace contracts until late in the day.

Newsmen were barred from the actual Pay Board offices during the sessions and were restricted to the ground floor lobby of the office building housing both the Pay Board and the Price Commission in Washington.

Tariff Board Grants Steelworkers' Claim

Utica, N.Y. — Several hundred former employes of the Utica Cutlery Co. here will be eligible for cash readjustment allowances and other special benefits under a unanimous Tariff Commission ruling.

Their union, the Steelworkers, petitioned for the adjustment assistance benefits after increased imports of stainless-steel flatware from low-wage countries resulted in heavy layoffs over a period of several years.

Meany Blasts Employer Plan For Challenges

An announcement by business members of the Pay Board that they will automatically challenge any scheduled wage increase above 7 percent "threatens an avalanche of appeals which could inundate the board," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in a letter to Pay Board Chairman George H. Boldt.

"It is my considered opinion that the very future of the Pay Board is seriously endangered," said Meany as he called on the board to adopt rules and procedures that can be "widely accepted as equitable and understandable."

"The Pay Board has not adopted —despite the appeals of the labor members—clear and equitable policies that could provide the basis for the high degree of self-administration essential to the President's goal of voluntary compliance," the AFL-CIO president said.

Instead, Meany noted, the board has "painfully developed, at less than a snail's pace, a few complex and rigid formulations which are of little assistance either to the Internal Revenue Service staff in the field, or to America's employers and workers in collective bargaining."

"Endless delays in developing policies and conflicting reports on procedures are undermining the attempt to establish an equitable wage stabilization setup," Meany said.

Pollara to Handle Pay Board Queries

Frank Pollara, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been designated coordinator of the federation's activities in regard to the Pay Board and will handle the numerous inquiries from affiliated unions on the Pay Board's procedures for handling wage controls.

In a letter to union presidents, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked that all future queries on the Pay Board be directed to Pollara.

Meany also asked each union to appoint its own representative to receive Pay Board information from Pollara and to channel queries on Pay Board matters to him.

Text of Joint Statement by Board's Labor Members

Following is the text of the statement issued by the five labor members of the Pay Board, Jan. 5:

The Pay Board has denied 200,000 union aerospace workers a fair and equitable wage increase that was clearly approvable within the board's own standards. By its action, the board has violated the basic principles of fairness and penalized responsible collective bargaining.

In 1968, the aerospace workers demonstrated their responsibility by accepting a cap on their cost-of-living escalators. This act has cost aerospace workers more than $1,000 apiece which they can never recover.

Based on the cost-of-living index for March-April-May 1971 the amount of that catch-up came to 34 cents an hour. At the time of the 1968 settlement, the industry agreed that this increase would be due the workers at the expiration of that agreement. That amount was due under the agreements or arrangements made three years before the wage freeze. As such, by the board's own rules, it was not subject to the board's restrictions.

The only new money in these aerospace settlements is 17 cents an hour plus one additional paid holiday—the only fringe subject to Pay Board regulations. The total of the new money plus this fringe benefit is less than 5.5 percent—well within the approvable limit set by the Pay Board in formal session Nov. 8.

Labor members of the Pay Board have been trying to carry out their responsibilities but they find themselves continually thwarted on consideration of equities previously agreed to. Certain business and so-called "public" members of this board are attempting to use this board to frustrate and destroy the collective bargaining process. In that effort they are threatening to destroy this board.

We cannot believe that inflation can be curbed successfully by taking money out of the pockets of 200,000 aerospace workers and their families—especially when they already have contributed so much to that anti-inflation struggle.

This is a tragic day for the American system of free collective bargaining. It's what comes when an Administration attempts to deal from a stacked deck.

Kirkland Assails Report Of Banking Commission

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland sharply dissented from the report of the President's Commission on Financial Structure & Regulation, charging that its recommendations were tailored to the interests of private banking and lenders "without any genuine regard for the most urgent problems and needs of the nation."

Kirkland was the only labor member on a panel heavily dominated by bankers and corporation executives.

When he accepted appointment to the commission, Kirkland said, he did not conceive that its "primary mandate was to promote the well-being of the financial institutions of this country." He hoped, rather, that it would come up with proposals to "make our financial institutions more responsive to social needs."

The commission's recommendations dealt largely with technical changes in banking laws, urged that interest rates for FHA and VA mortgages be determined "in the market place," without regard to administrative or statutory ceilings, and said that desired social goals should be achieved through direct government subsidies and tax credits and not by forcing "inappropriate functions upon financial institutions."

Kirkland retorted that government subsidies are desirable in many cases, but the private sector has responsibilities that it can't just walk away from.

The nation's banks and lending institutions, he charged, have tended "to assign a higher priority to corporate enterprise and other preferred customers at the expense of programs and projects which are essential to meet the requirements of life in this country for the average citizen."

He warned also that tax incentives to stimulate housing would "simply provide another tax loophole" that would "increase the profit of the lender without regard to whether there is any increase in housing."

Kirkland endorsed the concept of a National Development Bank as an instrument of the federal government, "authorized to make direct loans to state and local governments, public agencies, corporations and individuals for social priority projects."

And he called for federal regulations that would require every bank and lending institution to earmark a portion of its assets for investment in housing or other socially useful purposes.

Kirkland said the decision on whether to allocate funds solely to big corporations or to reserve a share for public-interest purposes "cannot safely or fairly be left to the sole discretion of the banking fraternity."

Metal Trades Ask Pay Thaw In Government

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. called on Pres. Nixon to "immediately rescind" a freeze on wage adjustments for the federal government's 650,000 blue-collar workers.

Department Pres. Paul J. Burnsky wired Nixon that failure to lift the freeze is "beyond comprehension" in view of enactment of legislation granting pay raises to federal white collar employes and military personnel.

The President last September ordered a six-month freeze in the machinery for adjusting blue-collar pay to changes in area prevailing wage rates—twice as long as the wage freeze imposed on the private sector of the economy. The AFL-CIO and its affiliates representing federal employes strongly protested the action as "discriminatory."

Labor Asks Action Now on Joblessness

Rate Jumps Back to 6.1% At Year End

Failure of the Nixon Administration to dent the continuing high rate of unemployment that plagues the nation should be a cause of "shame" and should "compel it to do something substantial to put America back to work," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

Kirkland's comments came as the Bureau of Labor Statistics announced that joblessness had climbed back to 6.1 percent in December despite Pres. Nixon's prediction of a year ago that "unemployment . . . will finally come under control and begin to recede" during 1971.

"Not one word of that prediction has come to pass," Kirkland noted.

"Instead, more Americans are unemployed, more are underemployed, more have given up the fruitless search for jobs and more are afraid of losing their jobs than was the case one year ago."

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's demand for public investment measures "to create jobs and meet the urgent needs of a modern society for public facilities and services."

The BLS also gave a year-end review of the unemployment pattern, reporting that the average annual rate throughout 1971 was 5.9 percent—as against 4.9 percent for 1970 and 3.5 percent for 1969.

This was the highest annual percentage of unemployment since 1961.

The unemployment situation remained stagnant for the most part throughout the year, continuing in the 6 percent range since late 1970. The rate of joblessness jumped as high as 6.2 percent in December 1970 and reached that level again last May. The December rate of 6.1 percent was up from 6.0 percent in November.

The number of American workers without jobs hovered at the 5-million mark during 1971, increasing to 5.2 million during the last month of the year on a seasonally adjusted basis.

On the employment side, the number of people holding jobs reached an all-time high of 80.1 million in December.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, who a year ago predicted a 1.5-point reduction in unemployment during 1971, was more cautious in his assessment of the job picture this year.

He charged that the failure to cut into unemployment was the fault of Congress for waiting until Decem-

Kirkland Protests 'Sham' Of Price Controls System

Retroactive Pay Guide Is Approved

The Pay Board has spelled out in a new set of regulations the terms and conditions under which workers can receive retroactive pay caught in the 90-day freeze of Phase 1 of the wage-price controls.

The regulations were adopted unanimously to put into operation the board's interpretation of those provisions of the law extending the Economic Stabilization Act which allowed retroactive pay increases caught in the freeze period.

The board ruled that retroactive pay increases held up by the freeze may be put into effect immediately for units of 5,000 or fewer employes if the raise does not exceed 7 percent.

If the raise is more than 7 percent, it may be paid immediately in units of this size if price increases or tax or budgetary allowances had been made in anticipation of the wage boost.

In these cases, the employer is required to notify the Internal Revenue Service within 20 days after the retroactive wage increases are paid.

In all other cases involving retroactivity—units of more than 5,000 workers or raises above 7 percent where there has been no anticipatory price, tax or budget allowances—the Pay Board must be notified in advance of payment, and the parties must hold themselves available to justify the action.

If there is no challenge to these raises by the employer or by five or more members of the pay board, they may be put into effect 14 days after notification to the board.

Calls for Full 'Good-Faith' Enforcement

By Mike Bosch

The Nixon Administration's price and rent control program is "a rotten sham," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared, and unions may have to "put picket lines in front of stores that refuse to play fair with their customers."

Kirkland, addressing a conference of 175 leaders of price monitoring committees from across the country, called on the Administration to admit "controls are a sham" or to prove its "good faith by enforcing controls fairly, honestly, openly and completely."

The AFL-CIO began its price monitoring program, Kirkland said, not to harass innocent merchants, "but because it has become very clear that no one else . . . has any real intention of making price controls work."

Attending the Washington conference called by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services were the international union liaison representatives with the price watchdog operation as well as a number of cooperating minority, senior citizen and youth groups.

Conference delegates from New York and Cleveland reported that their groups are developing plans to picket stores and hold demonstrations if retailers do not adhere to pricing regulations.

Community Services Director Leo Perlis opened the day-long meeting with a scathing attack on the Nixon Administration's price control program. So many items are exempted, Perlis said, that the Labor Members Abstain:

Board Sets Limits On Aerospace Hike

The Pay Board voted 8-2 to approve automatically any contract that would pare down first-year wage increases in the aerospace industry as the Machinists and Auto Workers moved to challenge the authority of the board to rewrite legally negotiated labor agreements.

With labor members abstaining, the five public and three business members in effect set a ceiling of a 34-cent hourly increase in the first year of three-year contracts covering more than 200,000 aerospace workers. Under the board's action, 17 cents of the 51-cents originally negotiated by the two unions would be shifted to the second-year of the agreements.

The Pay Board said that aerospace contracts renegotiated to comply with its limitations would not require further action by the board.

All fringe benefits, including a 12th paid holiday, were left intact by the board's action, but the 34-cent hourly increase represented only a catch-up, cost-of-living raise agreed upon three years ago by the five aerospace firms.

That cost-of-living provision was granted by the companies in 1968 talks in return for a stipulation from the unions that they would accept a ceiling on cost-of-living escalators in their contracts.

This time around, the unions did not accept a ceiling, and an uncapped escalator will take effect in July 1972.

The board's action, the Ma-

Federal Blue-Collar Pay 'Thawed' by Nixon Order

The federal government's 650,000 blue-collar workers will be able to collect long-overdue pay raises under an executive order signed by Pres. Nixon at the urging of unions and Congress.

White-collar federal employes and the military received 5.5 percent raises this month under legislation passed by Congress. But the machinery for adjusting blue-collar rates to area changes in private industry wage scales had been frozen since last summer by presidential order.

The "thaw" announced by the President will permit retroactive payment of those wage increases that were held up by the freeze and resumption of wage board surveys to set new pay schedules in other localities.

The presidential action, however, limited the raises to the 5.5 percent pay guideline.

Hodgson Seeks to Enlist Mediators for Phase 2

By David L. Perlman

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson has proposed a controversial new role for federal mediators.

He wants them to try to tilt contract settlements into the framework of the government's Phase 2 wage control policies and stiffen the backbone of some employers at the bargaining table.

The Secretary of Labor's speech to the 25th anniversary staff seminar of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service raised a few eyebrows in the audience.

The service is marking its quarter-century as an independent agency. Ironically, Congress severed its earlier ties with the Labor Dept. in a section of the Taft-Hartley Act intended to reassure employers that the impartiality of federal mediators

PRICE CONTROL program of the Administration is neither firm nor fair, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis charged at the federation's Washington conference for price monitors. Labor Hits Health Cost Controls As Uneven, Unfair to Low-Paid

Regulations laid down by the Price Commission to control the rise of medical costs cannot be evenly enforced, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a governmental advisory panel.

At the same time, Seidman said, the policy would severely restrict pay increases for low-wage employes of hospitals, nursing homes and other institutions.

The controls could be evaded by solo practitioners and other sectors of the medical care system, but not by prepaid group practice plans, he further noted.

Seidman's statement was presented to the Committee on the Health Service Industry, an advisory panel to the Price Commission, Pay Board and the Cost of Living Council.

The regulations issued by the Price Commission in mid-December impose a 6 percent annual ceiling in rate increases for "institutional providers" such as hospitals, nursing homes and similar health care facilities. A lid of 2.5 percent was put on "noninstitutional providers" which includes doctors, dentists, prepaid group practice plans and others.

However, Seidman stressed, "all providers except prepaid group practice plans will be able to evade the intent of the regulations by increasing the number of charges for the same services—or by unnecessarily increasing the number of services."

He noted that "such increases have been rampant under Medicare," pointing out that most consumers cannot effectively monitor the costs since patients have no way of knowing what previous patients had been charged.

And because of an inadequate staff, Seidman said, the Internal Revenue Service "cannot possibly monitor in most cases at all—and when it does, only after long delay."

Until National Health Security is enacted, he said, prepaid group practice plans can provide better and more comprehensive care at less cost than other health delivery systems.

Yet the prepaid group plans cannot engage in the evasions of stabilization controls because of their revenue which is fixed in advance of service, he pointed out.

Seidman said, "it would be extremely unfair and unjust for the tight controls to be imposed on prepaid group practice while loose controls, or virtually none at all, apply to the rest of medical care."

He noted that the average incomes of physicians after expenses are about $40,000 a year but, in contrast, many workers in hospitals and nursing homes receive substandard wages.

Seidman questioned whether the controls would be effective on the high-income practitioners.

At the same time, he urged that pay increases for low-wage workers beyond the Pay Board's 5.5 percent guideline be included in "allowable costs" of a health care provider. This, he stressed, was the intent of Congress in adopting the Economic Stabilization Act Amendments of 1971.

Seidman quoted a section of the measure, which states:

"Wage increases to an individual whose earnings are substandard or who is amongst the working poor shall not be limited in any manner, until such time as his earnings are no longer substandard or he is no longer a member of the working poor."

He cited Bureau of Labor Statistics findings that the cost of the BLS lower level budget for an urban family of four was $6,900 a year last spring and is now estimated to be at least $7,250.

"On an hourly basis," he said, "this should mean that currently any wage increase which results in hourly wages up to $3.50 should be an allowable cost."

Shishkin Retires After 38-Year Union Career

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee since 1955, closed out a 38-year career in the labor movement with his retirement Dec. 31. Shishkin also was the federation's Civil Rights director, 1955-64, and served a number of government committees and panels in an advisory role.

He joined the AFL in 1933 as an economist after graduate work at Columbia University where he was a research associate on the economics department faculty. Shishkin held a fellowship with the Brookings Institution before coming to the AFL.

After 13 years on the AFL staff, Shishkin was named director of research in 1947—the post he held until merger with the CIO. He also served the AFL as secretary of the Housing Committee, 1939-55, and secretary of the Committee on Social Security, 1951-53.

Shishkin was born in what is now Leningrad, Russia, in 1906 and emigrated to the United States with his parents in 1923. He worked for a period as a truck driver in New York and in 1930 was graduated from Columbia with a degree in economics.

Among his many consulting roles with the federal government, Shishkin was a labor adviser to the National Recovery Administration, 1933-35; President's Committee on the Unemployment Census, 1937; U.S. Housing Authority and Federal Public Housing Authority, 1937-48; consultant to the chairman of the War Production Board, 1942-46.

He later served with the Federal Advisory Council on Employment Security, President's Committee on Contract Compliance and other government panels. Shishkin has been on the board of directors for the Workers' Defense League, League for Industrial Democracy and the American Immigration Conference for a number of years.

Shishkin, who was 65 last October, said he plans to "take life easy" for the next few months with his wife, Hildegard. He is still not fully recovered from a broken hip he sustained during a trip to Zurich, Switzerland, in 1970.

Service Employes Mourn Shortman

New York—Thomas B. Shortman, president of Service Employes Local 32B for the past 11 years and a former international vice president, died at 71. During his tenure, the local grew to be the SEIU's largest with 43,000 members.

Shortman joined the local in 1934 and served as a district chairman and organizer 1935-41 and later as its vice president. He was an international vice president from 1945 until he retired in 1968.

SEIU Pres. George Hardy said, "Tom Shortman was a great and truly dedicated trade unionist. The labor movement has suffered a deep loss in his death." Among his many awards, Shortman was named "Labor Man of the Year" by the New York City AFL-CIO in 1966.

supposed price controls are like being "partly pregnant."

"Phase 2 is neither firm nor fair," said Perlis, "and the whole thing is intended by the Administration to die not with a bang, but a whimper.

"But if they pull out with a whimper, we'll supply the bang. Prices must be kept down. . . . That is what our watchdog program is all about."

Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson, in what he called his "first public appearance" since joining the commission, addressed the conference.

He said that although the commission is approving requests for price increases at a rate of 98 percent, "we have a price control policy which is firm, equitable and working."

He also predicted that rent increases will be held to about 3.5 percent even though spokesmen for apartment owners' associations predict a nationwide average increase of up to 10 percent.

Grayson again conceded that consumers have no way of knowing the legitimacy of a price increase, but claimed that putting price increase levels on individual items would have meant higher bookkeeping costs for many companies. These costs, he said, would have been passed on to the consumer.

Grayson's logic came under fire during the question and answer period. A conference participant reminded Grayson's stand-in for questions and answers, the executive secretary of the Price Commission, Louis P. Neeb that one of the supposed benefits of computers is that information such as price lists could be easily produced at little cost.

One price monitor said, "Labor has always claimed it would suffer the loss of jobs to computers if, in the end, the people would benefit from their use.

"Now we are being told that to use computers to benefit the American people is 'too expensive.' "

Grayson maintained that "citizens' action and surveillance and vigilance" would alleviate the need for complete price posting.

He recommended that consumers boycott those retailers who violate price controls and "reward" stores that hold down prices by shopping in them.

He offered no guidance, however, as to how consumers can determine if retailers are violating the price controls.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger followed Grayson and charged that price controls are totally ineffective while employers are vigorously enforcing wage controls.

Meanwhile, he said, Administration policies to combat unemployment are not working. He predicted that with increased productivity and bigger tax breaks, industry profits for 1972 will show a sharp increase without any significant reduction of joblessness.

"This could be a good year for increased big business profits and a good year for people who play the stock market," Goldfinger said, "but it will not be a good year for the unemployed."

Edward F. Preston, assistant commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service for stabilization, suggested that price monitors could be effective in aiding the IRS but also said the significance of the public price posting is "largely psychological."

He urged the monitors to keep a careful watch on changes in prices and report them to the IRS if not given a satisfactory explanation by the retailer.

He asked the AFL-CIO not to "swamp the system" with complaints but to screen them before forwarding them to IRS.

Kirkland later rejected this approach asserting that "it isn't up to the customer to prove the price has gone up, the burden of proof . . . is on the seller."

"We can—and we should—make life as tough as possible for the price gouger, the rent gouger and the Administration that seeks to protect them, instead of protecting the consumer.

"So we are going to report violations—every single one we suspect. And we will report them by the freight carload if necessary."

The second half of the seminar was devoted to community reports.

Discussions and reports were led by CSA Field Representatives Violet L. Waggoner of Denver, Gerald R. Waters of New York and Melvin J. Witt of Cleveland.

California Labor Hails New Legislative Gains

Sacramento, Calif.—The California AFL-CIO has won enactment of three major social insurance bills that will mean more than $145 million a year in additional benefits for 800,000 workers in the state.

In all, nine measures backed by the California central body cleared the Democratic legislature and were signed into law by Republican Gov. Ronald Reagan.

John F. Henning, executive secretary of the California federation, said the 1971 session of the legislature had proved to be "labor's greatest year for social insurance legislation in the history of the state," outstripping the record year of 1959 when $97 million in benefits were won.

Workmen's compensation legislation provides the biggest increase in that program's history. It raises the temporary disability maximum from $87.50 to $105 a week and the permanent disability maximum from $52.50 to $70 weekly.

It also increases death benefits by $5,000 and reduces the retroactive waiting period from 49 to 28 days.

These benefit increases alone will amount to more than $63 million annually and mean a premium cost increase of $103 million for employers.

Another new law increases maximum weekly disability benefits from $87 to $105 for a worker injured off the job. This will boost benefits by about $18 million.

Unemployment insurance benefits were increased from a top of $65 to $75 a week, and it is estimated that this will result in an increase of $64 million in benefits.

In other action, organized labor won major protection for California car owners against fraudulent auto repairs.

Two Unions Press Court Suit:

Pay Board Votes to Approve Limited Aerospace Increase

chinists said, would cost the average aerospace worker about $340 during the first year of the contract.

The 34-cent increase was made retroactive by the board to expiration dates of the last contracts which vary from firm to firm.

This could mean as much as six months of retroactivity in the case of workers at Lockheed, for example, where contracts expired last July.

The other firms involved are Boeing, McDonnell-Douglas, North American Rockwell and LTV Aerospace Corp., where the retroactive payment is 35 cents hourly due to a differential in base pay.

The Pay Board decision left the aerospace workers in a little better plight than they had been one week before when public members were recommending that only 17 cents of a 34-cent hourly increase be made retroactive and that the remaining 17 cents be eliminated altogether.

Even at that, the two unions involved continued plans for a suit to be filed in the U.S. District Court at Washington, D.C.

Purpose of the suit, as IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith put it, is to enjoin the Pay Board from "destroying the integrity of the contracts."

The decision to pursue the legal challenge came out of joint IAM-UAW meeting held Jan. 8 in St. Louis and attended by 150 delegates of the two unions.

Both Smith and UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock told reporters that the negotiated 51-cent hourly increase scheduled for the first year of the contract was "definitely not inflationary."

Smith declared that "there is no logic, no decency to the rejection of this contract by the management and public Pay Board members."

"If the Pay Board does this for some and not for others, then it has no right to exist," he said.

In a telegram to the St. Louis meeting, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged the "wholehearted" and "unconditional support of the AFL-CIO for whatever decision you reach."

"It is no exaggeration to say that the entire future of free collective bargaining is now in serious jeopardy," Meany said.

The federation president termed the board's initial rejection of the contracts a "disgraceful, intolerable assault on free collective bargaining."

"The labor movement cannot tolerate any governmental dictation —either by Pay Board or President—of conditions under which free men will work."

Elsewhere, a Democratic congressional delegation from California, where the majority of the aerospace workers are employed, urged the Pay Board to reconsider its action, expressing "deep concern for the economic well being of the aerospace workers and their families and for the future workability of the collective bargaining system."

U.S. Senators Alan Cranston and John V. Tunney and nine Democratic congressmen said in a telegram to Pay Board Chairman George H. Boldt that the unions had "every right to expect approval of their contracts" since "aerospace contracts have traditionally been approved in tandem with UAW auto contracts."

"The board's failure to do this is arbitrary and unjustified," they said.

Democratic congressmen signing the telegram were Representatives Chet Holifield, Glenn Anderson, James C. Corman, George E. Danielson, Richard T. Hanna, Augustus F. Hawkins, Thomas M. Rees, Edward R. Roybal and Charles H. Wilson.

The only fringe benefit subject to Pay Board approval was the 12th paid holiday and it was left standing."

Other fringes negotiated included increases in pension benefits. In Machinists' pacts these raised retirement benefits from $6.25 a month to $8 for each year of service. Monthly benefits for current retirees were increased from $6.25 to $7.25 times years of service.

In a contract with McDonnell-Douglas, which was the pacesetting pact for Machinists, the IAM also won hospitalization, dental plan and life insurance improvements.

JOINT MEETING of aerospace bargaining committees of Machinists and Auto Workers convened in St. Louis after Pay Board rejection of contracts negotiated with major employers. UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock, left, and Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith tell a news conference of their unions' determination to achieve "equity" for aerospace workers.

Approved Price Boosts Run Well Above 'Guide'

A spot check of price increases approved by the Price Commission shows that the hikes have been running well above 2.5 percent. This is the level at which the commission had given the impression it was going to hold the line.

A study by AFL-CIO price monitors of several daily decision reports reveals that approvals ranging above 10 percent are not uncommon. Among the price boosts granted by the commission this year are:

- 12.8 percent to Ameron, Inc.'s Steel Producing division.
- 14.1 percent to A-T-O, Inc.
- 9.2 percent to Standard Press Steel Co.'s Industrial Fastener division.
- 46.8 percent to the Nordberg Division of Rex Chainbelt, Inc.

A typical daily report, that for Jan. 11, showed the commission granting price increases to 18 firms. The hikes averaged 6.3 percent—ranging from nine-tenths of 1 percent to 16.4 percent.

Topping the list was General Host Corp.'s Milk Specialties division for a 16.4 percent on milk formulas. A boost of 12.8 percent was approved for Ameron on welded wire fabric. The Carnation Co. request for an 8.7 percent increase on dry cat food was also approved.

Other increases approved Jan. 11 went to H. J. Heinz Co. for 8.3 percent on frozen potato products and to Hughes Tool Co. for an average of 7.2 percent on several oil tool products.

One of the largest increases approved by the commission was granted Jan. 10. It went to Rex Chainbelt's Nordberg division covering spare parts. Another Rex Chainbelt division was granted an 11.8 percent hike for conveyors and feeders.

Since the Price Commission began functioning, it has approved 601 price increases, rejected 28 and reduced 66 other requests.

A commission spokesman said no average of approved price increases has been computed.

The spokesman further noted that the approval of price increases does not hinge on whether they are over or under a 2.5 percent guideline, but whether the boost brings an excessive revenue increase for the firm.

On that basis, it is possible for a firm to receive a 100 percent increase in price on a particular item as long as the revenue increase is not above the guideline.

Teachers Vote To Strike on Pact Cutback

Chicago—By a 5-1 vote, the Chicago Teachers Union, AFT Local 1, voted for a city-wide strike Jan. 18 involving 24,000 school employes unless the city school board agrees to honor the two-year contract signed with the local a year ago.

The school board, in an attempt to eliminate a projected budget deficit of $125 million, decided unilaterally to make drastic cutbacks in the Chicago educational program including the contract that it signed with the union.

AFT local officials said the scheduled cutbacks "tear the heart out of the Chicago schools' educational program and would cost the average Chicago teacher $2,500" in 1972.

"The school employes are being asked to do more work for less money," the local said.

Strike action was approved by a vote of 16,500 to 3,635, and Local 1 Pres. John Desmond said it was the most ballots cast in any strike vote the union has conducted.

The budget proposals include laying off 1,100 teachers, eliminating one week of paid vacation and three sick days, reducing teachers aides' salaries by 25 percent and laying off 145 teacher-nurses.

Progress in Dock Talks Marked by Pay Accord

New York—The leadership of the Longshoremen recommended that the union's members in six North Atlantic ports accept a master settlement on wages and fringe benefits that would mean a 41 percent increase over three years for more than 30,000 workers.

The proposed contract would bring the basic dockworker scale from its present $4.60 an hour to $6.10 in the ports of Baltimore, Providence, R.I., New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Hampton Roads, Va.

The wage settlement calls for an immediate increase of 70 cents an hour and increases of 40 cents in each of the second two years of the contract.

But although the union's Atlantic Coast Wage Scale Committee has recommended acceptance, the ILA said the package will not be presented until local issues are resolved at the six ports or until settlements are won for 35,000 more workers at South Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason declared that productivity has been advancing "so rapidly" in the shipping industry that the agreement is completely justified.

A union spokesman pointed out that Port of New York workers now handle the same tonnage with 4,000 fewer men than last year.

J. Curtis Counts, director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, who was a key figure in achieving the settlement, could give no assurance of Pay Board approval.

"I can't stand here and tell you that the Pay Board will approve," he told the ILA's wage scale committee. "I don't know whether the aerospace decision will affect you or not."

The agreement, negotiated between the union and the Council of North Atlantic Shipping Associations, is "subject to the approval of agencies of the United States having jurisdiction over pay and price increases."

The package was achieved after a 60-day strike closed down all major Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports until Nov. 26 when Pres. Nixon obtained a Taft-Hartley injunction ordering the men back on the job for an 80-day "cooling-off" period. The injunction expires Feb. 14.

Already expired is a Taft-Hartley injunction which halted a 100-day West Coast dock strike by members of the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen. But West Coast dockers were continuing on the job under a contract extension.

The master settlement for North Atlantic ports also includes increased employer contributions to pension and welfare funds.

The ILA estimated that increased pension contributions would raise monthly retirement benefits to men 62 years or older from $300 to $400.

It was also estimated that under the new agreement a man with 20 years of service at the age of 50 would be able to retire on a $300-a-month pension.

Among the local port issues to be resolved are procedures on the Guaranteed Annual Income program. In New York, for example, longshoremen are guaranteed pay for 2,080 hours of work a year.

Labor's Price Patrol

THE AFL-CIO HAS INITIATED this program of price monitoring—not to harass merchants or innocent government functionaires—but because it has become very clear that no one else, either in government or business, has any real intention of making price controls, so-called, work. The system is designed rather to conceal price standards from the public and to frustrate enforcement.

The AFL-CIO is the largest organized group of consumers in America—13.5 million people—and most of them have families.

They all want protection against price gougers and they will not settle for Madison Avenue gimmickry.

Workers don't need a degree in economics to understand inflation. They know inflation dilutes the value of their paychecks. They get their lessons at the supermarket, from their landlords—they get it everytime they meet up with a cash register.

For most workers, wages are the sole source of family income. That income must be stretched to pay for food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education—all of the needs of a family.

And while the prices of all of these items have been going up, wages have been lagging behind. Despite the gains made at the collective bargaining table, wages continue to fall behind price increases.

WE ARE PUTTING MONITORS in the stores—as many as we possibly can. And we promise to bring every suspected violation of price controls and rent controls to the attention of the IRS.

As American citizens we have the right to expect the government to quickly and efficiently check these complaints and to crack down hard on the violators. And we demand to know the disposition of each and every complaint.

But to date, the Administration has provided price controls in name only. Complaints aren't checked. Consumers are confused. Honest businessmen are confused. Chaos reigns and prices go up and up.

Exceptions are granted; doctors are given special breaks; insurance premiums are allowed to jump; postal rates are decontrolled; regulations are issued, reissued, interpreted and reinterpreted. And still prices go up and up.

SO WE ARE GOING to report violations—every single one we suspect. And we will report them by the freight carload if necessary.

We will help tenants fight unjustified rent increases.

We will—if necessary—put picket lines in front of stores that refuse to play fair with their customers.

And we won't give up our fight in the Congress for an economic policy that will:

- Put unemployed Americans back to work.
- Give consumers the tax justice they deserve.
- Provide consumers an adequate voice in their government.
- End the stranglehold big business now has on the economic policy making functions of the federal government.

A Word Edgewise:

Broad Isolationism Ruled Out By 'Lesson' of World War II

By John P. Roche

AS WE BEGIN A NEW YEAR, it is interesting to put aside the day's papers and the week's magazines to meditate on the times in which we live. Admittedly meditation can be overdone, but it is good for the soul. And often, if we can disengage ourselves from the tumults of the present, we can obtain a sense of historical perspective. You really can't know where you are unless you know where you have been.

In this context, the London Economist made an observation that was literally stunning; that is, it almost jumped out of the page and hit you. What is remarkable about the United States, the editors remarked almost in passing, is not that we are going isolationist, but rather that for a quarter of a century we abandoned our historic isolationist posture in favor of playing an active role in the world.

That must have shocked a number of readers under 50, who have the notion that the United States has been playing "world gendarme" since time immemorial. When I repeated it to my students, they just looked baffled: to them, World War II occurred in the Middle Ages, and since they became politically aware, Vietnam has dominated the headlines.

As for the Cold War, they chuckle cynically—as is well known, the Cold War was invented by a bunch of ambitious, middle-aged men to justify their exercise of power.

Far more than we have realized, this is an automatic generational reaction. Half the present population of the United States appeared on the scene after World War II, and one of the most difficult things in life is to internalize the experience of one's elders.

Vietnam played a catalytic role in the disengagement of the young, but all the portents were there when the war was on, say, p. 36 of the papers. Indeed, in November 1962, I wrote an article—"A Memo to Today's Young Radicals"—in the New York Times Magazine which analyzed the disaffection of the young in precisely these terms.

Ironically, almost at the moment John F. Kennedy assumed the presidency on behalf of a new generation which had fought the war and won the peace, another new generation was sliding off into its private world, a world that rejected the trumpet. And this is said in a clinical, not a polemical vein.

After all, my friends and I were dedicated opponents of American intervention into World War II, and I don't believe we were cowards. We simply looked on war and conscription as a violation of our generational sovereignty: "Who the hell gave that bunch of middle-aged politicians the right to send us off to war?"

There are some who would argue that we overlearned the "lesson of World War II," that we got a "Munich psychosis." Perhaps. The Munich analogy has obviously been overworked.

Yet the key "lesson" of Munich and World War II still seems valid, namely that when you are dealing with totalitarians, the sooner you realize it the better. Because when you cope with totalitarians, the old rule book is meaningless, negotiations become simply one of their weapons-systems, and you have to make an early decision whether to fight or run.

IN ANY EVENT, we are now getting our lumps from a generation which, fortunately, has never had to learn the hard way in total war. Basically they want no more to do with our world than we wanted with that our elders dumped in our lap. But to understand this is not to approve of it as a historical position.

What has to be remembered is that the United States never took the initiative in World War II: the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor and then Adolf Hitler declared war on us.

Maybe we can safely retreat into our continental fortress, but what of a nuclear Pearl Harbor? Would we have the time and capacity to respond? It is all very well to play down Munich, but the lesson of Pearl Harbor can never be forgotten.

Bayard Rustin Says:

Bunche and Spingarn Proved Militancy in Civil Rights Cause

LIKE MANY ASPECTS of society, the civil rights movement is subject to the snap judgments and inaccurate labeling which so typifies the press. There is no more illustrative example than the distortion of the word "militant."

The dictionary defines a militant as one who is "aggressively active" in the pursuit of a cause. But for many journalists and commentators who cover the black struggle, militant assumes a different shade of meaning; for them, one can be "aggressively active" on behalf of certain causes, those who believe otherwise, no matter how insistently, are termed "moderates." Thus one can be militant for separatism, but moderate for integration. Those who preach revolutionary cant are militants, while the advocates of non-violence are moderates.

Militancy has thus come to have negative connotations for many Americans: the term frightens uneasy whites while the majority of blacks perceive it as a symbol of unproductive and sometimes suicidal tactics.

This is unfortunate, for militancy can represent many fine ideals: unswerving commitment to racial and economic justice, unyielding opposition to violence, and the refusal to adopt, no matter how fashionable, those philosophies one believes unjust and unwise.

Ralph Bunche and Arthur Spingarn were true militants, in the finest sense of the word. Their recent deaths have saddened all who have labored for peace, brotherhood and racial equality; our grief is tempered only by the knowledge that death came at the conclusion of full lives and productive careers.

The newspaper accounts which followed their deaths contained well deserved tributes to Dr. Bunche's accomplishments as a diplomat and to Arthur Spingarn's life as civil rights activist. These accounts, however, also devoted attention to those who had criticized Dr. Bunche and Mr. Spingarn for their supposed lack of militancy and commitment.

There is an irony to the situation where newspapers which 30 years ago were denouncing black activists and their white allies as subversives now go out of their way to provide a forum for those who dismiss their philosophies as out-dated or irrelevant.

The contents of newspapers are of course, dictated by fashion. But fashionability never influenced the actions of Ralph Bunche or Arthur Spingarn. Their ideals were shaped by learning and experience; their goals were accomplishment, not publicity.

There is no need to recount the well-known details of Dr. Bunche's career with the United Nations. His service to the world peace organization, however, overshadowed the tangible role he played in the civil rights struggle. It was his research, as an assistant to Gunnar Myrdal in the late 1930s, which helped provide the framework around which the civil rights movement shaped the goals which it achieved 20 and 30 years later.

During the Protest Era, Dr. Bunche made many important, but quiet contributions to the movement, for which he sought neither thanks nor recognition. Although already in failing health, he was one of the key participants in the great marches on Washington and Montgomery.

Arthur Spingarn is best known for his over half-century of service to the NAACP, with 26 years as president. Few recall how radical, even un-American, the NAACP was considered during its early existence. Few recall the danger of physical harm which threatened those, like Arthur Spingarn, who participated in picketing, demonstrations and other campaigns 40 and 50 years ago.

AS A JEW, Arthur Spingarn certainly was personally acquainted with the prejudices which pervaded American society. As a Jew engaged in radical causes, he was doubly suspect. And as a white man, he later endured the hostility of black separatists who felt his usefulness to the movement had come to an end.

Ralph Bunche and Arthur Spingarn qualify as militants according to its dictionary definition, for they were throughout their long careers "aggressively active" on behalf of the causes in which they believed. But they were also militants in the higher sense: they respected a man's worth, not his rhetoric; they refused to compromise those ideals which were basic to their personal philosophies; they refused to hate, even when it might have been understandable and they understood the folly of violence, and never shirked from speaking against it.

Fittingly enough, the ideals which had served as ever-present beacons to Dr. Bunche and Arthur Spingarn have taken on a new relevance as the philosophies of the fringes have been discredited. We now recognize, as they did, that there are certain principles and objectives which are constant, no matter how elusive or distant they may appear.

For Ralph Bunche and Arthur Spingarn, a society free from prejudice and discord often seemed far on the horizon, a dim light, flickering. Yet this light never extinguished, despite the many discouragements, and much of their patience and vision has been vindicated. For this, along with their accomplishments, they will be remembered, long after the names of their critics have been lost in the pages of history.

Profit Boom Forecast:

Job Improvements Unlikely Despite Optimism on Economy

NOTHING IN THE WORKS now will make any real dent in the serious unemployment problem, organized labor's top economist declared, although relatively optimistic forecasts of an economic pick-up during 1972 may be fulfilled.

Stressing that 1971 closed out with unemployment at the highest peak in 10 years, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger predicted that "the lion's share" of any economic growth this year will go to businesses and wealthy families, not to workers. In fact, he said, with "a massive shift of income distribution" now taking place, it is very possible that a "profits-boom" could develop this year, with only a slight reduction in unemployment.

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Goldfinger said the two main factors in the shift of income distribution away from workers and to corporations and wealthy families are new "bonanzas" in the tax laws, and "pressures . . . to hold down wages while profits are moving up fairly sharply."

He said that many economists who see improvement during the year ahead also see corporate profits increasing "about twice as fast or faster than the total volume of sales and production." Shifting the "tax burden onto the backs of low- and moderate-income people," he said, "is a deliberate aspect of Pres. Nixon's program."

Goldfinger scored the position of Administration spokesmen and others that "we're going to have to get used to living with a higher level of unemployment," with a rate of 5 percent perhaps typical in a full-employment year.

"This is shocking—it's callous—and it's an utter disregard for the human beings and for families involved," he declared.

THE MOST CRITICAL NEED, he said, is measures to create jobs for 5.2 million workers now unemployed and 1.5 million new workers entering the labor market each year. He said that if the Administration were determined to create the needed jobs, there would be no "great difficulty in finding ways" to do it. "We have loads of repair work to be done in the cities," he said, "public services that are needed, and all kinds of things that could help create jobs" and "improve the quality of life in America."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE LATEST arguments of the Nixon Administration is to blame the rise of unemployment in the United States on the winding down of the war in Vietnam.

This has a double advantage; it calls attention to the decrease in the number of troops in Vietnam and it absolves the Administration of following domestic policies from 1969 on that deliberately contributed to the rise of unemployment to its current 6 percent level.

The road to today's high unemployment level didn't start with the withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam and their return to civilian life. It started on the day in 1969 that the President began "cooling off" the economy in a fight on inflation that he promised wouldn't cost Americans their jobs.

The statistics are clear. When the President entered office in January 1969, there were 542,400 American troops in Vietnam. In January 1970 the number had dropped to 472,500; a year later to 335,700 and as of Jan. 1, 1972 the number was 157,000.

During this same period, unemployment grew not by the hundreds of thousands, but by the millions. There were 2.8 million unemployed when Nixon entered office. In a year, due to Nixon's "cooling down" of the economy, there were 3.4 million unemployed; a year later 5.4 million and today unemployment is still at that level.

No one can lightly dismiss the seriousness of the job picture for returning veterans, but to correlate the growth of unemployment during the past three years with the winding down of the Vietnam war and defense expenditures in the way the President is now doing is political evasion.

In a 34-page document from the White House on "Richard Nixon's Third Year," the claim is made that today's unemployment rate would be "much greater" if veterans and defense workers "were still employed in their wartime activities."

However, the claim calls attention to a highly important failure of the Administration in meeting the obvious challenge of a return to a peacetime economy. The need for advance planning was there. Nixon did nothing about it.

Organized labor recognized that a return to a peacetime economy would mean defense job losses long ago. As early as December 1969—two years ago—labor leadership was pleading for "the exploration of plans, guides and priorities for a smooth economic and social adjustment to lower levels of defense expenditures."

AT ITS MAY 1971 meeting in Atlanta, the AFL-CIO Executive Council laid down an 11-point program that called for government planning for the obvious threat to jobs as Vietnam wound down.

It charged the Administration with having no plans for what clearly lay ahead. Instead, it continued, "the Administration slowed down the economy in 1969-1970; the President vetoed congressional legislation to create jobs for the unemployed and to provide more adequate funds for education, housing and urban development . . . so the decline in defense expenditures came in a period of weak job markets and increasing amounts of idle productive capacity."

In presenting its program for reconversion, the council declared:

"The absorption of displaced defense workers and returning GIs into the civilian economy is an issue of national concern. Of paramount importance in trying to effectuate a smooth transition from defense to civilian production is a prosperous, full employment economy."

The President now tells the country that today's unemployment is largely the result of the war and defense wind-down. He uses it as a way to obscure the reality of his deliberate slowdown of the economy of the past three years.

The second session of the 92nd Congress is now upon us. It is essential that it correct the Administration's lack of action, and get moving—even at this late date—to adopt a reconversion program along the lines proposed by organized labor.

NO REAL DENT in unemployment is likely in 1972 under present Administration policies, even if relatively favorable forecasts of an economic pick-up are fulfilled, declared AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger, center, on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Hobart Rowen, left, of the Washington Post and Donald Finley of United Press International. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Opens New Controversy:

Hodgson Calls on Mediators To Help Keep Lid on Wages

would not be tainted by the presumed pro-worker bias of the Labor Dept.

Hodgson told the mediators they didn't have to be "policemen" for the controls program. But he said they should be "artful" in discouraging settlements that violate the "spirit" of Pay Board policy.

It is "cowardice," Hodgson said, for an employer to agree to a high wage settlement in the expectation that the Pay Board will knock it down.

And mediators, he suggested, should resist attempts to "outwit" the Pay Board by such devices as an agreement to restore any cuts the board makes in contract settlements after the wage control program is ended.

The impact of controls on collective bargaining was explored also by labor and management speakers during the five-day seminar program.

There appeared to be general agreement that the wage control program is in a state of confusion, but that its goal is to hold down pay increases.

From the management viewpoint, not surprisingly, the goal was applauded despite acknowledgement that long-term controls would have an inhibiting effect on collective bargaining.

And from union speakers, there was concern that rigid guidelines perpetuate and create inequities that the bargaining process strives to eradicate.

At one panel, however, the labor, management and public participants found a broad area of agreement.

All three speakers serve on the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee—Princeton University Prof. Albert Rees as a public member; Robert A. Georgine, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., as a labor member, and Paul B. Richards, director of a New York state building contractors' association, as a management member.

They agreed that the tripartite machinery has generally worked equitably despite very real differences over individual cases.

The reason, Georgine told the seminar, is that "we're dealing with people who are knowledgeable, who know what the construction industry is all about."

Rees said the public members on the board are aware of the problems of inequities and the need in some areas to bring lower rates up. They consider their job one of achieving overall goals without forcing each contract into a rigid mould.

At least by implication, the panelists contrasted the construction industry machinery with the confusion of the Pay Board.

At the opening of the conference, the director of the Mediation & Conciliation Service, J. Curtis Counts, told his staff that serious questions have been raised about the functioning of the collective bargaining system. Federal mediators, he urged, must continue to "look for new settlement techniques."

There were reminders throughout the seminar program that federal mediators will continue to need the highest skills of their craft to help bring labor and management to the settlement stage at the bargaining table—even apart from complications of wage controls.

From top management came the anguished cry that unions are asking "too much" and are "too powerful."

And from the trade union side came labor's insistence on continued improvement in wages, working conditions, job security and fringe benefits.

Nicholas Zonarich, organizational director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., said employers who resist coordinated bargaining are still trying to play one union against another. But they won't get away with it, he pledged.

Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons told employers who complained at the cost of fringe benefits that this area of workers' compensation will continue to expand because the group purchase of insurance and services is the most economical and efficient method of obtaining them. But he urged that employers join with unions in trying to curb the rise in health costs by helping develop better ways of providing health care.

Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock sharply challenged the Pay Board's rejection of the aerospace contract and Teamsters Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons suggested that Virgil Day, the General Electric vice president who serves as an industry member of the Pay Board, "is trying to negotiate the next GE agreement" by trimming back aerospace contracts.

IMPACT OF WAGE CONTROLS on collective bargaining is discussed by Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons, center, and Robert A. Georgine, secretary-treasurer of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. At left is Harold Mills of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, who chaired a panel discussion at a staff seminar for government mediators.

Controls Seen Spurring New Bargaining Shifts

The shape of collective bargaining, but not its vitality, will be affected by government wage controls in the opinion of some of the nation's most experienced federal mediators.

Shop talk at the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service staff seminar in Washington included trend-spotting and predictions by men who have helped settle hundreds of contract disputes.

These are some of the projections by leading mediators attending the conference:

Controls will not inhibit unions from seeking higher wage increases, and getting them wherever possible.

But to the extent that pay raises are limited, the expectation is that unions will seek shorter-term contracts or at least wage reopeners in longer contracts. In the industrial sector, this would reverse a trend to longer agreements and would be resisted by management.

Since pension and health-welfare benefits are not subject to as stringent controls as direct wages, they will get more emphasis at the bargaining table.

Furthermore, if Congress should pass a national pension law of some sort, the problem of meshing pension plans into federal standards would become a major negotiating issue.

In another fringe area, dental care and prescription drug coverage plans are likely to become more common.

Despite a Supreme Court ruling that companies cannot be required to bargain on pension improvements for persons who have already retired, a number of firms will probably continue to negotiate with their unions on this issue. And unions will continue to try to persuade management to agree to such negotiations.

If unemployment stays high, job security issues will be given greater emphasis at the bargaining table. Restrictions on overtime, supplemental unemployment benefits and renewed efforts to shorten the workweek are all anticipated.

Workers who don't already have at least 10 paid holidays are likely to seek and get them.

There may be more contracts providing a higher vacation bonus for employes who agree to take their vacations at less popular times of the year—a feature that would ease management problems of work scheduling.

A continued trend is anticipated for elimination or at least reduction of geographical differentials, for compression of service time required for vacation eligibility and for preservation of skilled craft differentials through percentage raises rather than flat cents-per-hour increases.

And unless the Pay Board clearly adopts a liberal policy on the issue companies may find it difficult to "buy out" workrules that limit productivity in exchange for higher pay.

Appalachian Labor Unit Expands Training Pact

The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council will give 600 more jobless and underemployed workers on-the-job training in a 12-state area under a new Labor Dept. contract.

Since the original 18-month contract was signed in November 1970, 4,280 persons have been trained and 3,300 placed in jobs in 11 Appalachian states.

The new contract for $400,000, which extends the program into Mississippi, was signed by Council Chairman Miles C. Stanley, who also is president of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson.

Other states covered by the program are Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia.

The new funds for the Appalachia program bring the total federal government contribution to $2.9 million. This includes $2.2 million from the Labor Dept. for on-the-job costs and training allowances and $698,938 from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, which administers the supplemental instruction portion of the program.

The new contract will cover training of about 400 jobless or underemployed Appalachia residents, continuation of communications training for 90 Vietnam era veterans, training in the building and construction trades for 75 Choctaw Indians in Mississippi, and training for 40 tractor-trailer drivers.

On-the-job training sessions range from four to 26 weeks, with the average course running 15 weeks. Classroom instruction includes basic education and prevocational training for an average of 10 weeks.

The council will continue to subcontract program operations with employers throughout Appalachia, the Labor Dept. said.

Trainee wages are paid by the employer to comply with existing union agreements. Trainees are paid the federal minimum wage or the prevailing rate for the area—whichever is higher—in addition to fringe benefits.

The Appalachian Council, based in Charleston, W. Va., also recruits trainees for the Job Corps under a separate Labor Dept. agreement.

Under a current contract for $338,865 that runs through next May, the council expects to enroll 2,600 youths for the Job Corps. The funds cover the costs of enrollment and job placement for persons 16 to 21 years old from West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois.

Urban areas account for 60 percent of 1,940 men and 630 women who will be recruited. The other 40 percent are coming from rural areas with populations of less than 2,500.

Laundry Union's John Donovan Dies

Boston—John F. Donovan, a vice president of the Laundry & Dry Cleaners Union and long-time president of Local 66, died. He was 71.

Donovan had been president of the local, which represents members in the entire New England area, since it was founded in 1941. He was elected a vice president of the international in 1958.

Employers Top Violation List On Age Bias

The Labor Dept. cracked down on 2,518 employers and employment agencies for illegally discriminating against older workers during the 12 months ended June 30.

Workers between 40 and 65 cannot be denied jobs, promotions, pay increases, fringe benefits or be fired because of their age under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. The act covers establishments employing 25 or more persons.

But the Labor Dept. said it found 683 employers who refused to hire workers in the covered age group. Another 110 employers violated the law by discharging workers and 265 denied promotions because of age.

The report said 351 employment agencies and four labor unions were also in violation of the age discrimination provisions during fiscal year 1971.

Back wages of $738,074 were found due to 655 workers because of the violations by employers. Informal negotiations resulted in 615 workers between 40 and 65 being hired, rehired or retained, the Labor Dept. said.

Most of the violations—or 1,765 of the total 2,522 establishments—involved the placing of illegal discriminatory help-wanted ads.

These ads were placed by 1,180 employers and 585 employment agencies.

Jobless Rate Jumps Back to 6.1 Percent

ber to act on Nixon's economic proposals.

Hodgson said that "as the effect of these measures takes hold during the year, we can anticipate that improvements will occur" in both employment and unemployment.

Jobless rates for most major groups continued essentially unchanged in December, the BLS reported.

The unemployment rates were 4.4 percent for adult men, 3.3 percent for married men, 5.8 percent for adult women and 17.5 percent for those in the 16-19 age group.

The jobless rate for Negroes, which had dropped to 9.3 percent in November, shot back up a full percentage point to 10.3 percent.

The rate for white workers, however, moved down from 5.7 to 5.4 percent.

Construction workers were hit hard seasonally and their unemployment rate increased from 8.9 to 11.2 percent in December.

The average duration of unemployment stood at 11.3 weeks in December, seasonally adjusted, and the number of workers unemployed 27 weeks or more dropped to 510,000, the lowest level since April.

The number of workers employed part-time, but who wanted full-time work or who had suffered a reduction in their workweeks amounted to 2.4 million—not far below the 10-year high of 2.6 million reached the previous month.

The unemployment rate for Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group stood at 8.1 percent in December with 325,000 returning veterans unable to find jobs.

The BLS said the number of Vietnam-era veterans in the civilian labor force had grown by 600,000 over the year.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls remained unchanged from November at 37.2 hours.

Average hourly earnings of workers were up 2 cents in December to $3.50 and weekly earnings rose by $1.44 to $130.55.

Compared with December 1970, average weekly earnings were up $8.12 or 6.6 percent. Consumer prices rose 3.5 percent for the 12 months ended in November.

In its review of the year, the BLS said that joblessness among Negroes reached 10 percent in the first half of the year and remained there—a level 1.8 times the unemployment rate for whites.

The jobless rate for professional and technical employes was 2.9 percent, the highest since 1948.

The average period of joblessness rose from 8.8 weeks in 1970 to 11.4 weeks last year, and the number of workers out of work 15 weeks or longer nearly doubled at 1.1 million.

Grant Expands Job Training Of Bricklayers

The Bricklayers are expanding a training program for unemployed and underemployed workers from 28 to 33 states with a new $125,000 contract from the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration.

The additional funds, which will be used to prepare 125 persons for bricklayer apprenticeships in six states, raises the total funding of an 18-month contract signed last May to $668,758.

Five of the six states are new to the program. The five states and number of trainees are California, 20; Colorado, 15; Oregon, 15; Utah, 15, and Wisconsin, 15. Massachusetts, which was included in the previous program, received an additional 25 training slots.

The Bricklayers will continue to subcontract the training to locals, joint apprenticeship committees and labor-management groups in the 33 states and the District of Columbia. The training projects are conducted for 18 weeks, with six weeks of classroom instruction and 12 weeks on the job.

'I'll Remember . . .'

Slump Triggers Drop In Full-Time Workers

The Nixon economic slowdown in 1970 not only boosted the unemployment rate from 3.5 percent to 6 percent, but also triggered in first decrease since 1958 in the number of workers who worked full time.

An analysis of the employment situation by Bureau of Labor Statistics researchers found that 52 million Americans worked at full-time year-round jobs in 1970—a drop of 800,000 from 1969. The decline was entirely among men.

BLS Economist Anne M. Young and Research Analyst Kopp Michelotti reported that the impact was greatest among men in the 24 to 44 age group. It also affected white men more than blacks.

The findings, published in the December issue of the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review, also show that while unemployment never rose above 4.7 million during the year, the number of workers who were jobless at some time in 1970 was 14.6 million—a rise of 2.8 million over 1969.

Other grim findings reported by Young and Michelotti show:

- The increase in the 1970 labor force was proportionately less than the population increase, a reversal of the trend in 1968 and 1969 when the labor force grew at a greater pace than the population.
- 15.3 percent of all who worked or looked for work were unemployed at some time during the year, the largest proportion in several years.
- The increase among those with some unemployment was greater for whites than for Negroes, for men than for women and for craftsmen than for laborers.
- 4.5 million persons were jobless for a total of 15 weeks or more during the year, up 2 million over 1969.

What the 1971 statistics will show has not yet been tabulated, but they could well be even more grim since unemployment, at a high of 4.7 million in June 1970, reached a high of 5.5 million in June 1971.

The 1970 drop in full-time employment was largely due to cutbacks in aerospace and defense-related industries. About 36.3 million men worked all year at full-time jobs, 865,000 fewer than a year earlier. Most of those who lost full-time jobs worked between 27 and 49 weeks during the year. Full-time women workers, on the other hand, showed little change.

Among married men, only 77 percent held full-time jobs, down from 80 percent in 1969.

The job picture for young people was particularly grim. The number of 16 to 20-year-olds increased by 750,000 during the year, but the number who actually worked—14.6 million—showed little change, leaving a job deficit of about 750,000.

The decline in full-time work was primarily in manufacturing. Service and trades workers were less subject to cyclical fluctuations and had the best record for steady employment. The worst record was among factory operatives where employment dropped by 1.2 million.

The BLS study further noted that the looser labor market in 1970 resulted not only in a rise in the number of workers who experience unemployment, but also a sharp increase in the number who were jobless 15 weeks or longer.

About 4.5 million persons were affected by this long-term unemployment, which was an increase of 7.9 million or 73 percent over 1969, the BLS researchers said. Within this group, the proportion of men who were jobless 27 weeks or more was slightly higher than a year earlier.

Tariff Panel Sued by IUE On TV Imports

Tariff cuts by the United States have virtually destroyed the domestic television set industry, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers contended in a federal court suit.

The union is challenging the Tariff Commission interpretation of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act.

It told the court that the commission has misread a provision requiring it to determine whether increased imports that damage a domestic industry were largely caused by trade concessions made by the United States.

A majority of the commission, the IUE protested, has narrowly construed the language to mean that the rise in imports in a given year "must be caused by tariff reductions immediately preceding the increase."

The union contended that the language and legislative history of the law requires that the impact of all tariff concessions made over the years be considered in evaluating the impact on imports.

On this basis, the IUE said, the Tariff Commission should recommend to the President either quotas stringent enough to revive the industry or restoration of a tariff that was once 35 percent and now is down to 5 percent.

The IUE also asked reversal of a commission ruling that denied benefits to workers who lost their jobs when the Warwick Electronics plant at Zion, Ill., was closed.

The union said the action was "inconsistent and arbitrary" since workers at a New Jersey firm were approved for benefits "in the same situation."

Survey Shows Widespread Distrust Of Administration Economic Policy

Ann Arbor, Mich.—"A large segment of Americans do not trust the government's ability to manage the economy successfully," the University of Michigan concluded from a sampling of consumer attitudes.

The survey, which is based on 1,300 personal interviews, has been run since 1951. The latest poll, taken between Oct. 15 and Nov. 20, found that 61 percent of consumers see no hope of improvement in the nation's unemployment problem.

The October-November survey shows a decline in consumer confidence in government actions from the previous two months.

In the August-September survey, 39 percent of the consumers thought the government would be successful in slowing inflation and increasing employment, while 48 percent thought it would not be successful.

With separate questions asked on inflation and unemployment in the current survey, 35 percent thought the government would be successful in stopping inflation, 48 percent thought it would not. Only 25 percent thought unemployment would be curbed, with 61 percent saying it would not.

Just over half, 53 percent, of those surveyed believe that price increases were actually stopped during the freeze and "more people, 37 percent, expect unemployment to increase during the next 12 months than expect it to decrease, 21 percent."

The survey, conducted by the university's Survey Research Center, found a slight overall improvement in the consumer's willingness to buy, with optimism among those with incomes of $10,000 or more a year offsetting the pessimism of those with incomes under $10,000.

With repeal of the excise tax on automobiles, the Christmas season coming on and the freeze raising hopes of finding a bargain, the survey found an increase of five points in the index for those with incomes of $10,000 or more. But the index dropped two-tenths of a point for the lower income group.

Consumer attitudes of February 1966 provide the base of 100 for the index. The current index is 84.6 for families with incomes of $10,000. That is "about half way back" from the doldrums of April and November of 1970, when the index hit levels of 72 and 76. The index stood at 95.5 in February 1969.

"Consumer sentiment has changed little in response to Phase 2," the university economists said. "Many Americans continue to have doubts about the eventual success of the new economic policy."

"While the new economic policy was greeted by most consumers as good news, earlier data suggested that this would not be translated into improved sentiment or spending behavior, except for much more favorable attitudes toward buying a car and the greatly improved outlook for auto sales," the report concluded. "Data from the new (October-November) survey confirm these earlier findings."

W. E. Strader, Grain Millers Officer, Dies

Dallas—Wayne E. Strader died Jan. 9, less than a month after he was appointed secretary-treasurer of the Grain Millers by the union's executive board.

Strader, 53, had succeeded Harold A. Schneider, who died in December. Before becoming secretary-treasurer, Strader was an international vice president and assistant to Pres. Roy O. Wellborn of the AFGM.

In a message to Wellborn, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said that the death of Strader "must come as a severe shock to you and your fellow officers, especially so soon after the death of Sec.-Treas. H. A. Schneider."

A message was also sent to Strader's wife Bobbie Joe, who survives with one son. Services were held in Greenville, Tex.

Election Reform Measure Gets Final Congress Okay

CHARLES LUNA, right, president-emeritus of the United Transportation Union, explains the 42-month contract negotiated by the UTU for 150,000 railroad workers during a meeting of the Pay Board. Seated next to Luna is Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, a labor member of the board. The UTU presentation was made during the first session of the Pay Board open to the news media.

Price, Rent Exemptions Hit as Unfair

By Mike Bosch

The Cost of Living Council's exemption from price controls of 75 percent of the nation's retailers and nearly 50 percent of all rental units was denounced by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland as taking "the easy way out . . . at the expense of the workers and consumers."

"The inequality is self-evident," declared Kirkland. "The wages of the workers in these stores and the renters in these homes remain controlled. The rents they pay and the price tags on the goods they buy are not."

The new ruling by the COL council added a number of loopholes and exemptions to the Administration's Phase 2 program.

The council said it was decontrolling dwellings of four units or less and landlords who own four units or less, effective Jan. 19. It said about 10 million of the 23.6 million rental units in the United States were exempted as a result of the ruling.

It took the action, the council said, because complaints from renters in these categories accounted for more than 25 percent of the total Internal Revenue Service workload so far in Phase 2.

Owners of these units, the council added, do not have the "accounting and legal support to provide them with guidance in interpreting the rent regulations of the Price Commission."

The council action also exempted from controls apartments which rent for $500 or more a month.

Kirkland commented that "stripped of its rationalizations, it means the Administration has no intention of really controlling prices. It is not a job that can be done with partial enforcement of halfway measures.

"The explanation that this is necessary to reduce the workload on the IRS enforcers strikes us as nonsense. If there are going to be controls there has to be enforcement to protect the public."

In exempting small retail outlets —those with sales of less than $100,000—from all price regulations, the COL council went beyond a Price Commission ruling that would have merely waived the price posting requirements for such stores.

The exempt firms represent 75 percent of the nation's retailers and 15 percent of total sales.

The council maintained that "although prices will be allowed to fluctuate freely, competition will restrict the freedom . . . to increase their prices." It used the same

Bill Includes Section On Union Rights

By David L. Perlman

Congress voted final approval to a labor-supported election reform bill that sets a realistic ceiling on broadcast and advertising spending in political campaigns. It also clarifies the political rights of unions.

The spending limit of 10 cents for each potential voter will take effect 60 days after the President signs the bill, thus applying it to the 1972 presidential and congressional elections and to all future elections for federal office.

A previous attempt to limit the amount a candidate can spend on political broadcasts ran into a presidential veto in 1970. But the bipartisan 334-19 vote in the House indicated that congressional Republicans are convinced Pres. Nixon will sign the new legislation, which covers virtually all forms of campaign advertising.

One section of the bill sent to the White House reaffirms the right of unions to carry on political education and action programs for their members as well as the right to establish and administer voluntary funds for political purposes.

Thus, unions are clearly permitted to communicate with their members on political and legislative issues. They are specifically allowed to conduct registration and get-out-the-vote drives aimed at union members and their families. And separate political committees such as COPE may provide direct support to endorsed candidates through funds voluntarily contributed by union members.

The sponsor of the section spelling out permissible political actvities by unions and corporations, Rep. Orval Hansen (R-Idaho), re-

$1.90 Held Too Low:

Working Poor Level Divides Pay Board

By Tom Castor

The Pay Board told the Cost of Living Council that the council's proposed ceiling of $1.90 for exemption of hourly pay from wage controls is too low, but board members could not agree on any higher figure.

Meanwhile, the board postponed until Jan. 25 action on a United Transportation Union contract covering 150,000 railroad workers amid warnings from union leaders that they will not put the contract into effect unless it is fully approved.

The Cost of Living Council has final say on wage exemptions regardless of what the Pay Board recommends, but the council had asked the board for its feelings on the proposal to exempt the "working poor" from economic controls.

Congress ordered the council to make such exemptions and the council said in a memo to the Pay Board that it had arrived at an annual wage of $3,968 for a family of four as a definition of the working poor.

But the labor members of the Pay Board rejected this definition of low-income families. They proposed an exemption ceiling of $3.50 an hour which the board also turned down. The public members then proposed a ceiling of $2.20 an hour which failed to pass.

Business members of the tripartite board were satisfied with the $1.90 minimum and offered a resolution in favor of it, but that, too, was rejected.

The Pay Board then adopted a resolution, directed at the Cost of Living Council, which said the $1.90 figure "is inconsistent with the purposes of the amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act and supporting analysis."

The labor members argued that the figures used by the Cost of Living Council were not even current.

Hidden Jobless Count Swells Actual Rate

A Census Bureau report has confirmed that joblessness is more prevalent than reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics because BLS surveys do not count those who have given up the search for work.

The Census Bureau, in its 1970 Census Employment Survey, counted these "hidden unemployed" in 67 low-income sections in 51 of the nation's largest cities and seven rural areas.

The report shows that jobless rates in these low-income areas rise sharply when the hidden unemployed are added to workforce figures.

The AFL-CIO has long main-

Nixon Message Seen Devoid of Substance

Labor took a dim view of Pres. Nixon's latest promise that the nation is on the verge of "a new prosperity" despite a 6 percent unemployment rate.

The President's State of the Union message to Congress bubbled with the same optimism that marked his previous annual reports. It also was virtually devoid of new legislative initiatives, other than warmed over proposals from past years.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany commented that while "Promises, Promises" might be a good theme for a musical comedy, America's workers, are entitled to something more substantial.

Meany termed the President's record of keeping promises "really very poor. And when he doesn't keep a promise, he seems just to forget he ever made it."

Thus, Meany noted, millions of Americans who are now unemployed heard the President promise when he took office that his program to slow down the economy wouldn't cost them their jobs.

Meany Says Data Prove Failure of 'Game Plan 2'

The sharp jump in the Wholesale Price Index for December, and other year-end economic indicators, offer further proof that Pres. Nixon's "Game Plan No. 2 is as much of a bust as his first Game Plan," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the Wholesale Price Index for December, the first full month after the President's wage-price freeze, rose eight-tenths of 1 percent, largely because of a 2 percent increase in the price of farm products, processed feeds and foods.

About 40 percent of these products, exempt from any Phase 2 controls, accounted for more than two-thirds of the increase. Unprocessed farm products, such as fresh fruits, vegetables and eggs, have not been subject to any of the Administration's economic controls.

"In a few weeks, every housewife will have proof positive that the White House price controls just are not working," Meany said.

"When that happens, America

Urges Improvement, Not Destruction:

Abel Warns Against Moves To Sap Bargaining System

Collective bargaining can't be completely purged of its untidiness and occasional frustrations, Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel told a staff conference of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

It can be improved, he suggested, with the cooperation of labor, management and government.

But such drastic proposals as labor courts, compulsory arbitration, a ban on industry-wide bargaining and a return to the use of antitrust laws as a weapon against unions would "destroy" the system, he warned.

The "untidiness" of collective bargaining "is part of the system's strength," Abel declared. Restrictions on the right to strike will merely "produce management irresponsibility and employe frustration."

Abel spoke at the concluding session of a five-day seminar marking the 25th anniversary of the establishment of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service as an independent agency.

He noted the new complexities of union-management negotiations and cited the joint labor-management committees on productivity that are being set up at all steel plants under the union's contract with its major employers.

"It is probably the first time that a major industry had asked a union to help it run its operations," Abel said. The Steelworkers "hope that it will prove mutually beneficial, increase productivity, and help meet the threat of steel imports which last year represented the loss of some 100,000 job opportunities."

Noting that the current contract in basic steel extends to 15 years the period of "uninterrupted industrial peace," Abel suggested that it might form the basis for an in-depth study of "elements that produce good labor-management relations."

It would be a "refreshing" change, he said, from harping on industrial conflict. "And voluntary application of the basic principles uncovered in such a study would have a beneficial, long-range effect in stabilizing and perfecting collecting bargaining in those relatively few instances where it now falters."

Earlier in the program, Pres. John F. Griner of the American Federation of Government Employes told the mediators that the trouble with collective bargaining in the federal service is that there isn't enough of it.

Griner urged that bargaining areas in government be expanded by law rather than through the limited executive orders which currently set ground rules.

He noted that federal mediators who have tried to assist negotiations in the federal service are as frustrated as union members when an agreement apears within reach and an agency head intervenes with the claim that "you can't negotiate on that."

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes told the conference that collective bargaining has become a "fact of life" in the public service but still tends to be dominated by the employer "in a manner that would be intolerable in business or industry."

While wage issues are important, public workers are turning to unionism in search of "dignity" and because they are tired of being pushed around, Wurf said.

In a reference to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson's proposal that federal mediators try to tilt contract settlements into the wage control framework, Wurf charged that efforts to use the Mediation & Conciliation Service to enforce controls represent "a serious violation" of the agency's neutrality.

New Locals Open Talks With Portland Schools

Portland, Ore.—The trade union movement here is preparing to make good at the bargaining table on the promises that won its collective bargaining rights for more than 6,000 employes of the Portland School District.

Portland Local 111 of the American Federation of Teachers, began negotiations this week on behalf of 3,600 teachers in the state's largest school district.

Next week, negotiators for the AFL-CIO & Teamsters District Council of School Employes will begin bargaining with the school district on behalf of 2,500 non-teaching employes.

In winning their representation elections by 2 to 1 margins, both union groups stressed that they could offer professional collective bargaining expertise.

The teachers local scored its victory in late September over a National Education Association affiliate. It was the AFT's first representation election triumph in a major West Coast City.

The District Council of School Employes, a recently formed alliance of 17 AFL-CIO and Teamster affiliates, made it a clean sweep for organized labor by winning a late December election over an association of school employes.

James Leary, the AFL-CIO Region XXI director, whose office helped win the latter victory, said, "it shows the success that can be achieved if there is coordination in the union effort."

One of the seven members of the Portland school board, which must ultimately accept or reject the end product of the negotiations, is R. W. DeWeese, chairman of Pres. Nixon's Committee on State & Local Government Cooperation, which advises the Cost of Living Council, the Pay Board and the Price Commission. Contracts covering school and other local government employes come within the purview of the committee.

One of the DeWeese committee's first actions was to recommend against retroactive pay raises for teachers for the freeze period between Aug. 15 and Nov. 14.

DeWeese, a recently retired executive of a non-union manufacturing firm, a Republican fund-raiser and a 12-year member of the school board, was noticeably shaken by PFT's bargaining rights victory last September and by the union's vow to work for the defeat of three incumbent school directors whose terms expire in mid-1972. He circulated a letter among members of the Portland Chamber of Commerce, of which he is a former president, calling the PFT victory the result of "a brutal power play." His letter said "the control of our schools and of the expenditure of $75 million in tax money will be in the hands of the AFL-CIO" unless businessmen "gain a sense of emergency."

Worker Seen Victim Of Price Exemptions

reasoning in announcing decontrol in the rental areas, asserting that the exempt units "tend not to be inflationary" and "competition in the marketplace" would serve as sufficient control.

The Price Commission's ruling on posting had come only two days before all retailers would have been required to post their price lists publicly.

Checks during the first two weeks of the year in about 36,000 outlets around the country showed a non-compliance rate of 60 to 70 percent. Spot checks by the IRS on Jan. 17 showed that among the firms still controlled, the non-compliance rate had dropped to about 15 percent.

The COL council acknowledged that much of the decline could be attributed to waiver of the posting requirement for small establishments, a sector of heavy violations.

Of 1,144 spot checks, the IRS found 173 violations. The council said suits would be filed against the violators, but would not identify them. It said violators would be announced "in a number of circumstances," but gave no details.

In an earlier ruling, the council added a loophole for conglomerates to Phase 2 regulations, announcing that prenotification of price increases will no longer be necessary for multi-industry firms with sales of less than $100 million in the affected industry.

The council said a controlled firm should not be "inhibited unnecessarily" compared with another firm in the same industry.

Meanwhile, the Price Commission added more information of a "confidential" nature to its method of administering Phase 2 controls. Previously, the commission had explained a number of price increases in stores by pointing out that prices were controlled on an aggregate, or total, basis.

Many firms, it said, based their prices on a certain category as a whole rather than item by item.

Now, the commission has ruled that a firm must continue to use an item-by-item approach if that had been its past practice on pricing.

This information must be made available to the Price Commission on request, but not to the public.

With less and less information available to the public, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis observed that "both price guidelines and enforcement procedures have not been designed to help the consumer."

NLRB Jurisdiction Set On Religious Complex

A major step in assuming jurisdiction over the labor relations of a religious institution has been taken by the National Labor Relations Board in ordering representation elections at the Christian Science Church complex in Boston.

The case arose out of applications by Local 103 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Local 33 of the Carpenters for representation rights at the Boston complex which includes the Christian Science Monitor newspaper, several other Christian Science publications and a number of apartment buildings and stores owned and operated by the church.

The church contended that it should not come under NLRB jurisdiction on the grounds that this would breach religious freedom and separation of Church and State, that the church is purely a religious institution engaged in purely religious activities, and that the workers involved spend a minimum of time on operations such as the apartment house maintenance which might be found to be commercial operations.

The NLRB set up a three-man panel to hear the case. By a vote of two to one, the panel found that the church's operations come within the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Act and that representation elections, therefore, should be held.

Citing a number of previous cases in which the NLRB took jurisdiction, the majority—members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins, Jr.—said:

"It is well settled that there is a distinction, under the First Amendment, between the freedom to hold religious beliefs and the freedom of conduct based on religious beliefs. The former is absolute, the latter may be curtailed for the protection of society and has been so curtailed in a wide range of areas including the labor relations area."

Fanning and Jenkins said that while it was the board's general practice to decline jurisdiction over non-profit religious organizations, it "does assert jurisdiction over those operations of such organizations which are, in the generally accepted sense, commercial in nature."

The two noted that the Christian Science Monitor, which has a circulation of some 230,000, takes advertising and reports other than purely religious news. They further noted that the church's real estate operations include "between 50 and 75 apartment buildings and several stores."

"Based on the above," they said, "we conclude that the employer is engaged in substantial enterprises which are in the normally accepted sense commercial and that these operations are in commerce and affect commerce."

Member Ralph E. Kennedy, appointed to the board by Pres. Nixon in December 1970, dissented. He based his dissent on a case involving the Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod, in which the full board rejected a plea for a representation election in 1954.

This case involved radio station KFUO, operated by the church. The station broadcasts only religious programs, classical music and public service programs.

The majority held that the programs were non-commercial and that the NLRB, therefore, should deny the petition for an election made by IBEW Local 1217.

The dissenters said that the station, nevertheless, came under the Federal Communications Commission and that there was no reason why it should not also come under the NLRB.

GOP Candidates Win in Vermont

Montpelier, Vt. — Vermont's congressional delegation stayed in the Republican column after a special election resulting from the death last fall of Sen. Winston L. Prouty.

Robert T. Stafford, who had been given an interim appointment to the Senate seat, easily won election to serve the remaining five years of the term. And Richard Mallary won the House seat Stafford had vacated, outpolling his Democratic opponent by 39,762 to 26,789.

Fewer than one-third of the state's registered voters turned out for the election.

$1.90 Held too Low:

They noted that the poverty-line figure of $3,968 for an urban family of four used by the COL council was the figure for 1970, and that the relevant figure for the fourth quarter of 1971 would be about $4,150 or $4,200 after adjustment for the increased living costs.

The Pay Board's recommendation on wage exemptions should have been in the range of $3.35 to $3.70 an hour, the labor members maintained. Their arguments also denounced the COL council's proposal because it was predicated on the assumption that there are "1.7 wage earners" per low- or moderate-income family.

"In the United States, it has always been assumed that the earnings of one wage earner should be sufficient to amply provide for his family," the labor members pointed out.

"This is rooted in American culture and in the social concepts underlying our wage structure."

They also cited the wording of a House committee report on amendments to the law extending the Economic Stabilization Act which directed that the exemptions be made on a personal, not a family earnings basis.

The COL Council already has exempted from wage controls persons making less than the federal minimum wage, or $1.30 for farm workers and $1.60 for others.

The council estimated that the $1.90 ceiling on exemptions would remove 22 percent of American workers from wage controls and that the $3.50 cutoff would exempt 50 percent.

On the UTU contract, Charles Luna, president-emeritus of the union who negotiated the agreement before he retired in December, said Pay Board disapproval would send the UTU back to the negotiating table because the UTU would not implement a modified contract.

Luna and his successor as UTU president, Al H. Chesser, told the board that the UTU had agreed to work rules changes in return for a 42 percent wage increase over 42 months.

It put the Pay Board in the position of jeopardizing the work rules changes that railroads have long sought on the ground that they needed the modifications to compete with the airline and trucking industries.

Luna and Chesser estimated that the work rules changes would mean savings of nearly $750 million for the carriers, and Luna quoted an estimate by the railroads themselves that they would realize at least $400 million in savings.

The presentation to the board was further complicated however, by a railroad management spokesman, William Dempsey, chairman of the National Railway Labor Conference, who said there would be no immediate savings and that the carriers, therefore, would seek a rate hike.

The UTU leaders pointed out that the union's settlement is substantially the same as the contract covering railroad signalmen which the Pay Board has already approved.

In apparent concern about its public image, the Pay Board invited the news media to attend the UTU presentation, but not the board's subsequent deliberations on the contract. It was the first session open to newsmen.

Hotel Union Aids Culinary Training

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The executive board of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes at its winter meeting voted a $25,000 contribution to the Culinary Institute of America, which is training hundreds of Vietnam era veterans in the culinary trades.

The institute was established in 1946 at New Haven, Conn., to train returning World War II veterans. Currently, 25 percent of its enrollment of 1,000 is made up of Vietnam veterans.

Union Pres. Ed S. Miller said the contribution was in recognition of the institute's "demonstrated ability to upgrade the status" of hotel and restaurant workers.

SCHOOL TEACHERS of AFT Local 860 walk a picket line in Yonkers, N.Y., during an eight-day strike that led to improved salaries for the 1,800 members and a reduction in the student-teacher class ratio. The local called the agreement "a great victory" for the teachers and children.

Oregon Labor Urges Democrats To Adopt Health Security Plank

Portland, Ore.—"America needs—and must have—a national health insurance program that provides quality health care for all Americans, that controls escalating costs, that institutes quality standards, that begins the long overdue job of reforming the system, and that is fairly financed and effectively administered."

Oregon AFL-CIO Pres. Edward J. Whelan delivered that message to the Democratic Policy Council's pre-convention health care hearing here, one of four such forums being held across the country to develop a platform plank on health care for the party's national convention next summer.

After outlining the essentials of a national health insurance program, Whelan said that of the four major bills before Congress "only the National Health Security Act," known as the Kennedy-Griffiths bill, fulfills all the goals he outlined.

"The trade union movement is firmly committed to National Health Security," Whelan told the hearing. "We believe that it is financially achievable, administratively possible and badly needed. And we believe National Health Security to be, without question, the best proposal. The labor movement is prepared to take this issue to the people in the elections of 1972, and we will win on this issue."

The state federation president was one of more than 20 witnesses representing consumers, the medical profession, hospitals, the insurance industry, minorities, nurses and other groups who testified in the one-day hearing before a panel chaired by Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock.

"It is significant," said Whelan, "that no responsible group or individual is denying that there are health care problems in America. And it is equally significant that all have proposed federal legislation using federal tax revenues to pay for health care services."

"The public pays now," he pointed out, "and the public will pay—in one manner or another—regardless of what program is adopted." For that reason, he continued, "We should consider the merits of the proposals rather than who will foot the bill."

Whelan examined at length the legislation proposed by the Nixon Administration, the American Medical Association and the insurance companies and said of them: "They would all just pour new money into the present health care delivery system which is a failure."

He said only National Health Security would have the leverage to institute the reforms necessary to provide "the quality health care that is the right of all Americans."

Noting that National Health Security "would cost approximately $56.7 billion in 1974," the Oregon AFL-CIO president said it "would cover 70 percent of personal health expenditures," adding that the 30 percent not covered "includes over-the-counter drugs, custodial nursing homes and psychiatric care and dental care for adults."

Whelan said the cost would be financed by the "tried, proven and accepted method of social security taxes with contributions from employers, employes, the self-employed, and the present level of federal expenditures for Medicare and Medicaid," plus a large federal contribution to match the contributor taxes."

"The trade union movement believes this is a wise expenditure," he continued. "We won't apologize for it or try to make it appear smaller than it really is. Because a cheap health care program would be just that—cheap.

He pointed out that Health Security would not mean an increase in the total amount America would be spending for health care but would change the method in which health care is purchased.

"Dollar for dollar, Health Security is the best value on a cost basis," he noted. "In the long run, it will cost less than the other proposals."

Whelan said that Health Security would "force the health care system to purge itself of inefficiency and waste."

In response to questions by Woodcock and others on the hearing panel, Whelan emphasized that National Health Security would benefit everyone, not just union members.

"America is not going to solve its medical care crisis as long as we have multiple classes of medical care—one for the rich, one for the poor, one for trade union members, another for the elderly, still another for the unorganized workers and so on," he said.

Unions Look for Health Care Gains From Both Bargaining, Legislation

New York—Unions will continue to press through collective bargaining for improvements in health and welfare benefits which cannot be achieved in legislation, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told the American Management Association.

And what cannot be won at the bargaining table, labor will fight for in social legislation, he stressed.

Better wages and fringe benefits, improved and safer working conditions, shorter hours and union security are the objectives of free trade unions the world over, Seidman said.

Whether in Europe or America, unions have similar goals for improving conditions of their members, he said. What labor may have won through negotiated contracts in the United States, unions in European countries got through legislation.

He cited the minimum wage. In the United States, it is set by legislation; European minimums are established in bargaining. Conversely, vacations in Europe are generally covered by legislation, but in the United States through labor-management agreements.

In the future, the major industrial unions of America are likely to stress greater security, both on and off the job, Seidman predicted. Among the fringe benefits they will seek are longer vacations, more holidays, early retirement, portable pensions, supplementary unemployment benefits, improved health plans, child care programs, legal aid and group auto insurance.

However, in the other labor sectors—such as government, service industries and the health industry where wages continue to lag behind the levels in manufacturing—the emphasis will be on the pay envelope, Seideman said.

"We will, of course, continue to seek improvements in fringe benefits' in these sectors, too," he noted, but the priority will be on wages and salaries until they are brought in line with the rest of the economy.

Unions will also continue to bargain for health plan improvements because of the lack of a comprehensive national health care program, Seidman said.

The focus will be on setting up alternative prepaid group practice plans to give workers the opportunity to choose over the traditional fee-for-service plans.

But even group practice plans will not be the complete answer to workers' health care problems, he noted, stressing that "adequate health care for all Americans will come only with the passage of the Health Security Act."

When the program is enacted, he predicted that most of the health care issues will be removed from the bargaining table since Health Security will cover 70 percent of health care needs for workers and their families.

"However, Health Security, at least initially, will not cover adult dental care, extended nursing home and psychiatric care, and some drugs," he noted. "These items will still be subject to collective bargaining."

Tributes Paid Forand, Author Of Medicare

America's workers—and millions of retired workers—mourned the death of Aime J. Forand at the age of 76.

The former Rhode Island congressman was described by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "a first rate public servant, the pioneer sponsor of Medicare, which has brought hope and dignity to the lives of millions of Americans."

Forand was the original sponsor of the Medicare bill in 1957, and after his retirement from Congress in 1960 he became first chairman of the National Council of Senior Citizens—the group which shared with the labor movement the leadership in the successful campaign for passage of the legislation.

Forand, who went to work as a mill hand at the age of 14 to help support a blind father and his family, served 22 years in Congress and was the second-ranking member of the House Ways & Means Committee at the time of his retirement.

Congress and the Election

THIS ISSUE of the News contains a special supplement on the voting record of the first session of the 92nd Congress. The members of the House and Senate are judged on key issues selected by the AFL-CIO in terms of the broadest possible national interest.

The voting records of the first session set the framework for the congressional approach in election year 1972; there is a great deal of unfinished business and a great many critical issues that require decisive action.

The first session was marked by sharp conflict between Congress and the White House, a point underscored by the comments of AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller in the voting record supplement. He writes:

"No tally of votes can accurately portray the behind-the-scenes exercise of raw political power by this Administration. In the pursuit of his own narrow legislative goals, Pres. Nixon attacked, threatened and vetoed progressive measures. . . . Indeed, at nearly every turn, the White House sought to blur the constitutionally-defined system of checks and balances while attempting to force the Congress away from pressing social and human concerns."

COPE Director Alexander Barkan writes that the voting records "are of great significance, for they measure the degree of commitment of senators and congressmen to the welfare of the nation and its people at a time when the national administration's concern for these matters has been absent or misdirected."

THE 1972 ELECTION campaigns, with major attention focused on the presidency, will not relieve Congress of its responsibility to enact legislation in a score of areas where the need is urgent, where social justice and economic progress demand solutions.

Among those needs are quality medical care for all Americans; a minimum wage above the poverty level for all workers; equal employment opportunities for every citizen; reform in welfare programs to insure the poor the right to a decent standard of living; improved social security benefits for America's senior citizens; adequate funding for all levels of education; federal protections for consumers and the environment; a bill of rights for federal workers, a national uniform voter registration law and effective limitations on campaign spending.

And there is foremost the pernicious problem of unemployment and the need for legislation and programs that will help produce jobs for all Americans.

The key votes of the first session plus the votes cast during 1972 will be the record on which senators and representatives will face the people in November. It is important that these voting records be made widely known so that in the upcoming campaigns the voters will be able to make an intelligent choice based on the facts of performance rather than high-blown rhetoric.

The key votes in the second session will be shaped to a large extent on how Congress confronts the Administration and its narrow, limited, self-serving views of a nation facing difficult problems and choices.

Declassification of Documents Presents Ticklish Side Effects

By John P. Roche

READERS OF THIS COLUMN will not, I trust, suspect me of a blind devotion to the government's classification practices. Most materials dealing with foreign policy and defense are—as I have pointed out on several occasions—absurdly overclassified. Ironically, I don't think this is done from a great passion for secrecy.

On the contrary, it is a way of attracting attention to a memo: what high official would bother to read a document merely stamped "Confidential?" The "Confidential" stuff is for the peasants, but if you sock it "Top Secret" in large red letters, you get a guaranteed high-level audience.

Moreover, unjustified classification can create definite problems for the government itself. One of the crucial proofs of Hanoi's involvement in the South back in 1964-65 was a mass of intercepted messages going from North Vietnamese military headquarters to its units in the South. They were not even coded, but were in clear, i.e., in Vietnamese.

Yet, when the time came to make the case to the American people, these intercepts could not be broken loose and declassified. The same rule was applied to the intercepts, also in clear, which provided the background for the Tonkin Gulf Resolution and indicated hostile intentions on the part of the North Vietnamese Navy.

Obviously, if obtaining this information had involved breaking some sophisticated codes (as was done with the Japanese in World War II), no reference should have been made to the material. But unless you believe the North Vietnamese to be a nation of idiots—which they clearly are not—you start with the premise that they know we have our receivers tuned in to their transmissions. And when the latter are in clear, they would assume we have someone around who can do a translation.

However, the legitimate struggle against overclassification has its limits. And, without attempting to draw any clear line in a very tricky area, these limits have been passed when policy discussions in the Situation Room are, in effect, played on the radio.

Not necessarily because these transcripts endanger national security in the technical sense, but rather because the knowledge that everything said may be leaked will have an appalling, chilling effect, that is, it will inhibit any hard-hitting, candid dissenters.

I spent a good deal of my two years in the White House, for example, in fundamental, often pungent dissent from the way the Vietnamese War was being fought. I was not a "dove": I believed in our commitment, but was convinced that the military leaders were unwilling to shape a "long-haul, low-cost" strategy, that they despised the whole concept of limited war.

Above all, I objected to the "Americanization" of the war. I am not here arguing the merits of my position. The military had a good point when they said that the political restraints were enough to prevent them from winning their kind of war, but insufficient to provide an effective alternative strategy.

FOR TWO YEARS, I presented this pessimistic message in the closed councils of the Administration, bluntly, forcefully, and in great detail.

It was not an adversary proceeding in the usual sense: I had no illusions of infallibility and neither did such friends and colleagues as Walt Rostow, William P. Bundy or Harry McPherson. We would sit down, informally, and argue whether, say, there was anything we could do to develop a democratic political party system in South Vietnam. The President was, of course, aware of this and encouraged it.

One published transcript of such a free ranging, no-holds-barred discussion would have blown the whole enterprise sky high, and I can't see how it would have enhanced the "people's right to know."

The net consequence, in fact, would have been a retreat to the formal process of passing sterile papers back and forth, papers which the authors had prepared with a view to keeping their records clean rather than raising hard, controversial questions. Can one imagine a better prescription for bureaucratic paralysis?

The 92nd Congress —A Report

By Andrew J. Biemiller
Director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation

THE ADMINISTRATION'S abject lack of concern for the needs of the American people while in pursuit of its own narrow political goals provoked sharp confrontations between Congress and the White House in 1971. These frequent clashes roadblocked the progress of important social legislation while leaving unchecked the nation's number one problem of unemployment.

Congressional efforts to stimulate the economy by creating jobs for unemployed Americans was met with Administration indifference and opposition. The Public Service Jobs Bill, which in labor's opinion was the best legislation passed by Congress in 1971, was finally signed by the President six months after he vetoed a similar measure. However, one week earlier, the President vetoed a $2 billion job-creating public works program, claiming it unnecessary in view of the success of his economic "game plan."

Barely one month later, the President admitted the failure of his game plan by completely reversing the direction of his economic policies. Using powers he had previously condemned, the President imposed a one-sided wage-price freeze patently discriminatory against workers and consumers.

AT LABOR'S INSISTENCE, Congress acted to correct some of the gross inequities inherent in the President's stabilization program. Over White House opposition, Congress recognized the validity of collective bargaining agreements abrogated by the freeze and ordered the retroactive payment of wages lost during the freeze period. Credit controls, exemption of low-wage workers and consumer suits were also added by Congress to the President's stabilization program.

Accompanying the President's wage-price freeze was a legislative package proposing gigantic tax breaks for big business amounting to $88 billion over a 10-year period. Although offering little to individuals in the way of tax relief, the President's gimmick-laden tax package was passed by Congress with few changes. However, after first going along with an Administration plan to finance this tax giveaway by postponing a scheduled pay raise for federal employes, Congress reversed its course and provided justice for these workers.

REACHING FOR the political support of the far-right wing of his party, the President vetoed a comprehensive anti-poverty bill including child care, legal services for the poor and an extension of the poverty program.

Republicans, acting with White House support, turned back Democratic efforts in the House to increase educational funding and allied with Southern Democrats to beat down legislation aimed at ending discrimination in employment.

The Administration also backed unsuccessful efforts by House Republicans to bar food stamps to strikers, block extension of unemployment benefits for the long-term unemployed, cripple the proposed Consumer Protection Agency and weaken election reform legislation.

For the third consecutive year controversies developed over Pres. Nixon's nominations for key positions. Continuing his effort to pack the Supreme Court with ultra-rightists, the President nominated William Rehnquist, whose philosophy can best be described as anti-Bill of Rights. Strengthening his ties with the agribusiness community, the President nominated Dr. Earl Butz, an opponent of the family farm and consumer interests, to be Secretary of Agriculture. Regretably, both nominations were confirmed after bitter fights.

Despite Administration and conservative Republican efforts to the contrary, the House and Senate both reaffirmed labor's right to participate in political activity: the House codified existing court decisions on labor's role in politics, while the Senate rejected the baldly anti-labor attempt by conservatives to keep unions from informing their members on political issues.

NO TALLY of votes can accurately portray the behind-the-scenes exercise of raw political power by this Administration. In the pursuit of his own narrow legislative goals, Pres. Nixon attacked, threatened and vetoed progressive measures. When these failed, the President blatantly ignored the will of the Congress by withholding $12.8 billion of appropriated funds to parcel out according to his political whims in the 1972 campaign. Indeed, at nearly every turn, the White House sought to blur the constitutionally-defined system of checks and balances while attempting to force the Congress away from pressing social and human concerns.

Congress must oppose these efforts of the Executive Branch just as it must actively tackle the major problem facing America—unemployment. The Nixon Administration has proven itself incapable of handling the economy. Therefore it will be up to the Congress in 1972 to put Americans back to work and to restore equity, fairness and justice as the goals of American society.

By Alexander E. Barkan
Director, AFL-CIO COPE

THE NAME of Richard Nixon is conspicuously absent from the following pages. His record shows up only by implication—in the form of bills he vetoed, those he proposed or opposed, good bills weakened by his congressional lieutenants at his behest or bad ones made worse at his bidding.

So, though his name doesn't appear, Pres. Nixon is very much present in these pages.

These voting records, therefore, are strongly related to the presidential election next November. But their importance goes beyond that. In their own right, they are of great significance, for they measure the degree of commitment of senators and congressmen to the welfare of the nation and its people at a time when the national administration's concern for these matters has been absent or misdirected.

THE ISSUES deal with jobs when jobs—providing enough of them for an expanding workforce—have become a major national problem, as unemployment soared under Nixon to 10-year highs.

They deal with the rights of workers, through their unions, to participate in politics; with human rights and the rights of young Americans to a decent education; with workers' rights to have their contracts honored; with child care and consumer protection and fairer taxes.

They are a record of the major legislative history of 1971 and of the role of individual congressmen and senators in it. Too, they are a direction-sign, pointing out senators and representatives deserving of working people's support and those who have earned opposition in the November elections.

These elections—for the House and Senate—will tend to be obscured by the larger, more dramatic, presidential contest. But this is too bad, for the record of any president is largely influenced by the kind of Congress he has to deal with. Give an anti-worker president a pro-worker Congress and at least you come out close to even. Similarly, a pro-worker president can protect working people from an anti-worker Congress.

But provide any president—good or bad—with a Congress controlled comfortably by his own party, and his legislative proposals have clear sailing. This hasn't happened since the 1965-66 Congress following Lyndon Johnson's landslide 1964 presidential victory. It was a memorable Congress and produced more for the American people than any other on record.

THESE ARE the reasons the congressional and senatorial elections are so important. Less dramatic, perhaps, than the presidential contest, they bear almost equally on the welfare of the nation in the years ahead.

The responsibility of unions and their members, consequently, is to wage a two-front battle for progress, with our energy and our COPE programs aimed at electing good congressmen and senators as well as a friendly president.

The AFL-CIO has set as its primary political goal in 1972 the defeat of Richard Nixon's bid for re-election. But to achieve only this would be half a win. We must strive, as well, to elect a friendly Congress which can work with a progressive president to meet the mounting problems that confront our nation.

In this task, these voting records should help tremendously.

The next three pages carry labor's report card on the first session of the 92nd Congress.

Congressmen and senators have been judged on 12 key issues—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation.

Alongside the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and why it was important to the labor movement and the nation.

A congressman or senator may claim he supported labor's position because he voted for final passage of a bill. But in many cases, the key vote was on an amendment that would have seriously weakened or greatly improved the bill. The votes used here are those considered most significant.

How Your Repre

1. Funds for SST

Thousands of aerospace workers faced layoffs when the House voted against appropriating funds to continue development of an American-built supersonic airliner. The AFL-CIO supported funding for the SST as vital to the preservation of the nation's leadership in aircraft manufacturing as well as essential to the economy.

On Mar. 18, 1971, the House voted 216-203 for an amendment cutting off SST funds.

For—wrong. Against—right.

2. Accelerated Public Works

Despite continued high unemployment, the Administration opposed a $2 billion accelerated public works program aimed at providing 170,000 jobs and needed facilities in communities with heavy joblessness.

Administration supporters in the House attempted to kill the bill by offering a motion to send it back to committee with instructions to eliminate the accelerated public works program.

On Apr. 22, 1971, the effort to kill accelerated public works was defeated 128-262.

For—wrong. Against—right.

3. Public Service Jobs

As one means of improving the economy, the AFL-CIO strongly supported congressional efforts to enact a public service employment program providing jobs for the unemployed in the public sector. The Administration opposed this approach to reducing unemployment as the President had vetoed similar legislation in 1970.

In an effort to defeat this legislation, the Administration supported a substitute bill that would have scuttled existing manpower programs and replaced them with a revenue-sharing proposal.

On June 2, 1971, the Administration-backed substitute was defeated in the House by a vote of 182-204.

For—wrong. Against—right.

4. Lockheed Loan Guarantee

With over 72,000 jobs at stake, the AFL-CIO supported passage of a bill providing a federal guarantee for a $250 million loan to the Lockheed Aircraft Corp.

Under the terms of the bill, the loan was to be made by private banks. There would be no cost to the government unless Lockheed went bankrupt. In that case, the government would have priority over other creditors on the company's assets.

The bill passed the House on July 30, 1971, by a 192-189 vote.

For—right. Against—wrong.

5. Unemployment Compensation Extension

Late in the session, Congress approved a 13-week extension of unemployment compensation benefits for an estimated 538,000 workers who had exhausted basic and extended unemployment compensation.

This temporary program, starting in February, provides aid to workers who are the victims of long-term unemployment in states with the highest jobless rates.

The emergency program was included as part of a conference report approved by the House on Dec. 15, 1971, by a 194-149 vote.

For—right. Against—wrong.

6. Federal Pay Raise

Although federal employes were scheduled to receive a comparability salary increase on Jan. 1, 1972, the President, as part of his "wage freeze," attempted to defer this increase until July 1, 1972.

The House by a 174-207 vote on Oct. 4, 1971, failed to pass a resolution that would have overturned the President's postponement of catch-up pay for federal employes.

7. Wage Retroactivity

Legislation extending the President's wage-price control authority cleared the House Banking Committee with a provision permitting back pay for most wage increases that were due during the Phase 1 freeze. The bill was crippled on the House floor when an amendment sponsored by Rep. Stephens (D-Ga.) was approved. The Stephens amendment limited back pay to those cases where an employer had already raised prices to cover the increase, and thereby ruled out most retroactive pay boosts. The damage was later repaired in House-Senate conference.

On Dec. 10, 1971, the House adopted the Stephens amendment by a 209-151 vote.

8. Food for Strikers

Striking workers and their families have always been entitled to food stamps as long as they met other eligibility requirements under the program. During House action on an agricultural appropriation bill, Rep. Michel (R-Ill.) attempted to deny food stamps to strikers and their families. The Michel amendment was defeated on June 23, 1971, by a 172-225 vote.

For—wrong. Against—right.

9. Federal School Funds

Administration budget cuts in aid to education played a major role in the financial crisis facing the nation's schools. Rep. Hathaway (D-Me.) attempted to increase federal funding of school programs by approximately 15 percent during House action on the education appropriation bill. The Hathaway amendment, supported by organized labor and education groups, was narrowly defeated, 188-191, on Apr. 7, 1971.

For—right. Against—wrong.

10. Enforcing Equal Employment

The AFL-CIO and civil rights groups strongly supported legislation giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the enforcement power necessary to stop illegal job discrimination. Business groups and the Administration, however, backed a weak substitute that denied enforcement power to EEOC and limited action to court suits.

The House voted, 202-197, against effective enforcement and for the substitute bill on Sept. 16, 1971.

11. Election Reform

During House consideration of campaign reform legislation, Rep. Hansen (R-Ida.) offered an amendment clarifying court rulings on union political activities. The amendment made it clear that organized labor has the right to spend funds from dues income to communicate with members and conduct non-partisan registration and get-out-the-vote drives aimed at members and their families.

Passage of the Hansen amendment blocked an announced effort by Rep. Crane (R-Ill.) to offer an amendment severely limiting labor's political rights.

On Nov. 30, 1971, the House approved the Hansen amendment by a vote of 233-147.

For—right. Against—wrong.

12. Child Care

The need for decent day care for the children of America's millions of working women was recognized by both the House and Senate. As reported by a conference committee, the new bill provided voluntary comprehensive day care services with a fee schedule based on ability-to-pay. Despite all-out Administration opposition, the House approved the badly needed new day care program, by a 211-187 vote on Dec. 7, 1971. The President then vetoed the measure and the Senate failed to override.

For—right. Against—wrong.

How Your Senators Voted

1. SST Funds

The Senate refused to appropriate funds for the development of a supersonic transport airplane. The AFL-CIO supported funding for the SST in order to revive a depressed aerospace industry and its dwindling work force. The Senate rejected the measure on Mar. 24, 1971 by a 46-51 vote. For—right. Against—wrong.

2. Public Service Jobs

As one means of improving the economy, the AFL-CIO strongly supported congressional efforts to enact a public service employment program providing jobs for the unemployed in the public sector. The Administration opposed this approach to reducing unemployment as the President had vetoed similar legislation in 1970.

The opposition took form in a motion by Sen. Prouty (R-Vt.) which would have in effect killed the measure by recommitting the bill. The motion was defeated by a 29-44 vote on Apr. 1, 1971. For—wrong. Against—right.

3. Public Works Veto

Despite continued high unemployment, the Administration opposed a $2 billion accelerated public works program aimed at providing 170,000 jobs and needed facilities in communities with heavy joblessness. Senate efforts to override the Presidential veto on the accelerated public works bill fell five votes short of the necessary two-thirds majority in a 57-36 vote on July 14, 1971. For overriding—right. Against—wrong.

4. Lockheed Jobs

Some 72,000 jobs were saved by a bill providing federal guarantees on bank loans of $250 million to Lockheed Aircraft Corp. The loan guarantee was narrowly approved on Aug. 2, 1971 by a 49-48 vote. For—right. Against—wrong.

5. Filibuster Rule

The Senate again failed to muster a two-thirds vote to stop a filibuster that has prevented action on a motion to change the Senate rules so that it would only require a three-fifths vote to limit debate and break a filibuster. The majority for invoking cloture and bringing the rules reform to a vote was 55-39 on Mar. 9. This was eight short of a two-thirds vote. For rules reform—right. Against—wrong.

6. Meat Inspection

An attempt by Sen. Mathias (R-Md.) to weaken existing federal meat inspection laws by exempting meat products that cross state lines from federal inspection was rejected by the Senate on July 29, 1971 by a 38-52 vote. If passed, this proposal would have left inspection in the hands of weaker state inspection agencies. For—wrong. Against—right.

7. Tax Reform

An amendment to the President's tax legislation by Sen. Bayh (D-Ind.) attempted to reduce from 20% to 5% the accelerated depreciation tax write-off for big business and provide instead a one-year tax credit of $25 each to individual taxpayers. The Bayh amendment was narrowly defeated on Nov. 15, 1971 by a 39-40 vote. For—right. Against—wrong.

8. Anti-COPE

Carrying the cudgel for the National Right to Work Committee, Sen. Fannin (R-Ariz.) introduced an amendment to deny tax exempt status to any labor organization with a union shop agreement which used any of its income to support or oppose a political candidate. The proposal was rejected Nov. 19, 1971 by a 31-61 vote. For—wrong. Against—right.

9. Campaign Financing

By providing for the federal financing of presidential campaign costs the excessive influence of big money on our political system would be effectively reduced. A proposal to this effect was introduced by Sen. Pastore (D-R.I.) as an amendement to the tax law. It would allow taxpayers to voluntarily earmark one dollar of their federal taxes to the presidential campaign of their choice. Although approved by the Senate on Nov. 22, 1971 by a 52-47 vote, the checkoff provision will not take effect until after the 1972 elections. For—right. Against—wrong.

10. Butz Nomination

Planning to plow under the family farm, the President nominated Dr. Earl Butz to Secretary of Agriculture. Butz, a leading spokesman for agribusiness, foe of food stamps and consumers, was opposed by the AFL-CIO and most farm groups. He was approved on Dec. 2, 1971 by a 51-44 vote. For—wrong. Against—right.

11. Rehnquist Nomination

Continuing his pursuit of an ultra-conservative Supreme Court, Pres. Nixon nominated William H. Rehnquist to fill a vacancy. Rehnquist's unswerving opposition to civil rights and the Bill of Rights marked him as an extremist. A liberal, labor, civil rights coalition opposed his nomination. The nomination however was approved by the Senate Dec. 10, 1971 by a 68-26 vote. For—wrong. Against—right.

12. Child Care Veto

Congressional legislation containing a two-year extension of the Office of Economic Opportunity, a separate legal services corporation, and a comprehensive child development program providing voluntary day care services for children of working and welfare mothers was vetoed by Pres. Nixon. The Senate sought to override the veto on Dec. 10, 1971 but fell short of a two-thirds majority with a 51-36 vote. For overriding—right. Against—wrong.

'Full Employment' Farce:

Nixon's Outlook for Fiscal '73 Set Against Past 'Disasters'

The following column by Hobart Rowen, economic analyst for the Washington Post, appeared in the Jan. 16, 1972 edition of the Post.

A YEAR AGO at this time, Pres. Nixon forecast that the federal budget deficit for fiscal 1972 would shrink to $11.6 billion from the $18.6 billion then estimated as fiscal 1971's red ink total.

Moreover, under the "full employment budget idea (which) is in the nature of a self-fulfilling prophecy," the President promised that 1972 would see a turn toward steady economic growth. On the full employment basis, the budget would be balanced.

As the government cranks up its machinery to announce the fiscal 1973 budget figures, it might be well to observe that the predictions and forecasts of past years were nothing short of disaster.

● The forecast for the fiscal 1971 deficit delivered only six months before the end of the year on June 30th was way off. It actually turned out to be $23.0 billion, not $18.6 billion.

● The $11.6 billion deficit originally forecast for fiscal 1972 (the current year) has swollen almost beyond belief. Last July, the Administration officially boosted the deficit guess to $18.6 billion. The informed word in Washington at the moment is that the deficit is in the neighborhood of $35 billion.

● Instead of the almost exact balance at full employment ($100 million surplus) estimated for fiscal 1972, there will be a deficit. Private analysts guess that it is running about $8 billion.

● There has been some growth in expenditures to explain the deepening red ink; but by far, the gap between Nixon's hopes of last year and the real world was created by a sluggish economy; instead of the $1,065 billion Gross National Product predicted for 1971, the total will be only about $1,047 billion.

● Personal income for calendar 1971 was estimated at $868 billion; apparently it will be down $10 billion to around $858 billion. And corporate profits, which had been stitched into the budget at a dream-world $98 billion, will probably be only $85 to $86 billion.

The lesson of all this is clear: the Administration's forthcoming budget projections, judging from its track record, should be received with a great big yawn.

It's difficult, to be sure, to look 18 months down the road and come up with precisely accurate forecasts. But the task is compounded when an administration kids itself and the public, as Mr. Nixon's did last year with the ridiculous $1,065 billion GNP guess that everyone else knew was too high.

More than that, the Administration painted its proposed budget last year as expansionary, simply because the projected outlays were about $16.5 billion higher than in fiscal 1971.

But as was pointed out here and elsewhere at the time, the budget plan was nowhere near as stimulative as the Administration had said. The deficit (unified basis) was scheduled to drop from $18.6 to $11.6 billion. On the "national income accounts" basis, which many economists think is the best way to view the impact of the government on the economy, the budget called for a change from a $15 billion deficit in fiscal 1971 to only $4.2 billion in 1972. That is hardly expansionary.

THE WAY THINGS developed, of course, the weak economy in 1971 produced not only a bigger deficit (the $35 billion estimate compared with $23 billion), but even saw the government run a full employment deficit—something Mr. Nixon said last January should "never" be allowed "except in emergency conditions."

Now, the Administration is again trumpeting the prospect of ". . . a responsible budget for the fiscal year 1973, a budget that is expansive but which would come into balance if we were at full employment." (George Shultz at the National Press Club last week.)

But moving from a budget that has a full employment deficit this year to one that is in balance or in surplus next year on the same basis would actually be a policy or restraint—depressing the economy at a time when all of the forecasters are predicting continued high unemployment.

Nixon budget policy, moreover, comes perilously close to meaningless mumbo-jumbo when you consider that the very tricky full employment concept is keyed to what happens or would happen if unemployment were no worse than 4 percent.

Yet, the Administration has no hope or plan to get to 4 percent unemployment in fiscal 1973, and the current intention is to state no unemployment target for calendar 1972 in the Economic Report or the Budget. This is responsible?

'Hoax' on Workers:

Protections of Job Safety Law Sidetracked by 'Go-Slow' Policy

THE ADMINISTRATION'S "go-slow attitude" in implementing the new federal occupational safety and health law is turning this long-sought protection into a "hoax" on workers, AFL-CIO job safety expert, George H. R. Taylor charged.

"Our greatest disappointment lies" in the Secretary of Labor's broad use of discretionary powers to "soften the impact of the law on management," declared Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health. He warned that state laws now under consideration can, if not tightly drawn, further blunt the thrust toward curbing job-related injuries, illnesses and deaths.

He made the statements on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview Labor News Conference, broadcast Tuesdays on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Stressing that the Secretary of Labor has failed to provide "guidance . . . for state legislation" that can lead to return of jurisdiction pre-empted by the federal law, Taylor said the AFL-CIO has shaped a model state statute that fulfills the intent of Congress when it adopted the Occupation Safety & Health Act in 1970.

He said that state federations and international unions are using the model law "as a yardstick to measure" the effectiveness of plans submitted to state legislatures.

Taylor, who is also an economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, scored the failure of the Administration to ask for the kind of budget needed to put the new law into effective operation.

He pointed out that although 4.1 million workplaces across the country are covered by the act, the enforcement force now consists of only "approximately 350 compliance officers and 14 industrial hygienists." He added that the Administration's "freeze policy has slowed hiring" to the point that it's doubtful they'll have even the 500 compliance officers the limited budget permits.

"With that small a staff . . . it would take 20 or 30 years for each and every one of the 4.1 million workplaces to be inspected," he asserted. He said that despite the report of health or safety violations in 80 percent of the plants inspected during the first six months of the new law, there is slight chance that the White House will push for substantial increase of personnel in the Occupational Safety & Health Administration budget this year.

Reporters questioning Taylor were Felix Belair of the New York Times and Donald Barnes of Air & Water Newsletter.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE NIXON ADMINISTRATION for more than a year has been flirting with a new form of taxation which ideally lends itself to Madison Avenue gimmickry.

It may be called an "education tax" or a "peace tax" or something equally wonderful, but the damage that such a tax will wreak on lower and middle income taxpayers is anything but wonderful.

The tax is a form of a national sales tax. In Europe, where it is used, it is called Value Added Tax (VAT). It derives its name from the fact that hidden taxes are added to all goods at each stage of production or distribution.

Since low and middle income groups pay far more of their income for goods and services than do the wealthy, this regressive form of taxation hits these groups more severely.

It countervenes the progressive income tax which was enacted in this country so that each taxpayer would pay his own fair share of his income in taxes.

As the years have passed, we have seen more and more taxes being heaped on the lower income citizen and the workingman so that today he is paying far more than his fair share.

A frequently-cited 1968 study, for example, disclosed that a family with a $5,000 annual income paid about the same percentage of its income to the government as the family earning $50,000—about one third—via one tax or another.

A study by the Commerce Clearing House, just released, shows that regressive state sales taxes still lead all other tax revenue measures in bringing in tax dollars. Sales taxes and gross receipts taxes were the largest source of state revenue in 33 states in fiscal 1971.

The opportunity for the Nixon Administration to push for more hidden sales taxes is being provided by the courts, which are declaring the property tax discriminates in financing education. This tax has been a prime source of education revenues since the 18th Century. Under this system, wealthier areas have been able to provide better education than the poorer areas. This defeats the concept of equal education.

Rather than advocating a progressive form of taxation to meet this situation, the Administration may take the route of the hidden national sales tax or VAT.

The word is already being passed around that the Administration may push VAT as an education tax, and to take some of the pain out of it, food and medicines may be exempted from coverage. No matter how it is dressed up, though, it is crushingly regressive.

IT IS IRONICAL that the VAT should suddenly emerge as a possibility at the very time the Administration says it is seeking economic stability and controls on prices. Yet, VAT means higher prices for essential items with the increases hidden.

It may well be that VAT makes some sense in a country such as France where the citizens have been notorious tax evaders. There is no way a Frenchman can get out of paying VAT, and he really doesn't know how much he is paying.

In this country, though, our citizens do pay their taxes. Tax dodgers are usually the wealthy who legally can find loopholes. Most other citizens pay their income tax and all other taxes.

And they are pretty tired of reading about the loopholes in our tax laws which benefit the wealthy and the shifting of some $80 billion in taxes from corporations and the well-heeled to the low- and middle-income groups under recent Nixon economic programs.

Rather than load down the lower income taxpayer with new and hidden taxes through VAT, many economists think that there should be a general overhaul of federal, state and local tax systems to achieve a genuine progressive foundation.

PROMISED PROTECTIONS of the federal job safety law are being turned into a hoax by the Nixon Administration's "go-slow attitude" on enforcement, AFL-CIO job safety specialist George H.R. Taylor charged on Labor News Conference. Taylor, center, was questioned by Felix Belair, left, of the New York Times and Donald Barnes of the Air & Water Newsletter. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

City Family's Moderate Budget Estimated at $11,292 a Year

By Sidney Margolius

THE BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS wants to discontinue its compilations of standard family budgets for city workers, and has withheld the updated budget which was scheduled for release in December.

In justifying the blackout of this information published since 1946, BLS Commissioner Geoffrey Moore argued that there is no way the government can determine how much income a family needs.

Of course there is a way. It's the way the government has used right along—by making surveys and getting expert guidance to see what ordinary people and budget experts both consider is a moderate but self-respecting American standard of living.

The living standards that the BLS used have been modest enough. The so-called "intermediate" budget, for example, is based on such moderate standards as a five or six-room apartment or house for a family of four; the purchase of a two-year-old used car every four years; an economical food allowance that provides, for example, 17½ pounds of meat, poultry and fish for the four persons; a clothing budget that allows Mama a new coat or car jacket every other year; and so on.

The so-called "lower" budget is even more modest. It calls for a weekly 11¼ pounds of meat, etc.; the purchase of a six-year-old car which is kept four years; Mama must wait almost three years for a new coat. Another saving is achieved by reducing recreational expenditures almost to the minimum of using mainly free recreation and library facilities and eliminating all out-of-town transportation on public vehicles.

But even these moderate budgets have proved embarrassing to employers and the government because they cost far more than most working people earn. By the spring of 1970, which was the last period for which the BLS revealed the costs, the intermediate budget for a family of four cost $10,664 a year including taxes ($889 a month), and the lower budget, $6,960 a year ($580 a month).

In contrast, the average worker earned at that time approximately $120 a week or $6,250 a year, not enough to afford even the lower "bare bones" budget.

Since the BLS refuses to release its own latest costs for these budgets, we've brought them up to date ourselves. Our revision is only an estimate, achieved by increasing the amounts for the major categories of expenses by the inflation in these categories since 1970.

But while these estimates are not as precise as the withheld BLS figures would have been, they are reasonably accurate within a leeway of $100 a year. If the BLS has any objections to these estimates, we invite them to finally make public their own.

These updated figures show that by the close of 1971, the basic costs of the intermediate budget has risen to $771 a month, and the lower budget to $521. Adding an estimate for typical taxes in these brackets, the total annual cost for the intermediate budget now is approximately $11,300 a year, or $217 a week, and the lower budget, about $7,500 or $144.50 a week.

In contrast, the average production worker currently is earning approximately $130 a week or $6,750 a year, if he works all year.

THE INCREASE in the cost of these budgets has been steady and sharp. In 1969 the intermediate budget cost about $10,000 a year, and the lower budget, $6,500. In 1967, the moderate budget cost $9,250 and the lower one, $6,000.

Thus, the cost of the intermediate standard of living has gone up about $2,000 in four and a half years. In 1967 the average production worker, with earnings of $101 a week, earned $77 a week less than the intermediate budget and $14 less than the lower budget. Now, even with higher gross wages (before taxes), he is $87 and $15 away respectively.

Costs usually are even higher than average in Honolulu, the New York City area, Boston, Hartford, San Francisco-Oakland, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Seattle and Minneapolis, and a little higher in Philadelphia.

Costs are usually about average in Chicago, Los Angeles, St. Louis, and Detroit, and lower than average in Pittsburgh, Baltimore and most cities of the Midwest, South and Southwest.

What about families of other sizes? For a young three-person family with one child under six, the same budget would cost 62 percent of the cost for the family with two, school-age children, or $484 a month for the basic expenses in the intermediate budget (not including taxes) and $323 for the lower budget.

A family with three children under 16 would need 116 percent of the four-person costs, or $920 and $604 a month for the basic costs, excluding taxes.

BLATANT MANIPULATION of news media at the AFL-CIO convention got Pres. Nixon the headlines he wanted, but it will hurt him in the long run, Federation Public Relations Director Albert J. Zack told the League for Industrial Democracy in New York. Labor suffers not so much from distorted stories as it does from the lack of adequate news coverage, he added.

Billions Wasted:

FDA Pushes Study Of Ineffective Drugs

LAST YEAR AMERICANS spent more than $2.5 billion for over-the-counter drugs—everything from aspirin to sunburn lotion.

The federal government estimates that these non-prescription drug products number from 100,000 to 500,000. The Food & Drug Administration says very few of the products have been individually approved for marketing and scientific studies show many are ineffective—they don't do what the label promises.

That means Americans are throwing away billions of dollars each year on worthless preparations. The economic waste is enormous but, the FDA says, there is a public health problem, too.

Many Americans treat symptoms of serious diseases with OTC preparations and never visit a physician until it is too late. There is also evidence that large numbers of people are adversely affected by some of the products.

Until now, the FDA has concentrated its "limited resources" where it believed the "greater potential for harm" was—ineffective prescription drugs.

Now, FDA Commissioner Charles C. Edwards says the agency is prepared to look at the tens of thousands of non-prescription preparations and eliminate the ineffective ones from the marketplace.

The commissioner has rejected a product-by-product survey as too costly and time consuming. Instead he proposes that all OTC drugs be classified in some 26 categories—antacids, laxatives, dandruff preparations, mouth washes, sleeping aids, cold remedies, etc.

A scientific panel will prepare a description of each product group. An OTC drug will have to conform to that scientific description in order to be marketed. If it varies, the manufacturer will have to apply to the FDA for an approval of his product as a new drug.

Edwards says it will take no more than three years to complete all 26 "studies." The rules then provide for lengthy agency and court review. But in the end, the FDA says, manufacturers who market ineffective drugs will be subject to fines, imprisonment, and seizure of shipments.

The National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council reviewed more than 400 OTC drugs in a study which was released in 1969. The study, done for the FDA, found that 75 percent of the preparations could not be proven effective.

EDWARDS TESTIFIED last May before the Senate subcommittee on Monopoly that all tranquilizers and sedatives being sold without a prescription were ineffective.

The subcommittee also heard testimony from Dr. Anthony Kalis, who said a study he had done using Sominex as a prototype drug for all similar products showed it to be ineffective. Another study completed by Dr. Carl Rickles for the National Institute of Mental Health found another sedative—Compoz—ineffective.

Despite this evidence, the FDA has only three legal cases pending against ineffective OTC drugs. They have charged that Zerak Alcohol Acne-Gel, Asper-Sleep and Excedrin PM are not generally recognized as safe and effective and are mislabeled.

In the case of Asper-Sleep, they have won a court action requiring the drug to be approved before marketing.

But now that FDA has proposed these new regulations it has asked that the courts take no action against the products—including Asper-Sleep—until the studies are completed. All three continue to be sold.

Soup to Nonsense:

Kids Are Joy, Sorrow, Giggles . . . And Too Soon, Grown Up

By Jane Goodsell

BRINGING UP CHILDREN is funny and sad, heartwarming and heartbreaking, lively and dull, exhilarating and exasperating. And very expensive. It is, as a sage once observed about sex, better than some things and worse than others, but there is nothing else quite like it.

Parenthood is 2 a.m. bottles, dirty diapers and first smiles. It is crying spells and gurgles, toidy seats and teddy bears, pat-a-cake and chopped carrots, first steps and first words and no-no-mustn't-touch.

It is cookie crumbs on the carpet, baby sitters who forgot to show up, ice cream and birthday cakes and kissing-to-make-it-well. It is fist beating furies, heart-melting hugs, 102-degree fevers at four in the morning and hundreds of thousands (or anyway, it seems like it) peanut butter sandwiches.

It is boy-girl parties, acne lotions, eyelash curlers, rock albums, orthodontist appointments, algebra and four-letter words at the dinner table.

Parenthood is teaching them to drive and arguing about allowances. It is coping with mononucleosis and after-school jobs and flunked exams. It is worrying as they fall in and out of love, and living with them through high moments of triumph and bleak interludes of despair.

And suddenly, all to suddenly, it is the realization that it is almost over and the children aren't children anymore. Overnight, or so it seems, they have grown up enough to leave home—to go to college or into the Army and to move into apartments of their own.

Nixon Message Held Devoid of Substance

They've heard "enough promises," Meany declared. Now, "they need action—action that will help them, not just increase the profits of their employers."

Nixon's report on his stewardship conceded that unemployment is too high. But it said the nation can "look with confidence to 1972 as the year when the back of inflation will finally be broken."

The President's otherwise bland message reinforced fears that the Administration will press for a form of national sales tax to make up for the revenue loss resulting from tax cuts and giveaways to large corporations.

The sugar-coating would apparently be a large-scale revenue-sharing plan to finance elementary and high schools.

Nixon did not specify that he has in mind the so-called "value-added" tax, which is paid by consumers and falls hardest on low and middle income families.

He stressed, however, that local property taxes are no longer able to finance public education. And he said the Administration is developing "comprehensive proposals . . . for relieving the burden of property taxes."

The fact that the "value-added" tax is being strongly pushed in Administration circles has been widely reported.

Nixon appealed to the Democratic-controlled 92nd Congress to avoid partisanship in this election year. For his part, Nixon said, he would refrain from submitting "a huge list of new proposals, knowing full well that there could be no possibility that they could be enacted even if you worked day and night."

A good part of the presidential message was devoted to a recitation of alleged progress during the Nixon Administration.

The cities and colleges are quiet, the President said. The hopes for peace are great, and "the old Spirit of '76" still lives. He did not go so far as to say that crime has decreased, but he claimed that "the rate of increase in crime has been slowed."

The President's formal State of the Union message was a 36-page document, which he boiled down to eight pages for the televised speech he gave to a joint session of Congress.

As is customary, the subject areas were discussed largely in general terms with specific details to come in the budget message and in later messages to Congress on legislative proposals.

The President reaffirmed support for a basic foreign aid program, served notice that rising costs will require an increase in the military budget and promised to end America's combat role in Vietnam "in a way which fulfills our commitment to the people of South Vietnam."

He predicted that the revaluation of the dollar and other world currencies will strengthen the nation's position in international trade. But he implied his continued opposition to import quotas, action to control multinational corporations and other proposals aimed at stemming the loss of U.S. jobs.

The only direct reference to labor legislation was the President's reiterated call for permanent legislation to curb strikes in transportation-linked industries, including a form of compulsory arbitration.

The President urged Congress to give a go-ahead to the space shuttle program and said federal research grants will also be used to develop technology for social purposes including "fast, pollution-free transportation."

Nixon also promised a budget increase for mass transit programs to help city-dwellers and commuters.

The President restated his endorsement of welfare reform, but was silent on the issue of a minimum wage increase.

He blamed the nation's economic problems on the Vietnam war and, in the same paragraph, on the de-escalation of the war.

But the steps he has taken, Nixon assured Congress, have put the nation's economy back on course. And as soon as the "inflationary psychology" is ended, "we will return to our traditional policy of relying on free market forces to determine wages and prices."

Nixon said the budget he will submit on Jan. 24 will show a deficit but "it will be less than this year's actual deficit." And he chided Congress that it must resist "the temptation to overspend."

On health care, Nixon restated his opposition to the labor-supported National Health Security plan. He didn't refer to it by name but criticized a plan "that nationalizes our private health insurance industry."

Instead, the President repeated his proposal for "national health insurance partnership legislation" and predicted that the sharp rise in medical costs would be halted "with the continued cooperation of those who provide health services."

The President also restated his enthusiasm for reorganizing virtually all the departments of government, including abolition of a separate Dept. of Labor, as an important facet of what he terms "a new American revolution."

Judges Named To Phase 2 Review Panel

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger of the U.S. Supreme Court designated Judge Edward A. Tamm of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to head a nine-judge panel that will have jurisdiction on appeals in cases related to the Administration's economic controls program.

The court, called the Temporary Emergency Court of Appeals, is provided for under the Economic Stabilization Act of 1971 and will handle appeals from the U.S. District Court system.

Other judges named to the court are Judges John A. Danaher of Hartford, Conn., William H. Hastie of Philadelphia, John S. Hastings of Chicago, Martin D. Van Oosterhout of Sioux City, Ia., James M. Carter of San Diego, Frank M. Johnson of Montgomery, Ala., Joe E. Estes of Dallas, and A. Sherman Christensen of Salt Lake City.

The Economic Stabilization Act gives U.S. District Courts original jurisdiction in cases arising under the act. The temporary court of appeals has jurisdiction in all such cases appealed from the District Courts.

The temporary court may be broken into divisions of three or more members by Chief Tamm, and the court or its disignated divisions will hold sessions whenever necessary.

will get a new spate of Administration propaganda claiming that bad news is really 'good news.' "

"Add these statistics to the unemployment and Gross National Product figures, which show joblessness unchecked and stagnation in the economy, and you come up with the 'true news' that Nixon's Game Plan No. 2 is as much of a bust as his first game plan."

The Dept. of Commerce reported that the nation's economy as measured by the Gross National Product rose by less in the second and third quarters of 1971 than had been reported previously.

This accounted for continued high unemployment, which climbed back to 6.1 percent in December from its November level of 6 percent.

The Commerce Dept. attributed the lower GNP figures to lower retail sales, higher consumer savings and less total wages than had been originally reported.

Elsewhere, the Federal Reserve Board released another economic indicator on industrial production which gave further testimony to the sluggishness of the nation's economy.

Industrial production was up seven-tenths of 1 percent in the last month of the year, but about half of this increase in the overall index "reflected the recovery in coal production from the strike-curtailed level," the board said in a summary.

Despite a slow rise during 1971, industrial output still remained 3.7 percent below the peak reached in the late summer of 1969.

In another report, the Federal Reserve Board noted that the nation's manufacturing industries were operating at only 74 percent of their capacity during the fourth quarter of 1971, relatively unchanged from the 73.9 percent level recorded in the third quarter.

Regarding the rise in wholesale prices, Herbert Stein, new chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, said the increase was "less than might have been expected" and "a most heartening indication of significant progress in our battle against inflation."

Agencies Asked to Bar Scofflaws of Labor Act

New York—The Textile Workers called on the Nixon Administration to show concern for the rights of workers by barring federal agencies from doing business with firms that repeatedly violate the National Labor Relations Act.

The TWUA appeal was prompted by a recent White House directive that prohibits governmental agencies from awarding contracts to violators of the Phase 2 wage and price regulations.

In a letter to Defense Sec. Melvin R. Laird, TWUA Pres. William Pollock said, "We heartily agree that any contractor who is not in compliance with federal laws and regulations should not be allowed to do business with the government."

"We further believe this policy should apply to all federal laws," Pollock added.

He noted that such a ban already exists for violators of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Walsh-Healey Act, the Civil Rights Act and the Clean Air Act.

But there still remains a glaring omission—"and that is the absence of sanctions of any kind against a contractor who violated the National Labor Relations Act," Pollock stressed.

Some of the largest government contractors in the textile industry have been found guilty of serious violations of the labor law, he pointed out.

These violators, Pollock noted, "have repeatedly demonstrated that they have no intention of abiding by the law or the directives of the National Labor Relations Board, even when the courts upheld those directives."

Pollock said the letter was sent to Laird because the Dept. of Defense "continues to award millions of dollars in contracts to J. P. Stevens & Co., a firm which is notorious for such violations as well as its defiance of the law."

"It is indeed high time that the Dept. of Defense and all other government agencies rectified this intolerable situation, wherein one arm of government imposes penalties on a company for breaking federal law while another, like yours, rewards this law-breaker with additional government contracts," the TWUA letter said.

Administration Rescinds Cuts In Food Stamps

Sharp cuts in the food stamp program were averted at the last minute as the Nixon Administration backed down and agreed to spend the full amount Congress appropriated last year.

The Agriculture Dept. had planned to "save" $202 million by not spending 10 percent of the food stamp appropriations.

This would have meant that some 2 million persons would have had to pay more for their food stamps and another 75,000 would have been dropped from the program entirely. The cuts would have hit hardest at the big industrial states, where higher living costs resulted in more liberal income limitations on food stamp eligibility.

As protests flooded in from Congress, governors and mayors, Administration officials gingerly passed the buck between the Agriculture Dept. and the White House budget office.

Finally, just days before the cut was to take effect, Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz announced that the money Congress voted would be spent after all.

He said his department will issue revised regulations that will ensure that "benefits available to each household are as high or higher than they were under the old regulations."

Under the food stamp program, lower-income families are able to stretch their buying power by purchasing food stamps at a discount from their face value. The lower their income, the bigger the discount.

Strike Averted In Chicago's School Crisis

Chicago—A strike by more than 24,000 school employes was averted here when the school board shifted its stand and agreed to honor the terms of a contract it signed more than a year ago with the Chicago Teachers Union, AFT Local 1.

Union members voted to cancel a strike scheduled for Jan. 18 after the school board promised to live up to all terms and conditions of its contract, although the board is still seeking to pare an 8 percent wage increase scheduled for this year to 5.5 percent.

AFT Local 1 is taking the wage issue to final and binding arbitration, and Local Pres. John Desmond said "we believe that the arbitrator will rule that union members are entitled to the full increase as provided for in the contract signed last January."

The school board, in an attempt to eliminate a $125 million budget deficit projected for this year, had decided unilaterally to make drastic cutbacks in the city's educational program, including the contract it signed with the union.

It was estimated that the proposed cutbacks would have cost the average teacher $2,500 during 1972 in wages and fringe benefits.

IUE Names Kimble Research Director

Charles Kimble has succeeded Abe Morganstern as research director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. Morganstern retired after heading the IUE research department since 1965.

Kimble joined the IUE department in 1956 and was elevated to associate research director last year.

Union Rights Clarified:

House Action Clears Election Reform Bill

iterated in the final debate on the bill that his amendment "merely writes currently accepted practices into clear and explicit statutory language" and does not inhibit prosecution of unions or corporations that use money that has not been voluntarily contributed for political contributions.

The House approved the final version of the bill on Jan. 19, just a day after the second session of the 92nd Congress convened. The Senate had approved the legislation by voice vote in December, shortly before adjournment.

The legislation provides that:

- Candidates and their agents may not spend more than 10 cents per eligible voter or $50,000—whichever is higher—to buy time or space on radio, television, newspaper, magazines, billboards or for automatic telephone banks.
- No more than 60 percent of the total allowance may be spent for broadcasting, although the entire amount may be spent for non-broadcasting media. Radio and TV stations could not charge more for political broadcasts than their lowest charge for the same time to commercial advertisers.
- The limit for primary campaigns would be the same as for general elections.
- The spending ceiling would be adjusted automatically in future years to compensate for the rise in the Consumer Price Index over the 1970 base year.
- Loopholes are closed in existing laws regarding reporting of campaign contributions, and all contributions in excess of $100 must be reported with the name and address of the donor and the date of the donation. Reports must be filed more frequently, in greater detail, and contributions of $5,000 or more must be reported within 48 hours.

The AFL-CIO had testified and lobbied for limits on political spending so that public office wouldn't be limited to wealthy candidates and public officials wouldn't be indebted to a handful of big contributors.

Federation Pres. George Meany had termed Nixon's veto of the 1970 bill limiting spending for political broadcasts obviously "policically motivated" and an effort to maintain the financial advantage Republican candidates have enjoyed in most elections.

Nixon gave as his excuse the claim that it was unfair to restrict broadcast spending when other forms of campaign advertising were not limited.

The new bill meets the President's ostensible objections. In the process, ironically, it clamps a tighter lid on television and radio spending than did the vetoed bill, which would have allowed 7 cents a voter.

Under the ceilings in the new bill, presidential candidates this year could not spend more than about $13.9 million each for expenses covered by the legislation. And only about $8.4 million of the amount could be used to buy television and radio time.

During the 1968 presidential campaign, Republican expenditures of $12.6 million on broadcasting alone were more than twice the amount spent by the Democrats.

The final version of the election reform bill did not include a Senate-passed repealer of the "equal-time" law that has discouraged broadcasters from making public service time available to major candidates for debates or presentations. House members, most of whom don't use broadcasts extensively in re-election campaigns, balked at the provision.

Both the House and Senate faced a heavy backlog of bills that were in the legislative mills when the first session adjourned.

The Senate took up, as its first major item of business, a labor-supported bill to strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it enforcement powers similar to those of the NLRB. The bill would also reduce confusion and overlapping jurisdiction by shifting to EEOC an assortment of anti-discrimination programs now administered by other federal agencies. And it would extend coverage to city, county and state employes.

A much weaker bill passed by the House last year would require the EEOC to bring a suit in federal district court if it were unable to obtain voluntary compliance with the law prohibiting discrimination in employment on account of race, color, sex, religion or national origin.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote each senator urging passage of the Senate committee bill "without delay and without amendment."

Opponents had a host of crippling or irrelevant amendments to the legislation and the Senate was expected to spend at least a week on debate, even if a full filibuster doesn't develop.

Congress also has before it a foreign aid battle, unresolved in its first session, covering both the basic aid programs and the funds to continue them.

The Administration has indicated that it is prepared to propose emergency legislation to end the West Coast dock strike that resumed after expiration of the Taft-Hartley Act's 80-day cooling-off" period.

After the EEOC battle, the Senate is scheduled to take up an aid-to-education bill that is already embroiled in bitter controversy over anti-busing amendments.

Hidden Jobless Count Swells Actual Rate

tained that the monthly unemployment reports of the BLS do not show the full extent of joblessness because they exclude the discouraged or "hidden" unemployed.

For example, in Washington, D.C., the official unemployment rate is 4.8 percent, but when the hidden unemployed are added, the rate skyrockets to 13.5 percent, the Census survey found.

Similarly, in Houston, Tex., addition of the discouraged workers pushes the rate from 5.9 percent to 13.6 percent.

In terms of the national unemployment rate, the BLS reported the rate to be 5.8 percent last July, for example, but the addition of the 125,000 persons who had quit looking for jobs during the year would have sent the rate up to 6.6 percent

Based on BLS statistical procedure, the unemployment rate is defined as that proportion of the labor force which is unemployed and actively seeking work. Persons not actively seeking work are not counted in the labor force and consequently do not affect the jobless rate, even though they are not necessarily rejecting employment.

INFORMATIONAL PICKET LINE was set in New York City by the Clothing Workers to make the National Retail Merchants Association convention aware of the effects of apparel imports on American jobs. Leading the pickets is ACWA Vice Pres. Howard D. Samuel, who was rebuffed by the association when he urged that a labor spokesman be included on a convention panel discussing "Successful Import Techniques."

Iowa AFL-CIO Wins Test on Redistricting

Des Moines — Iowa's Supreme Court has unanimously upheld a challenge by the State AFL-CIO to a partisan redistricting of the state legislature that violated the one-man, one-vote principle.

The state's highest court said it will take over the redistricting task itself in time for this year's elections.

Iowa AFL-CIO Pres. Hugh D. Clark and Sec.-Treas. James J. Wengert, who were the plaintiffs in the case, hailed the decision as a "monumental and landmark victory" for true representative government. Other groups that joined with the state federation in bringing the suit were the Iowa League of Women Voters, the Auto Workers and the state Democratic committee.

The court firmly rejected the contention of the conservative Republican state attorney general that the challenge to the redistricting law passed by the legislature was "nitpicking" and the court shouldn't concern itself with "trifles."

The court said the legislature erred from the start in first establishing permissible deviations from equality of population instead of making an initial effort to achieve equality "as nearly as possible."

After having fixed the range, the decision noted, the legislature proceeded to draw up districts to protect incumbents and virtually assure the election of a Republican majority.

These "impermissible considerations," the court said, nullify any assumption that a good faith effort has been made "to establish districts substantially equal in population."

One effect of the court decision will result in the election of the entire Senate this year under the new court-drawn districts. Normally only 25 of the 50 senators are elected each two years. The court said 25 of the elections would be for full four-year terms and the remainder for two-year terms. The 100-member House is also up for election.

The state attorney general said he is considering an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, which originally set down the one-man, one-vote principle for all elections.

Iowa isn't the only state where labor has led the drive for compliance with one-man, one-vote standard. Several of the early test cases that reached the U.S. Supreme Court were initiated by unions or AFL-CIO state central bodies.

Union Strength Termed Vital to Farm Workers

San Francisco—A strong union is the farm worker's first line of defense against the "feudalism" of California's vast agriculture industry, a Senate Migratory Labor subcommittee was told.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, termed conditions of the state's farm workers "a scandal."

Much of the housing available to farm workers is "a disgrace to a nation that calls itself civilized," Henning said, and often lacks even running water and indoor toilets.

He testified that the hourly wage of California's farm workers last year averaged only half that of factory workers, and the income disparity was much greater since the typical farm worker could obtain only 1,200 hours of work a year as compared with 2,000 hours for factory workers.

Henning's proposals to the subcommittee included:

- Extension of federal labor laws and social legislation to farm workers, including a return to some of the protections of the original Wagner Act.
- An effective crackdown on the entrance of illegal aliens into California's farm labor market.
- Federally funded educational programs for the children of migratory farm workers and an expansion of rural housing programs.
- Enforcement of the acreage limitations on government irrigation programs and passage of legislation to provide for federal purchase of excess land and its resale "for the economic and social benefit of all."

Sen. Adlai E. Stevenson III (D-Ill.), who presided at the California hearings, noted that 45 corporate farms own 3.7 million acres of the state's farm land and one corporation alone controls more than a million acres.

Delores Huerta, vice president of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, said there are still people working for 60 cents an hour, despite a limited coverage of farm workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

She said that farm workers and small farmers "have so many problems in common and so many common interests that we should unite for our joint survival."

But, she noted, small farmers have been the most bitter opponents of unionization by trying to keep the pay of their workers at the lowest possible level to compete with the large enterprises.

The UFWOC, Mrs. Huerta noted, has found it easier to win contracts from the larger enterprises because they are more vulnerable to consumer boycotts and "generally have someone in the organization who understands what labor relations are about."

Painters Name DiSilvestro to Number 2 Post

Michael DiSilvestro was elected secretary-treasurer of the Painters by the union's executive board to succeed O. T. Satre, who retired Jan. 1.

DiSilvestro has been a vice president of the brotherhood since 1952, representing the third district. An active member since 1926, DiSilvestro was appointed an organizer in 1946.

Satre joined the Painters in 1941 and had served as secretary-treasurer since 1966. He earlier was a vice president, director of apprenticeship and training and director of organization. Satre also held a number of posts with his local, district council and the California Federation of Labor.

The Painters executive board appointed James Wolford, an international representative, to succeed DiSilvestro as vice president for the third district.

Nixon's Programs Disclose No New Movement on Jobs

Prices Rise, Jobs Drop As '71 Ends

An increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in the December Consumer Price Index—the biggest jump in half a year—prompted AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to declare that the "nation closed out 1971 with the worst of all possible economic combinations: continuing inflation and intolerably high unemployment."

The Nixon Administration took pains to point out that the 12-month, December-to-December rise in the CPI was the lowest since 1967 at 3.4 percent.

But the actual average CPI increase for 1971 was 4.3 percent, following a 5.9 percent increase in 1970.

Meany said "it is typical of this Administration that it did not choose to give" the 4.3 percent figure "to the public, but rather reported the December 1970 to December 1971 percentage because it was lower."

The federation president denounced the Administration's 1971 economic promises as "hollow" and said what America needs is "an effective, equitable economic policy—not one that continually creates loopholes in the price control dike while wages are rigidly controlled. And America needs a program of solid expansion that will put its people back to work."

Meany said the nation's economy doesn't have such a program now "and there is no evidence that the Administration is going to supply one."

The December increase brought the index to 123.1 which meant the consumer is paying $12.31 for the same cross section of goods

A WOMAN'S PLACE is on a telephone pole—at least for Sharon Roswell, a member of Communications Workers Local 6179 in Stuttgart, Ark. Miss Roswell is the first woman lineman ever hired by the General Telephone Co. of the Southwest—and possibly the the first to ever fill that job category anywhere.

Boldt Confirmation Opposed in Senate

The AFL-CIO asked the Senate to refuse to confirm Judge George H. Boldt as chairman of the Pay Board.

Labor's objections aren't personal, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the Senate Banking Committee.

"We have no criticism of Judge Boldt as a citizen or as a judge . . . But we do say he has no qualifications to sit as the impartial chairman of the Pay Board. And we see no reason for anyone so unknowledgeable in labor-management relations to receive such expensive on-the-job training."

Pres. Nixon appointed Boldt, a federal district judge, to serve as chairman and one of five public members of the Pay Board when it was set up last October.

At that time, the post didn't require Senate confirmation. But the new Economic Stabilization Act passed by Congress last month requires Senate approval of the chairmen of both the Pay Board and Price Commission—including incumbents.

Biemiller voiced "labor's strongest objections at the way the Administration has stacked the deck against workers and consumers" by its appointments of the "so-called public members" of the two economic stabilization panels.

All five of the Pay Board public members, Biemiller said, have "close and continuing ties to corporate America or to government or to both."

He cited Arnold Weber, who was a key figure in developing the government's wage policy before chang-

Board Okays Boosts For 150,000 in UTU

The Pay Board voted 8-5 to approve retroactive increases due 150,000 rail workers represented by the United Transportation Union and said it would approve 1972 increases with the stipulation that rule changes would be put into effect.

The UTU pact, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1970, contains a total of 42 percent in wage increases over 42 months.

Both UTU Pres. Al H. Chesser and Charles Luna, president emeritus of the union and its chief negotiator with the National Railway Conference, warned earlier that unless the pact was approved in full, the union would not implement it.

Rail carriers have been after the work rule changes a long time, estimating that it will save them millions of dollars and make railroads more competitive with the trucking and airline industries.

Luna and Chesser place the railroads' savings on the rules changes at $750 million, and stated that the carriers themselves admit they will save at least $400 million.

Budget Rehashes Old Fiscal Policy

Economy

By Tom Castor

Pres. Nixon acknowledged that unemployment has become one of the most severe problems confronting the nation, but his Economic Report to Congress and the policies it proposes offer little hope of relief from the high levels of joblessness plaguing the American work force.

The unemployment rate has hovered around 6 percent for well over a year with as many as 5.2 million persons out of work at one time.

But the President's report calls for only a slight reduction in the rate—to somewhere "in the neighborhood of 5 percent"—by the end of 1972. Most private economists predict that the "neighborhood" will be more like 5.5 percent.

And AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller charged during a radio interview that in reality "this Administration has no plans whatsoever . . . that will help curb unemployment." (Story, Page 5.)

Nixon's report makes no forecast at all on when joblessness will approach the 4 percent level, which the Administration once regarded as the "full-employment" objective.

In last year's Economic Report, Nixon predicted that unemployment could be reduced to 4.5 percent by mid-1972.

Even achievement of the 5 percent figure is well-hedged by the President's Council of Economic Advisers, which assembled the na-

Congress thumbed through Pres. Nixon's new budget proposals amid growing skepticism that the same fiscal medicine that failed to cure an ailing economy last year would somehow live up to its claims in the year ahead.

Virtually ignoring the demolition of his last year's budget predictions, Nixon admonished Congress to follow his proposals to the letter. It should spend neither "too much too soon" nor "too little too late" but just "enough and on time."

And to preserve both Congress and the Executive Branch from temptations to overspend, the President proposed that a rigid spending ceiling be set by law before the new round of appropriations begins.

If the President's budget projections hold up, the deficit for the 1973 fiscal year will be $25.5 billion—a hair-curling figure by traditional Republican standards but under the record $38.8 billion deficit the Treasury estimates for the current fiscal year.

He predicted that the Treasury will take in $220.8 billion during the fiscal year starting July 1, 1972 and pay out $246.3 billion.

Again this year, the President keyed his spending proposals to what he termed a "full employment budget." If joblessness were down to 4 percent—the figure the Administration apparently considers full employment — the economy would generate enough tax revenue

Carpenters' Hutcheson To Retire; Sidell Named

Maurice A. Hutcheson, who has served as president of the Carpenters since 1952, announced that he will retire on Mar. 1 as head of the 810,000-member union.

His successor will be the union's first vice president, William Sidell.

Both Sidell and Hutcheson learned their trade as young apprentices and carried a Carpenters card all their working lives.

Hutcheson, 74, said his decision to retire came easier because of "the sure knowledge" that the union's future "is in capable hands, guaranteeing its continued progress."

He decided to step down, he said, "while my wife and I are phyiscally able to do some of the things we have always wanted to do but were prevented from doing by the pressures of office."

The union's announcement also said that Hutcheson plans to relinquish his posts on the executive councils of the AFL-CIO and the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept. He has been an AFL-CIO vice president since the merger, and before that he was a member of the AFL executive council.

UTU Pact for 150,000 Approved by Pay Board

Among the changes called for are elimination of a pay differential for operating radios, allowing road crews to do their own switching, allowing yard crews to work on spur lines serving nearby industries, extending the length of runs requiring crew changes, and modification of the seniority system.

Increases due the railroad workers in 1970 were put into effect by Congress, but the Pay Board passed on two retroactive 1971 increases—a 4 percent increase due last Apr. 1 and a 5 percent increase due Oct. 1.

Two 5 percent increases due this year were given conditional approval. The Economic Stabilization Act expires Apr. 1, 1973, and the board did not act on a 3 percent raise scheduled for that date, nor on a 2 percent increase the following June 1. The contract expires at the end of that month.

In December, the board approved the first parts of a very similar 42-month contract covering 13,000 Railway Signalmen.

But the board did not promise to approve the last few raises in that contract, which total about 15 percent and begin falling due this Apr. 1.

A coalition of labor and business members pushed the UTU settlement through, 8-5, just achieving the 8-man majority needed to pass a resolution.

Arnold Weber, former executive secretary of Pres. Nixon's Cost of Living Council, and now a public member of the Pay Board, cast his vote against the proposal as well as the proxies of three other public members—William Caples, Neil H. Jacoby and Kermit Gordon. The fifth vote against it was that of Robert Bassett, a business member.

In other action, the board approved a 7.6 percent wage increase for aerospace workers represented by the Machinists at the United Aircraft Corp. in Connecticut.

The wage increase, retroactive to last Dec. 1, amounts to 31 cents hourly as opposed to the 34 cents the board allowed in contracts negotiated by the Machinists and the Auto Workers with five other aerospace corporations.

The Pay Board did cast one unanimous vote — to give board Chairman George H. Boldt authority to review routine cases, thereby reducing its caseload.

In cases involving 5,000 employes or less, Boldt is permitted to deny or approve requests for exceptions to the guidelines, but his decisions can be appealed to the board.

Boldt acted on 122 cases in less than a week as a result of this delegation of authority.

Training Plan Launched by Fire Fighters

The Fire Fighters launched a nationwide program to train 1,200 fire fighter candidates from minority groups and returning veterans with a three-day organizing session in Washington for project directors from 12 cities.

Cities selected for the program, which is being financed with a $425,000 Labor Dept. grant, include Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland, Jacksonville, Fla.; Louisville, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Oakland, Seattle, Tacoma, Wash., and Washington, D.C.

Pres. William H. McClennan said the union program is designed to increase the representation of minority groups in the nation's fire service while maintaining high professional standards.

The IAFF will seek to place 100 candidates in each of 12 cities in full-time positions in the fire service during the coming year. The national director of the program is Emmitt Cox.

Dick Leonard Retires From Key IUD Post

The retirement of Richard T. Leonard, assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Dept. and a key figure in the department's coordinated bargaining program, was announced by IUD Pres. I. W. Abel.

Leonard's retirement, effective Feb. 1, brought forth tributes from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Abel, and others who had worked with him since he first became active in the labor movement in 1935.

Meany praised Leonard as "a very valuable member of labor's team for many years. I wish him pleasant and stimulating years in retirement."

Abel, observing that IUD would miss Leonard's service, said: "All of us have benefitted from his wisdom, his common sense and his sympathetic understanding of the needs of working people. He has made a great contribution to the work of organized labor in America."

Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers, of which Leonard was an early official, said: "Dick Leonard helped create our union, and we are all grateful to him for his work. Like the other great pioneers of the UAW, he helped transform an industrial jungle into a place where workers could earn decent wages and benefits."

A delegate to the first UAW convention in 1935, he became national welfare director for the union in 1937 and was elected a board member in 1939. That same year, he was named a co-director of the UAW's Ford Organizing Committee, later becoming the union's director of Ford locals.

He was elected a UAW vice president in 1946 and was appointed regional CIO director for Arizona and New Mexico in 1948, the first of a series of CIO assignments. When the AFL and CIO merged in 1955, he was named assistant to the president of the IUD.

ILLINOIS ELECTION

All members of the Illinois legislature will be elected in 1972 under provisions of a new state constitution. The AFL-CIO News had previously reported that only the lower house would be involved in this year's elections.

Ex-Staff Economist Irving Beller Dies

Irving Beller, who had been an economist with the AFL-CIO, the Machinists and the Auto Workers from 1956 to 1967, died of cancer at Georgetown University Hospital. He was 49.

Beller joined the Organization of American States after leaving the labor movement. At the time of his death, he was a senior specialist with the OAS department of social affairs. He is survived by his wife Elizabeth and two daughters.

Compulsory Arbitration:

Nixon Calls for Law To Halt Dock Strike

Congress opened hearings on Pres. Nixon's request that it legislate an end to the long West Coast dock strike by members of the Longshoremen & Warehousemen as the work stoppage continued at 24 ports.

The President asked for legislation that would set up an arbitration panel empowered to dictate a settlement to the ILWU, Teamsters and the Pacific Maritime Association.

The two unions involved are unaffiliated, but the AFL-CIO has historically opposed any form of compulsory arbitration imposed on any union as a threat to the collective bargaining system.

Harry Bridges, president of the 13,000-member ILWU, said in San Francisco that "any legislation proposed by the President will not settle this strike."

James Robertson, secretary of the Pacific Maritime Association, said that although the management group would support any measure aimed at ending the strike, it still prefers to "negotiate a settlement across the bargaining table."

Negotiations in the dispute were scheduled to resume Jan. 31.

The West Coast walkout began last July 1, and dock workers were out 100 days before a Taft-Hartley injunction sent them back to work for 80 days.

Even when the injunction ran out Christmas Day, the union delayed a resumption of the strike in hopes of winning an agreement. Part of the dispute involves differences between the ILWU and the Teamsters over the handling of containerized cargo on the docks. Fringe benefits and the ILWU's proposals for a guaranteed annual income also are at issue.

When talks failed to produce a settlement, dockers again walked out Jan. 17.

The union immediately offered to schedule skeleton crews to handle military cargoes destined for Vietnam, as it had done during the strike before the Taft-Hartley injunction was issued.

The shippers at first rejected this proposal, but later had a change of heart.

It was clear that the President blamed labor for failure to resolve the dispute. He told Congress that the proposed emergency legislation was needed "because a few have been insensitive to the harm they are inflicting upon the many who are not a party to it."

The bill provides for a three-member arbitration panel to be named by Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson within five days of enactment of legislation. The panel would have 40 days to dictate a settlement binding on all parties that would remain in effect from 18 to 24 months.

A referee would be appointed by Hodgson to handle the jurisdictional dispute between the Teamsters and the ILWU.

Teamsters' locals on the West Coast, Hawaii and Alaska would also be subject to the legislation.

Hodgson told a Senate Labor Committee headed by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), that he shared the distaste they expressed for imposition of compulsory arbitration but added that "I see no basis for thinking prospects are any better for voluntary settlement than they were a month ago. I see no basis for any hope of settlement."

"Collective bargaining has not worked," the labor secretary maintained.

When panel members asked Hodgson why so much power was needed at a time when the parties involved seemed close to agreement, Hodgson replied that broad powers were needed "to make sure the settlement is a final one."

Nixon had asked Congress to have the legislation on his desk by the end of this week, but Senate hearings were not complete, and hearings by the House Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), were not scheduled to begin until Jan. 31.

Thompson wants representatives of labor and management to testify and meanwhile has sent subcommittee staff members to San Francisco to get background on the prospects for a settlement and "to explore with the respective parties the issues of the dispute."

OLYMPICS-BOUND Jerry Martin, a member of the Plasterers union in Minneapolis, soars to a first place victory during ski jump trials for the U.S. Olympic team at Iron Mountain, Mich.

Unionist Best U.S. Hope For Medal in Ski Jumps

Minneapolis—The United States' best hope in the 1972 Olympic ski jumps is a 21-year-old member of the Plasterers union who thinks his loss of sight in one eye on the job last year may have actually helped his preparation for the Olympics in Sapporo, Japan, in February.

Jerry Martin, a member of Plaster Tenders Local 111 in Minneapolis, wrapped up a berth on the U.S. Nordic ski jump team by winning the first two Olympic trials.

He is also the defending national champion and the North American record holder with a jump of 345 feet.

But those two feats were accomplished before he suffered the temporary loss of sight in his right eye last September when a concrete nail flew into it. He was trying to fasten a hanger in the mud joint of a brick wall.

The accident happened about halfway through Martin's preparations for the Olympics. But once out of the hospital, he continued his 1½-hour workouts before work each day, getting ready for the sweep through the Olympic trials.

His ski coach, Edward Brisson, a former member of Plasterers Local 65 and now the contractor for whom Martin works, says that Martin's superior physical condition has been all-important in his success.

"I wanted to prove to myself that I could keep jumping with one eye," Martin says. "That actually gave me a little extra push." Nobody came within 5 feet of his winning distances in the trials.

While totally blind in the eye immediately after the accident, Martin has a good chance of regaining some vision. Surgeons estimate that he may regain 30 percent vision by undergoing a cornea transplant after the Olympics, and a contact lens might correct that to near normal.

But right now his vision is blurry in the eye and the light hurts it, so he keeps a patch over it on the ski jump.

Martin says his biggest fear was that he wouldn't have the depth perception to see the end of the jump well enough to time his take-off. But on Nov. 26, his first jump after the accident, he found he was only slightly affected, if at all. His vision was impaired for only about 10 feet, he said, and that gave him time to judge the edge of the jump.

The other end—landing—was even less of a problem. "I've been jumping a long time and I land more by feel than sight," Martin explains.

Any medal that Martin is able to win in the Feb. 3-12 Olympics would be a U.S. first in Nordic ski jumps. The U.S. Olympics coach rates him a good bet in both the 70-meter and 90-meter events.

Carpenters' Hutcheson To Retire; Sidell Named

and Navy duty in World War I, Hutcheson worked as a journeyman carpenter in New York and other cities before his appointment as a general representative of the union in 1928. Ten year's later, he was elected first vice president. And in 1952, he was elected to succeed his father, the late William L. Hutcheson, in the union's top post.

As chief executive of one of the nation's largest unions, Hutcheson helped establish procedures for settlement of jurisdictional disputes and for improved labor-management relations in the construction industry.

He has been involved in pioneering multi-union agreements for union-label factory-built housing, and in programs to recruit, train and place blacks and other minority youth in skilled craft apprenticeships.

Sidell, who moves up to the presidency at the age of 56, served as an apprentice, journeyman and local union officer in the Los Angeles area.

He held nearly every post in Local 721 and in 1957 was elected secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles District Council of Carpenters, the largest in the nation with more than 55,000 members in 33 local unions.

He has held office in both the state Carpenters council and the California State AFL-CIO, and on local and state COPE organizations.

Sidell was first elected to the Carpenters executive board in 1962 and in 1970 he became first vice president, with responsibility for apprenticeship and training programs.

Sidell will serve the balance of Hutcheson's term, which runs until April 1, 1975.

Longshoremen In N.Y. Retain Pay Guarantee

New York—An agreement on local working conditions at the Port of New York, which preserves the rights of Longshoremen to a guaranteed annual income of 2,080 hours pay, has been recommended for acceptance by ILA leaders.

The union's wage scale committee recommended acceptance of the tentative accord after settlement was reached between the ILA and the New York Shipping Association.

The guaranteed annual income provision provides workers with 2,080 hours pay whether work is available or not.

Earlier, the union's Atlantic Coast Wage Scale Committee recommended acceptance of a master contract on wages and fringes covering 30,000 workers represented by the ILA in New York and five other North Atlantic ports—Baltimore, Providence, R.I., Philadelphia, Boston and Hampton Roads, Va.

The three-year pact would give North Atlantic Port workers a 41 percent wage and fringe benefit package over three years.

But local issues still are outstanding in the five other North Atlantic ports, and wages and working conditions have not been settled in South Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports where the ILA represents another 35,000 dock workers.

The North Atlantic wage-fringe settlement is expected to set the pattern for the other ports, and the ILA said it will not submit any of the pacts for membership ratification until all pay and work issues are settled in all ports.

The North Atlantic settlement, which is subject to Pay Board approval after ratification, would raise the basic dock worker scale from its present $4.60 to $6.10 an hour over the contract period.

The wage settlement calls for an immediate increase of 70 cents hourly and 40 cents in each of the two final years of the pact.

It also includes increased pension benefits and increased employer contributions to pension and welfare funds.

The master settlement was achieved after a 60-day strike in Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports which has been interrupted by a Taft-Hartley injunction sending the men back to work Nov. 26 for 80 days. The injunction expires Feb. 14.

Housing Firm Names Luna as Vice President

Charles Luna, president emeritus of the United Transportation Union, has been named vice president and director of transportation for the Stirling Homex Corp., manufacturer of modular housing.

Luna, who retired as UTU president at the end of 1971, will be based in Washington and will be responsible for the direction and coordination of all corporate transportation matters. He will not handle labor relations.

He told a press conference that he joined the company because its operations are unionized and that it has pioneered in new housing techniques and transportation. Luna was the first president of the UTU when it came into being through merger of four railroad operating unions. He had previously been president of the Railroad Trainmen.

Luna, a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council since October 1969, said he will submit his resignation to the Feb. 14 meeting of the council at Bal Harbour, Fla.

The Stacked Deck

THE AFL-CIO IS here to specifically oppose the confirmation of Judge George H. Boldt as chairman of the Pay Board. At the outset I want to register labor's strongest objections at the way the Administration has stacked the deck against workers and consumers by its selection of so-called "public" members of both the Pay Board and the Price Commission.

Pres. Nixon has himself said that the public members should be "not beholden to any special interest groups."

But in naming the so-called public members of the Pay Board and Price Commission he paid no attention to his own admonition.

All five of the so-called "public" members of the Pay Board have either close and continuing ties to corporate America or to government, or both.

Six of the seven "public" members of the Price Commission have ties to corporate America.

IN OUR TESTIMONY last November, we pointed out that in the critical area of the selection of public members for the Pay Board, a potential existed for presidential action to stack the deck. And the stacked deck we warned about had already been dealt.

On the Price Commission there is no member speaking for the consumer. So there was no dissenting voice on the commission when the Cost of Living Council voted to remove price controls for 75 percent of the nation's retailers and nearly 50 percent of the nation's rental units.

Does anyone believe that this "golden" silence would have prevailed if even one of those seven members truly reflected the interests and views of consumers or tenants?

On Judge Boldt's qualifications as chairman of the Pay Board—we have no criticism of Judge Boldt as a citizen or as a judge. We have no doubt that he is qualified to sit on the federal bench. But we do say he has no qualifications to sit as the impartial chairman of the Pay Board. And we see no reason for anyone so unknowledgeable in labor-management relations to receive such expensive on-the-job training.

LABOR AGREED to serve on the Pay Board because of public assurances that the board would be autonomous, that it would not be dominated by management, by the government, or by any other party.

But this board is not free; it never was free; and it was never intended to be free. The character of Pres. Nixon's appointees, as so-called public members, proves that conclusively.

We reject the concept that the President cannot find a man of stature, competence, knowledge and independence to fill this post. Twice before the nation imposed economic controls—both times during war. On both occasions, the then President was able to find men of the qualifications we believe this position demands. We do not believe that all such Americans have disappeared from the public scene.

And if the President felt that he could not go outside the government to find a chairman who was knowledgeable and who had a proven record of neutrality in labor-management affairs, why did he not name some one from the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, which service is by its very nature dedicated to labor-management neutrality?

—From testimony by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller before the Senate Banking Committee.

Refusal to Call Bluff Brought Britain's Failure in Rhodesia

By John P. Roche

THERE IS A STRANGE IRONY about the developments in Rhodesia. Against the background of a United Nations resolution calling on Britain to use military force to dislodge the white-settler government of Ian Smith, the British have moved to obtain a "political solution." In specific terms, Her Majesty's Government is negotiating the independence of Rhodesia, having largely backed away from the "NIBMAR" ("No independence before majority rule") position formerly advocated by both Labor and Conservatives.

Whites are outnumbered 22-1 in Rhodesia and it is perfectly clear that they have no intention of retiring from power, but certain vague assurances about eventual black participation will presumably provide the British with an excuse to retire gracefully from an impossible situation.

On the basis of his track record, Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith can be counted on to renege on any agreement, however innocuous. Understandably then, the black Africans and their friends have been accusing the British of selling out freedom and robustly demanding that the Royal Marines be sent in to impose democratic principles on the white tribe. They are also in quest of a "world gendarme" who will dispose of the Republic of South Africa. The principle of detente apparently has no application to Africa.

But what future is there in confrontation? To put it differently, who is going to go to war with the Republic of South Africa to implement one-man, one-vote south of the Zambezi River? That is the only question worth discussing. Similarly the perennial discussions between Ian Smith and various British Prime Ministers have been a charade ever since Smith realized in 1965 that he was dealing with a paper tiger.

By coincidence I was in London in October 1965 when Ian Smith, then threatening a unilateral decelaration of independence (UDI), arrived for consultations with Prime Minister Harold Wilson and the Labor Government. At dinner with an old friend who was a senior Cabinet minister, he and I took time off to watch Smith on TV; I recall remarking on his singular resemblance to George Wallace. At that time Smith and his "cowboys" were thoroughly insecure about their base, still mesmerized by the myth of British power, bluffing their heads off—and apprehensively waiting for the lightning to strike. There was even reason to believe that the South Africans were unhappy about their clumsy operations.

AFTER SMITH FINISHED his television performance, I turned to the Cabinet minister and suggested the obvious, that one brigade of paratroops could restore the Queen's writ in Salisbury. He looked at me sardonically and said, "Thanks, mate—we haven't got the lift." Since Rhodesia is landlocked, that was that; the sequel has been just sound and fury, signifying nothing.

Once it became clear that Smith was not going to be dislodged by the British, the South Africans reassessed the situation and decided that their forward line of resistance should run across from Portuguese Angola on the west coast to Portuguese Mozambique on the east with Rhodesia as the central bastion.

With characteristic efficiency, they began integrating intelligence and counter-insurgency operations for the whole area. Thus in 1972 any contemplated military action to "liberate" Rhodesia or the Portuguese enclaves involves fighting South Africa.

To repeat, who wants to volunteer for this formidable assignment? I will join the chorus denouncing the "vicious, racist regimes," but my experience with Vietnam forces me to face the gut question: When the guns begin to go off, where will all the ideological warriors be? Before I sound any trumpet, I want a hard answer to that one.

'Value-Added' Proposal:

A Sales Tax Under Any Name Still Hits Consumer Unfairly

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation 1972 Fact Sheet No. 2 on "The 'Value-Added' Tax—A National Sales Tax."

THE ADMINISTRATION again is floating trial balloons advocating a "new" tax—a so-called value-added tax.

This tax is a national retail sales tax masquerading under a new name.

It could completely destroy the thin margin of equity that remains in the federal tax structure.

This tax has been, and still is, the perennial favorite of those who feel the federal corporate and individual income-tax system overburdens wealthy individuals and businesses and treads too lightly on those whose incomes are modest and have few, if any, escape hatches.

What the Tax is Not: Value added is not a new way of taxing—it is merely a different method of collecting a sales tax. The tax burden falls entirely on the consumer, and all the regressive attributes of sales taxes apply to the value-added tax. According to Stanley Surrey, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, such taxes ". . . are in fact sales taxes in their structural design and economic effects."

How It Works: The sales taxes familiar to most Americans are applied at one time, at the last (retail) stage of the production and distribution cycle.

Under the value-added system, a piece of the tax is collected at each stage and, through a complicated process of rebates, credits and price adjustments, it is bucked forward to each business involved in the production and distribution system. Since the final consumer receives no rebate and has no one to pass the tax on to, he bears the full burden—the same as he would under a retail sales tax.

In principle, the value added by each business involved in the production and distribution of an item equals the item's retail price. To determine the value added of a particular firm, the idea is to separate the value of that firm's input to the product from the value of the inputs of its suppliers.

To figure its tax a firm would apply the tax rate to its total sales in order to find the "preliminary" tax due. From this amount the firm would subtract the taxes that were included in the price it paid on its purchases of raw materials, semi-finished products, or component parts. This amount is subtracted from the preliminary tax due, and the remainder is the amount the firm owes the government. The full tax (the amount paid to the government and the amount paid to its suppliers) is added to the selling price of the firm's goods. The result is that the firm has paid a piece of the tax directly to the government, reimbursed its suppliers for the taxes they paid, and passed the entire amount on to the purchasers of its products. The firm has no tax burden.

This process continues from firm to firm until the product reaches the consumer. The consumer receives no rebate, cannot pass the tax on to anyone else, and therefore bears the full burden of the tax.

Currently the federal budget and the economy are in trouble and the Administration is groping for new revenue sources. At the same time, the Administration is working within the framework of a philosophy that even more of the nation's tax burden should be shifted toward middle- and moderate-income workers and consumers and away from corporations. The value-added tax fits this framework.

THE AFL-CIO POSITION: Additional consumer taxes can erode the equity of the nation's tax structure as seriously as additional loopholes.

Consumer taxes exact their burden from low- and moderate-income groups who must spend all or most of their income. Wealthy individuals who can save and invest shelter much of their income from the tax. We see no justification to add to the tax burdens of those with modest incomes or put the federal government in the sales-tax business.

What is more, after the recent business tax cutting contained in the Revenue Act of 1971, the value-added tax, even if veiled as a means to reduce the property tax, is in actuality a foot in the door to a further erosion of the share of taxes paid by businesses and a further shift in the tax burden from businesses and their owners to individual workers and consumers.

It is for these reasons that the AFL-CIO at its recent convention unanimously urged "a continuing vigil to assure the rejection of all tax devices and gimmicks that run counter to the goals of tax justice. These include proposals such as the value-added tax, which is simply a national sales tax masquerading under a new name, or the addition of new, so-called business tax-incentive schemes. Such measures are haphazard, costly and wasteful approaches to meeting national goals. They reward those who need it least, at the expense of those who need it most."

Minimum Wage, EEOC, Jobless:

Congress Faces Major Battles With Nixon on Vital Legislation

BATTLES ARE SHAPING UP between Congress and Pres. Nixon on vital social and economic issues, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said.

He predicted fights over congressional efforts to improve the minimum wage, strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission and on measures to roll back unemployment.

Biemiller also said that labor would give top priority for the enactment of National Health Security, improvements in social security benefits and the Burke-Hartke bill to control multinational corporations in international trade.

Biemiller expects the minimum wage battle to develop early in this session on bills pending before both the Senate and House, which would raise the minimum wage to at least $2 an hour. He opposed the Administration's drive to cut minimum wage improvement to only $1.80 an hour and to create a special low wage for young workers.

The "minimum wage fight will be one of the places we'll be tangling very hard with this Administration—and I think we can win," he declared.

Appearing on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, Biemiller said any "game" the President might try in "calling for bipartisan partnership now," as he did in his State of the Union message, "and then running against Congress in the fall election" with a "do-nothing" charge, will fail.

He said congressional Democrats can be expected to stimulate a lot of activity on domestic measures, but "if the Administration runs true to form . . . some will be vetoed; others will be killed by the threat of a veto—or watered down."

BIEMILLER CHARGED that "this Administration has no plans whatsoever . . . that will help curb unemployment" that continues to top 6 percent.

"The labor movement is just fed up with the promises, promises, promises that we've had from Pres. Nixon," he declared, stressing that "the spector of unemployment is haunting the American people," who now, "for the first time in nearly 20 years," name the economy as the "number-one issue" in national polling.

He said a "knock-down, drag-out" battle will develop over the Administration's expected value-added tax proposal, "which is a cute little name for a national sales tax." A far better approach to "intelligent tax reform," he said, would be to end capital gains and other loopholes in the present tax laws.

Reporters questioning him were Neil MacNeil of Time magazine and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE MORE THE CENSUS BUREAU turns out its 1970 statistics, the clearer it becomes that the United States and its people are going through revolutionary changes in age groups, population shifts, voting patterns and social adjustments.

These changes can be expected to have profound influence on what happens in the presidential election this year and in elections still to come.

In the first place, the United States is still growing. The 1970 figure of 206,517,676 had barely been entered into the books when the end of 1971 produced a new figure—208,557,735 or a gain of more than 2 million over the year.

There was one surprise in these figures. The United States is not as young a nation as is generally believed. It had been generally assumed that the median age of Americans was under 25 years. It now turns out that it is 27.9, slightly lower than the 1950 and 1960 Census counts showed, but considerably higher than the 24.1 years figure in 1910.

In numbers, however, the nation's youth population of high school and college age has gone up sharply. Among those of high school age there was an increase of 45 percent to 16.2 million in 1971 while among those of college age, the growth increased 57 percent from 1960 to reach 14.8 million by 1971.

Another factor of immense importance for American politics is the shift in population, so sharply highlighted by the boom in suburban population as compared with the loss of population of virtually all of the country's major cities.

Final 1970 Census figures show that nearly 84 percent of the nation's population growth has been in metropolitan areas, but by far the greatest growth took place in the suburbs. During the 1960s the population living in metropolitan areas outside the central city reached 63.8 million as compared with 76.3 million in the cities with the suburbs greatly increasing their share of metropolitan population.

This growth, of course, will have an important political effect on voting patterns for both the Republican and Democratic parties.

On the basis of the 1970 Census, developments in voting patterns as reflected in varying age groups represent a third factor of importance to what happens this presidential year. Voter participation rates in the November 1970 elections showed that the 18-to-20 year age group was at the low end of the participation chart. Only slightly more than one of four persons in this group voted in those states where they were eligible.

This year, of course, is a presidential year and extra efforts have been made to get out the youth vote, so the November 1972 story on the new national basis may well be different.

THE LARGEST 1970 VOTER participation came in the 45-to-64-year-old group—64.2 percent, with other age groups participating in rising proportion to their age.

This, in addition to the fact that the median age of the American population is higher than previously believed would indicate that the 25-to-65 year olds will still play a dominant role in the 1972 results.

There also are social factors of immense importance for this year's election. Undoubtedly the most important is the growth of America's Negro population and the rising determination of Negro voters to participate in American life through the political process.

The 1970 Census shows an increasing level of Negro population as compared with the white population. In 1970, the American Negro population reached 22,673,000 or 11.2 percent of the total population. In 1950, the Negro population was 12,866,000 or only 9.8 percent of the total.

"HOT FIGHTS" with Pres. Nixon are expected to erupt in Congress this year in the drive to raise the minimum wage, make the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission stronger, and shape programs to roll back unemployment, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Neil MacNeil of Time magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

PRESS RUN of the Administration's proposed budget for the 1973 fiscal year is inspected at the Government Printing Office by George P. Shultz, director of the Office of Management & Budget, and Harry Humphrey, right, the acting public printer. The budget proposes holding spending close to current levels and estimates that this year's deficit of about $39 billion will be trimmed to $25 billion next year.

Rigid Spending Lid Sought:

Congress Skeptical as Nixon Clings to Old Fiscal Policies

to balance the budget. In the absence of full employment, the planned deficit is intended to stimulate economy.

Congressional skepticism came in large part because the same confident assertion had been contained in last year's budget message.

The projected deficit was only $11.6 billion, and the Administration maintained that its economic stimulus would reduce unemployment to about 4.5 percent by mid-1972.

Congress did, in fact, hold its appropriations to the overall level sought by the Administration by cutting some budget proposals and adding to others.

But the 6 perecnt unemployment level remained unchanged over the year and the actual deficit was more than triple the Administration's estimates.

Even by the Administration's own projections, its planned deficit for the coming fiscal year would have been substantially less if it hadn't insisted on cutting taxes for corporations and adding new loopholes for business. But this, the President said, is carrying out the Administration's goal of returning "economic power to people."

To carry out his "people power" concept, the President again asked Congress to phase the federal government out of supervision of major government programs by turning over "revenue-sharing" funds to the states to spend as they wish.

The states and cities, the President insisted, are "best equipped to solve domestic problems."

Nixon proposed a higher share of the budget for military spending than Congress appropriated this year. But the biggest new cost item would be pay raises geared to recruiting all-volunteer armed forces. The number of servicemen and Defense Dept. civilian employes would continue to decline, although not as sharply as in the past two years.

As is the case with all budgets, the spending estimates are based on an amalgam of mandatory obligations—such as interest on government bonds, social security payments and veterans benefits—plus continuation of ongoing programs, along with new proposals that require congressional action and which may or may not have a realistic prospect of passage.

Some budget estimates fall into the category of wishful thinking in the opinion of many economists—such as an estimate that payouts for unemployment insurance will drop to $5.7 billion from the $7.2 billion estimate for the current fiscal year.

And the "savings" resulting from the Administration's refusal to budget funds for federal "impact" aid to school districts attended by children of military and federal civilian families ignores the fact that Congress has repeatedly insisted on appropriating these funds.

While hailing the tax reductions enacted at the Administration's urging as a stimulus to economic recovery, Nixon noted that it deprives the government of $20 billion in revenue in Fiscal 1973 and virtually precludes any new government programs unless existing programs are slashed to make up the cost.

He also warned Congress against repeating the pattern of the past several years in which the Administration's military budget proposals were cut and the savings allocated to domestic programs such as education and health.

The Nixon formula of touting increases for "human resources" while quietly proposing cuts in other facets of existing programs is obvious in such devices as cutting funds for construction of health facilities to balance higher research grants, budgeting $1 billion less than Congress authorized for anti-pollution sewage construction while claiming an overall increase in funds for "natural resources and environment" programs, cutting back on funds for model cities and low-rent apartment construction while claiming advances in "community development and housing."

While the dollar amounts are huge, the portion of the $246.3 billion spending estimate that represents "discretionary" as compared to mandatory spending is only 31.1 percent. About two-thirds of that is earmarked in the budget for military spending, leaving the civilian share at 11 percent.

In an area of special interest to labor, the budget carries increased funds for the occupational safety and health program—about a 50 percent rise in the Dept. of Labor funds for the program to a proposed total of $64 million.

The budget also proposes funds for revision and expansion of price, employment and wage statistics, including a test of the desirability of making weekly instead of monthly surveys of unemployment.

Nixon closed his budget message with a reiteration of his philosophy that the federal government should play "a smaller, not a larger, role in the life of each of us."

Law Group, Labor to Aid Victims of Price Gouges

Faced with continued government refusals to provide consumer protection during Phase 2, the AFL-CIO and the National Legal Aid & Defender Association have formed a coalition to provide legal assistance for poor and low-income consumers victimized by price gougers.

In a joint statement, Leo Perlis, head of the AFL-CIO's price monitoring program, and E. Clinton Bamberger, president of the NLADA and dean of the Catholic University Law School, noted that victims of price gouging are often the poor, the unemployed and the marginal worker. These are consumers who can least afford legal services.

"Complaints about price violations have been accumulating across the country," they declared as they urged NLADA members to "represent those who are eligible, as individuals or by class action before the courts."

Perlis and Bamberger said the coalition was formed because "there has been no visible action taken by the government to protect the consumer by recovering overcharges and by punishing violators."

The Internal Revenue Service, after promising to disclose the names of price violators "in a number of circumstances," is still "formulating the guidelines" nearly three weeks later.

IRS refusals to inform consumers of the validity of their complaints have prevented the restitution of any overcharges during both phases of the Administration's economic stabilization program.

Meanwhile, the Cost of Living Council announced that 66 suits had been filed across the nation involving violations of retail store posting requirements.

The council said it had made 20,076 compliance checks following the Jan. 17 deadline for price posting and had found 2,224, or 11 percent, of the stores in apparent violation.

Justice Dept. officials disclosed last week, however, that federal prosecutors had been instructed to file no more than five suits in any single U.S. District Court without "specific authority" from Washington. There are 93 judicial districts in the nation.

Last week, the COL council exempted the areas where the heaviest violations of Phase 2 regulations were occurring—decontrolling 75 percent of the nation's retailers and nearly 50 percent of the rental units.

Even though the IRS had still found retailers operating at a noncompliance rate of 11 percent, COL Council Director Donald Rumsfeld said that "voluntary compliance with the program remains high" and that it was "effective in reducing inflation."

Both Price Commission chairman C. Jackson Grayson and Treasury Sec. John B. Connally differed with Rumsfeld's interpretations of Phase 2 success.

In a speech last week Grayson held out the possibility of prolonged or enlarged controls and Connally added that "it may be next summer, it may be next fall, it may be four years from now" before controls are removed.

2 More Firms Enroll in URW Health Study

Akron, O.—The Rubber Workers signed occupational health agreements with Uniroyal, Inc., and Armstrong Rubber Co. for on-the-job studies designed to bring about more healthful working conditions.

The University of North Carolina School of Public Health will oversee the Uniroyal project and the Harvard School of Public Health will handle the Armstrong epidemiological study.

Four of the nation's major rubber companies have signed the agreements, which the URW negotiated in 1970 contracts.

First to sign the final Joint Occupational Health agreement was B. F. Goodrich Co. Goodyear Tire & Ruber Co. was the second. Still to sign the final agreements are Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and General Tire & Rubber Co.

The health studies involve the evaluation of workers' health and disease patterns based on death certificates, social security data, company records and union information. The findings are being used to develop safety and health standards at rubber plants.

Unions Looking Into New Programs Of Prepaid Group Legal Services

Group legal services for union members are emerging as a potential solution to the problems of many workers who can't afford adequate legal representation, an article in the Federationist reports.

The program operates similarily to prepaid group practice medical plans. By pooling payments in advance, "members of the group are provided with legal assistance of a quality and at a price which would not be available to them as individuals," writes John A. Grimes in the January issue of AFL-CIO magazine.

The need for legal assistance of middle-income wage earners is highly evident, Grimes observes. Their legal problems often include such things as "disputes with their landlords, conflicts over debts in an increasingly credit-card economy, battles with financing companies, the complexities of the sale or purchase of a home or even the drafting of a will."

Despite the problems, Grimes says that these wage earners seldom even think about obtaining a lawyer —"and most often, the cost of retaining a lawyer is enough to stop them."

Another factor, he notes, "is the lack of an effective system of delivery for legal assistance to these middle-income. Americans —a problem more and more freely admitted by members of the legal profession."

The labor movement has been in the vanguard in the drive to develop group legal services programs, Grimes reports.

The Laborers have one operating in Louisiana. The Clothing workers are launching programs in Chicago and Los Angeles. Teachers groups in Los Angeles and Florida will soon have such plans in operation. Other unions are considering similar programs.

"The rich have always been able to afford proper legal care," Grimes points out. And in recent years, the very poor have been given legal assistance through various government programs.

But a larger group of "have-nots" is the middle-income workers, he observes.

Grimes focuses on the group plan developed by Laborers Local 229 in Shreveport, La., with the cooperation of the American Bar Association and the Ford Foundation.

The 500 members of the local contribute 2 cents for each hour they work into the group fund. Counting the dependents of the members, there are about 2,000 persons insured for legal services.

Members of the Shreveport plan are free to retain the lawyer of their choice. Attorneys' fees are not set by the plan, although they are monitored by the Shreveport Bar Association.

Claims for legal assistance after one year of operation were well below expectations, Grimes reports.

Most of the claims involve motorist cases, domestic relations and credit problems.

One of the oldest group plans —the one established by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in 1930—often ran into roadblocks from professional groups.

Several key court decisions, however, cleared the way for the BRT plan to operate. The most recent came last April in support of the United Transportation Union, of which the BRT is now a part.

Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black wrote the majority decision that said in part:

"The common thread running through our decisions is that collective activity undertaken to obtain meaningful access to the courts is a fundamental right within the protection of the First Amendment. However, that right would be a hollow promise if courts could deny associations of workers or others the means of enabling the members to meet the cost of legal representation."

Grimes further notes that legislation has been introduced in Congress to clear other obstacles to group legal practice.

He also says, "group legal service holds the promise of becoming an important future development in collective bargaining as well as in other, more widely-based plans designed to bring the benefits of legal services to the forgotten middle American—and at a price he can afford."

'Shoddy' State Laws:

Standards Pressed For Injury Benefits

The workmen's compensation system across the country was described in three days of testimony as a mish-mash of state programs —some adequate, but many shoddy.

A complete overhaul of the system with the adoption of strict federal standards is vitally needed, a parade of witnesses told the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws.

The Washington session was the last in a series of hearings the commission has been conducting around the country. More than 175 witnesses representing labor, consumer groups, government officials and business have testified.

Improvements in benefits, a wider scope for the programs and nationwide uniformity emerged as the prime urging by labor and consumer representatives — and some state officials too. Business representatives were more or less content with maintaining the existing setup.

Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., pin-pointed the wide variations in payments and benefits among the states under the programs.

For example, the weekly maximum payment for total disability in Arizona is $150, but only $40 in Mississippi. For the loss of an arm on the job, Hawaii pays the victim $35,100; Wyoming $6,800.

Clayman also noted that if a worker is killed on the job in Michigan his survivors receive $52,000. In Georgia and South Carolina the most that the widow and children can receive is $12,500.

He also deplored the decline in weekly benefits in relation to wages over the past 60 years since workmen's compensation laws were adopted. At first, most states paid about 66 percent of the average weekly wage. Currently, the rate has dropped to 36.8 percent in Louisiana, 37.2 percent in Mississippi and Texas and 41.6 percent in Maryland.

Clayman's testimony was reinforced by Gov. John J. Gilligan of Ohio, who said that the state paid $1 more a week in benefits in 1912 than the average wage.

He noted that the Ohio law was passed through the efforts of State Sen. William Green, who later became the president of the American Federation of Labor.

When Gilligan took office a year ago, he said payments had slipped to 40 percent of average weekly wage for on-the-job disability.

Although Ohio improved its payments during the past year to an initial $84 a week, Gilligan said that level is still well below the comparable rate of 60 years ago.

Despite the improvements which make Ohio's program one of better ones in the nation, he said there are still many defects and gaps in coverage.

Gilligan called for the adoption of minimum federal standards for all state plans.

Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke of the Steelworkers told the commission that the existing system—a "random collection" of state laws —has failed to achieve or maintain the four basic objectives of workmen's compensation.

Burke noted the programs were designed to provide:

- Income maintenance with prompt payment of lost earnings and the cost of medical and related health costs.
- Rehabilitation leading to the worker's return to productive employment.
- No-fault liability, permitting the worker to recover damages without having to prove fault or negligence.
- Safety and health incentives to encourage employers to provide workplaces free from hazards.

The USWA official called for improved minimum standards that would give full coverage for disabilities from all occupational disease, upgrading of benefits paid to injured workers, replacement of 75 percent of normal wages, uniform rehabilitation standards and greatly improved administration of the laws.

Pres. John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots and Pres. Errol L. Johnstad of the Flight Engineers told the commission that the state programs offer totally inadequate coverage for their members since airline crews usually fly across state jurisdictions and often international boundaries.

They urged that a federal workmen's compensation law be enacted to protect flight crews and other workers in similar situations.

Other witnesses also noted that many workers are often not covered by the laws. It was pointed out that only 17 states offer workmen's compensation protection to farm workers.

Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers presented the commission a list of 29 recommendations for the adoption of a federal workmen's compensation law. It includes a provision for an automatic cost-of-living adjustment every year on all benefits.

Other witnesses representing labor included Pres. John F. Griner of the Government Employes, Research Director Ronald E. Carter of the Retail Clerks and Safety Director Joseph Leonard of the Longshoremen.

Labor representatives on the 15-member commission are James O'Brien of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Michael Peevey, research director of the California AFL-CIO.

Economic Forecast Anticipates Little Progress on Joblessness

tion's economic analysis for the coming year.

The report hedges at almost every corner with one of the few explicit statements being that there will be no early end to the Phase 2 economic stabilization controls.

For example, the President's economists predict at one point that the jobless rate should fall to 5 percent by the end of the calendar year.

But they totally qualify this forecast in the very next paragraph:

"These estimates," their report states, "like all economic forecasts, are subject to considerable margin of possible error. Circumstances are conceivable in which the rise of the economy would be less than these estimates suggest."

The President's advisers also project a growth of $100 billion in the Gross National Product during 1972, to a total of $1.145 trillion.

This would be a record gain of 9 percent, if it occurs, but the report acknowledges that one-third of this increase would be accounted for by rising prices merely inflating the GNP value.

The report also hedges on whether even this projected economic growth would cure the nation's economic ills.

"Even given the course of the GNP in money terms, uncertainties would remain about the prospect for employment, unemployment and prices," the report states.

"Variations in the rate of growth of the labor force and productivity, within the limits of historical experience, could significantly affect the outcome. And although the character of the wage-price control system gives grounds for confidence, it must be recognized that there is little relevant precedent for predicting its effects."

The Administration's economists went on to admit the possibility that economic growth and their projected decline in unemployment might lag behind their estimates, and that this possibility "calls for readiness to take additional steps."

The CEA maintains that there is no easy way to separate gains in the GNP into gains in employment and productivity, although "it should yield substantial increases in both."

Growth of the labor force is a crucial factor in just how high the unemployment rate will be, the report suggested.

The economists endorsed one Administration measure supposedly aimed at reducing unemployment in the 16-19-year-old age group—pay the teengers less than the minimum wage for adults.

"The rising levels and expanded coverage of the minimum wage since the middle Fifties may have been a factor in the upward drift of the teenage unemployment rate (currently 17 percent)," they claimed.

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly denounced this argument as fallacious, pointing out that there is no evidence that the federal minimum wage causes unemployment among young workers and that a lower minimum wage for teenagers is likely to reduce job opportunities for adults, including the heads of families.

The report estimates that the rate of inflation in 1972 will decline to about 3.25 percent, which would be the lowest year-to-year change since 1967. It predicted that toward the end of the year, price changes would be running at the rate of 2 to 3 percent a year.

This forecast assumes two things, the report says.

First, that there will be a steady and strong growth in the demand for money, but not so great that "shortages of products or labor would be created if price and wage increases were held to the forecast paths."

"Second, it assumes that the price-wage control system, given such demand conditions, will be of the character, force and duration to maintain that path."

Herbert Stein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, had been criticized for speculating that economic controls might be lifted before the November elections.

During a news briefing on the economic report, Stein said that wasn't what he meant and pointed to one section of the report as "my favorite sentence:"

"Speculation that the Administration will abandon the controls prematurely—out of fatigue, ideological aversion, or other causes—is groundless."

Meany Calls Confidence In Economy Key to Jobs

A "new surge of confidence" and an increase in consumer activity is the key to a growing economy and a drop in unemployment, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

There is a lot of money that could be going into the consumer spending stream "that's not going because of a general lack of confidence in the future of the economy," Meany told a British Broadcasting Corp. audience.

The federation president held a trans-Atlantic telephone conversation with Victor Feather, secretary-general of the British Trades Union Congress, which was broadcast over the BBC.

Feather said that the lack of confidence as evidenced by the high rate of savings was duplicated in Great Britain and that it was true also of a number of European nations.

Meany and Feather stressed the high unemployment rates in their respective countries—Meany citing the 1971 rate as the highest in 10 years and Feather noting that joblessness in his country had reached a high mark for the past 30 years.

The TUC official pointed out that the male heads of families were hard hit with a 6-percent unemployment rate. In the U.S. the rate for the same group of workers was 3.3 percent, up also over past years.

Both Meany and Feather rejected various plans for "sharing the misery" of unemployment and said that greater leisure and other advances should come from increased prosperity.

Meany pointed out that contrary to earlier analysis, the increase in technology and automation has not turned out to be the threat "that we thought it was perhaps 10 years ago." Feather suggested that the development of technology could free workers for jobs in the public sector and the social services.

This problem is the same in America, Meany said, with the need for the government to play a major role in providing public investment in hospitals, housing, transportation, etc.

CORRECTION

Rep. Peter A. Peyser of New York's 25th Congressional District should have been listed as a Republican in the voting record section of the Jan. 22 issue of the AFL-CIO News. He was incorrectly shown as a Democrat.

The voting tally correctly showed Peyser with eight "right" and three "wrong" votes on the AFL-CIO's scoring of key issues. He was absent for one of the 12 listed votes.

Senate Rejects Court Approach:

Labor, Rights Groups Win Key Test on EEOC Power

The Senate moved a big step closer to passage of a labor-supported bill giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to enforce the law forbidding job discrimination because of race, sex or national origin.

It defeated by a key 48-46 vote an amendment that would have gravely weakened the bill by requiring the EEOC to file suit in the bottom tier of federal courts if it could not obtain voluntary compliance.

Such an amendment, strongly backed by the Administration and employer groups, was narrowly adopted by the House last year on a 202-197 vote. Civil rights groups are convinced that it would throw up a cumbersome roadblock to enforcement, with its multi-layers of court appeals, and will fight to retain the Senate version in a House-Senate conference committee.

The amendment to knock out the key "cease and desist" powers for the EEOC was sponsored by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) and supported by a coalition of conservative Republicans and southern Democrats.

On the final showdown — the third of a series of see-sawing votes —26 Republicans and 20 Democrats voted for the Dominick amendment while 31 Democrats and 17 Republicans supported the position of the labor-civil rights coalition and voted against the amendment.

To both sides, the battle became one of logistics. Senators running for re-election—or campaigning for the presidential nomination—had to be summoned back from campaign trails. Long-scheduled commitments had to be cancelled.

And this had to be done not once, but twice.

The first vote on the Dominick amendment came on Jan. 24. The civil rights coalition, of which labor is an integral part, had done its work well. The amendment was defeated 43-41.

But later that day, when the minority noted that several senators who had voted against the Dominick amendment had left town to keep important engagements, Sen. William B. Saxbe (R-Ohio) moved to reconsider the vote.

The motion to reconsider carried, 40-39, and the Dominick amendment was alive again.

It was then the turn of the bipartisan supporters of a strong equal job rights bill to block an immediate vote by proposing amendments to the Dominick amendment until both sides could agree on a time for Round 3.

The rematch was finally set for the morning of Jan. 26.

On both sides, lobbyists and staff aides to absent senators pored over airline schedules to work out ways of bringing them back—sometimes from remote small towns—in time for the vote. Head counts were carefully checked and rechecked for senators who said they would return if their vote was essential.

With Vice Pres. Agnew presiding over the Senate—ready to break a tie in favor of the Administration —the honest answer was that every vote was needed.

Not until minutes before the vote —when the last of the senators filed in, including several who had gotten up before dawn to make plane connections—did the tension ease.

The Senate-approved provision would give the EEOC powers comparable to those of the National Labor Relations Board in its jurisdiction.

Administration forces subsequently succeeded in nibbling away at another section of the bill, intended to eliminate contradictions and overlapping jurisdiction in the government's administration of equal employment programs.

By a 49-36 vote, the Senate killed a section of the bill that would have transferred the Office of Federal Contract Compliance from the Dept. of Labor to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Still ahead was a key vote on a Southern-led effort to eliminate from the bill an extension of coverage to employes of cities, counties and states. The Administration, as well as the labor-civil rights coalition, supports the expanded coverage.

While the Senate continued debate on the EEOC bill, the House completed final congressional action on a compromise bill authorizing continuation of the nation's foreign aid program.

The new authorization bill—which must be enacted before appropriations can be voted—sets a spending ceiling of $2.76 billion for the current fiscal year, of which $1.5 billion is for military aid and the balance for economic and humanitarian aid. It also authorizes up to $984 million in economic and humanitarian aid for the fiscal year starting July 1.

The authorization for the current year is close to $800 million less than Pres. Nixon had requested.

The long delay in action on the foreign aid authorization resulted from the surprise action of the Senate last fall in defeating a much-amended bill and efforts to reach agreement on a new version.

Senate Urged to Refuse Confirmation of Boldt

ing hats to become a "public" member of the board.

And he wondered why William Caples was sitting as a public member after "a lifetime in industry on the management side of the bargaining table" and service as a vice president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

To fill out the list, Dr. Neil Jacoby is chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors of an oil company, and Dr. Kermit Gordon "spent much of his adult life as a government official."

As for Boldt, himself, Biemiller recalled the account AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany gave to the federation's recent convention.

Meany reported that Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson had described Boldt as "totally and completely unfit for the job."

By his statements and actions on the board, Biemiller suggested, Boldt has demonstrated not neutrality but "rubber-stamp subservience to the Administration."

Biemiller stressed that labor had agreed to serve on the Pay Board on the basis of "assurances that the board would be autonomous, that it would not be dominated by management, by the government, or by any other party."

In fact, Biemiller stressed, "this board is not free; it never was free, and it was never intended to be free. The character of Pres. Nixon's appointees, as so-called public members, proves that conclusively."

He told the committee that the Auto Workers had authorized him to say that they were in complete agreement with the AFL-CIO testimony.

Judge Boldt was endorsed for confirmation by the four other public members and all five management members of the Pay Board. And the Senate committee, despite labor's objections, voted to recommend confirmation.

The AFL-CIO testimony also criticized the fact that "six of the seven public members of the Price Commission have ties to corporate America."

All seven members of the Price Commission are supposed to represent the public, Biemiller noted, but "there is no member speaking for the consumer" which may explain why "there was no dissenting voice" to the removal of price controls for 75 percent of the nation's retailers and nearly half of all rental units.

AFL-CIO Statement on Presidential Election

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has issued the following statement:

To clarify the position of the AFL-CIO on the 1972 presidential election, the following points should be noted:

1. At this time, the AFL-CIO has taken no official action and made no official decision that it would oppose any candidate or support any candidate.

2. Any recent statements made by individuals connected with the AFL-CIO represent their own personal opinions and do not in any way represent official AFL-CIO policy.

3. Endorsement of presidential and vice presidential candidates are, under our traditional practice, a matter for decision by the General Board, which meets for such purpose after the major parties have chosen their candidates. The decision of the General Board is always officially and publicly announced.

4. Until that decision, the political activities of the AFL-CIO will include a vigorous pursuit of our registration campaign, a major drive to inform union members about the issues and the voting and performance records of public officials, and plans for a massive get-out-the-vote drive on Election Day.

and services which cost him $10 in 1967. About two-thirds of the rise was attributed to food items exempt from the price control program.

Taken on the basis of 1957-59 dollars, the consumer was paying $14.31 for what cost $10 then, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson read the BLS report on real spendable earnings as meaning "the working man is surmounting inflation."

For the average worker with three dependents, real spendable earnings—pay adjusted for the increase in living costs since 1967—stood at $93.41 a week. Hodgson declared that this represented an increase of "more than 3 percent over a year ago."

But real spendable earnings in December were only 56 cents more than in September of 1968 when they set the last previous high of $92.85.

Hodgson also said that with the Nixon Phase 2 stabilization machinery in gear, "we see an even better 1972 for labor and the supermarket shopper."

But Herbert Stein, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, cautioned that the post-freeze "bulge" in prices would continue as controls are relaxed, implying that January's CPI increase could be greater than December's.

The BLS said that "the November to December change on the index reflects changes in some prices that are collected only every 3 months, or less frequently, and thus does not exclusively represent changes in Phase 2."

The December index for food purchased in grocery stores rose 1.3 percent in December, more than twice as much as it usually does at that time of year.

Prices of raw farm products, according to the BLS, accounted for about 85 percent of the increase.

The price of nonfood commodities was unchanged in December instead of declining as it usually does.

New car prices rose seven-tenths of 1 percent and prices also increased for gasoline, reading materials and a few other items.

The price of utilities and public transportation increased a full point.

Training Plan Set For Detroit Crafts

Detroit—The Labor Dept. has awarded a $422,000 contract to launch a voluntary hometown training and hiring project for the building and construction trades.

The contract with the Detroit Plan Group is designed to assist 167 trainees, advanced trainees and journeymen in becoming union members in the three Detroit area counties of Wayne, Oakland and Macomb.

The trainees will receive 28 weeks of on-the-job instruction and up to three weeks of classroom training from union craftsmen in 11 building trades occupations.

Medical Cost Increase Laid To Violations

A December increase in the cost of medical services "can only mean that providers of medical services are flagrantly violating the price stabilization regulations applicable to them," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned.

In a letter to an advisory panel of the Cost of Living Council, Seidman said the four-tenths of 1 percent increase in medical care services during December "is a matter of grave concern calling for prompt action by your committee."

The COL council set guidelines of 2.5 percent annual increases in doctor's fees and 6 percent on any hikes in hospital charges.

Since no medical care services are exempt from controls, Seidman said, "there is, therefore, not the slightest excuse for the sharp rise in the cost of medical care services which took place."

$6 Million Due Airline Machinists

Six million dollars in back pay —wages lost in a 53-week illegal lockout by National Airlines— will be paid soon to nearly 1,000 mechanics and ground service workers.

The settlement negotiated by the Machinists union was described as the largest back pay award in U.S. labor history.

The company locked out its employes on Jan. 24, 1969, three days after a dispute erupted over changed working conditions. National's main bases are at Miami International Airport and New York's Kennedy International Airport.

IAM Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger said union members will receive checks ranging from $500 up to nearly $10,000. The average will be more than $6,000.

The settlement became a reality when the final count on a mail ballot showed that union members had ratified the agreement by a margin greater than 7 to 1.

The settlement was worked out in almost a year of negotiating between the airline management and union officials.

Winpisinger explained that the settlement will now be submitted for formal approval to U.S. District Judge C. Clyde Atkins in Miami, under whose aegis it was worked out.

"This is a $6 million reminder to the airline industry that, under the law, an airline cannot arbitrarily change working conditions during contract negotiations," the IAM vice president declared.

Union members are expected to receive their checks three to four weeks after Judge Atkins gives his final approval of the settlement. The judge is bound by a decision of the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals which found the lockout to be a violation of the Railway Labor Act. That act governs all labor relations on the airlines as well as the railroads.

The Supreme Court refused to consider an appeal by National Airlines of the decision. After the Supreme Court's action, the appeals court remanded the case to Judge Atkins to work out a method of payment between the parties. Those negotiations have been going on for nearly a year.

Labor Spurs New Drive For Old-Age, Welfare Bill

Nixon Prods Congress on Strike Ban

Pres. Nixon has seized on the West Coast dock strike to step up the pressure on Congress to pass a sweeping compulsory arbitration law that would permanently bar major strikes in transportation-linked industries.

His latest "get tough" message also berated Congress for its reluctance to steamroller through an "emergency" bill to force the longshoremen back to work.

Administration officials insisted that there was no likelihood of a negotiated settlement on the West Coast. Compulsory arbitration of the dispute is necessary to prevent "a cruel and intolerable burden on the American people," Nixon told Congress.

By contrast, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), who are in charge of hearings on the dock strike bill, saw a clear possibility of a settlement "before we have to act on this legislation."

Thompson's subcommittee has summoned the top union and management negotiators for a first-hand report on the bargaining situation.

The President unveiled in his message to Congress what the Wall Street Journal described as a "snappier title" for the transportation disputes bill he has been pushing for the past three years.

It used to be the "Emergency Public Interest Protection Act."

But from here on in, the new

Sharp Protests Hit $1.90 Pay Ceiling

The Cost of Living Council's exemption from controls of only $1.90 in hourly wages came under strong attack from organized labor and members of Congress as "tortured logic" and contrary to the intent of the Economic Stabilization Act.

Labor members of the Pay Board protested that the $1.90 figure represented an annual income even lower than the government's officially defined poverty level for an urban family of four.

See editorial on this page by George Meany.

In other action, the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee accepted for the first time the general wage guidelines of the Pay Board, but was granted near autonomy in applying them. The Pay Board gave the committe leeway to apply Pay Board guidelines under its own "substantive regulations."

On the wage exemption, before the COL council issued its ruling the Pay Board had advised the council that the $1.90 cutoff would be inconsistent with the intent of Congress in passing the Economic Stabilization Act amendments, but the board was unable to agree on a recommendation for any higher figure.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger denounced the action as "tortured logic used against the lowest wage earners in the country."

Goldfinger, the alternate for Federation Pres. George Meany on the Pay Board, noted that the $1.90 figure represents an annual income lower than the poverty line for a family of four established by the

Bids Senate Open Assault On Poverty

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to transform a House-passed social security and welfare reform bill into the framework for a major assault on deep-rooted poverty.

Labor witnesses, testifying before the Senate Finance Committee, called for improvements in nearly all sections of the House-passed bill.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, joined at the witness table by Social Security Director Bert Seidman, stressed these points of a 50-page prepared statement:

- The 5 percent social security benefit increase provided by the House bill "is totally inadequate."

More than one-fourth of all retired social security beneficiaries over 65 are living in poverty, and the cost-of-living escalator provision in the House bill would merely lock them into their present inadequate level in terms of purchasing power.

Instead, the AFL-CIO urged an immediate 15 percent increase, followed by at least a 10 percent rise next year.

- On Medicare, the AFL-CIO welcomed the plan to extend coverage to disabled persons under 65 but protested the length of a proposed two-year waiting period.

While urging elimination of the monthly Medicare Part B premium, the AFL-CIO "vigorously opposed" an Administration proposal to shift the cost to the payroll tax

Consumers Ask Voice On Price Commission

The Consumer Federation of America has urged Pres. Nixon to appoint a "consumer specialist" to the vacancy on the Price Commission created by the appointment of Dr. Marina V. N. Whitman to the Council of Economic Advisers.

The organization proposed in a letter to Nixon that the President appoint Mrs. Helen Nelson to the Price Commission and said this might "help restore confidence in the Administration's complex system of economic stabilization."

Mrs. Nelson is well qualified to work "constructively" with the Price Commission, the CFA asserted. It noted that she has a master's degree in economics and heads the Center for Consumer Affairs at the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee. She was elected president of the Consumer Federation at its recent annual meeting in Washington.

The group also elected Arnold Mayer, Washington representative of the Meat Cutters, as secretary-treasurer and Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., as one of five vice presidents.

At Consumer Assembly '72, which preceded the annual meeting, the CFA heard addresses by consumer spokesmen, Senators Frank Moss (D-Utah) and Fred Harris

An Editorial

The action of the Cost of Living Council, exempting only wages of less than $1.90 an hour from controls, is outrageous. Once again, it unfairly penalizes American workers at the lowest stage of the economic ladder—the working poor.

The Congress specifically demanded wage control exemption for the working poor and the Administration deliberately flouted that congressional mandate.

Twice previously the government has imposed wage controls. Each time, in the interests of humanitarianism, the working poor were exempt. No one who believes in human dignity could characterize the present Administration action as other than callous and intolerable.

The AFL-CIO will not accept this decision as final. We must—and we will—find a means for overturning it.

Consumers Ask Voice on Price Panel

(D-Okla.) as well as Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson.

Grayson presented the results of a one-man survey he had taken, which he said showed the Price Commission is succeeding in holding prices down. When delegates called the survey unscientific and "misleading," Grayson replied that "all I said was that it was one man's shopping tour and it was encouraging to me."

Consumer Consultant Sidney Margolius observed that a can of tomato paste is not as good a price indicator as a pound of meat. He said his own survey in Baltimore, New York and Detroit showed meat prices up five to ten cents a pound in the last week and in some cases, as much as 20 percent.

Grayson's suggestion that volunteer price monitoring would be more effective in keeping prices down than stronger government regulation drew the response from Evelyn Dubrow, legislative representative of the Ladies' Garment Workers and a CFA director, that the Internal Revenue Service "doesn't depend on volunteers" when it collects taxes.

A CFA resolution endorsed the AFL-CIO's price monitoring program as being "in the interest of the American consumer" and especially important because of an "absence of serious and meaningful Price Commission controls."

Meanwhile, four weeks after announcing that it would inform complainants as to the validity of their complaints, the IRS said it is still "formulating the guidelines."

The Cost of Living Council has announced that information in its "control and custody" is now available to a limited extent. But IRS investigations of complaints of price cheating are not considered in the "control and custody" of the council.

Leo Perlis, head of the AFL-CIO's price monitoring program called the new regulations "another example of the half-hearted and begrudging attitude of the Cost of Living Council to the American consumer."

The COL council's rulings have "tilted toward big business from the beginning," he added.

LABOR'S ARGUMENTS against a stiff boost in postage rates for publications of non-profit organizations are included in the six-foot stack of documents that Postal Rate Commission aide Gloria Farmer is exhibiting. The International Labor Press Association warned that some union publications could be forced to discontinue by rate hikes as high as 750 percent over 10 years.

Forced Arbitration Law Demanded by Nixon

title is the "Crippling Strikes Prevention Act."

It would contain unchanged the same proposed assortment of "weapons" for the President to use in halting a strike—which the AFL-CIO Executive Council has stressed, in a statement of vigorous opposition, add up to compulsory arbitration, "no matter how novel the disguise."

Administration officials indicated to newsmen that they would have no objection to toughening some of the provisions of the bill if Congress so desired.

In an assortment of ways, the Administration and its congressional supporters sought to force quick action by Congress on the dock strike legislation.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson held a news conference to complain of the slow pace of congressional action and to warn that the nation's economic recovery would be set back if the strike continued.

And Republican members of the House Rules Committee served notice of a move to bypass the House Labor Committee to speed the compulsory arbitration bill to a floor vote.

Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz joined Hodgson in complaining that America's farmers were being hurt by the inability to ship grain and other produce from West Coast ports. But at House hearings, Thompson and Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) pointed out that the West Coast union had offered to move agricultural cargoes—as they have in the case of Vietnam military shipments—but the management negotiators rejected the offer.

Newsmen at Hodgson's press conference questioned the labor secretary's claim that the strike was dealing a drastic economic blow to the West Coast in view of the department's own figures—released that same day—showing that a number of West Coast cities had moved out of the substantial unemployment category.

And a story in the Los Angeles Times, by labor reporter Harry Bernstein, cited the fact that California's unemployment rate had actually dropped substantially—from 7.3 to 6.2 percent—during the first 100 days of the strike, which was interrupted last November by an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction.

The article also noted that there is no evidence even of any "significant increase in unemployment among the 300,000 workers linked in various ways with foreign trade."

And a number of shipments that the Administration claimed were lost because of the strike, the newspaper reported, actually were handled at other ports.

Pay Control Floor Sharply Protested

President's own Office of Management & Budget.

The council based its $1.90 figure, it said, on the assumption that there are 1.7 wage earners per family.

Goldfinger described this as "outrageous" and pointed out that the Bureau of Labor Statistics computes the lower level family budget on the basis of one wage earner per family. At today's prices the lower level family budget is $7,332, or $3.53 an hour for one wage earner.

Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), in a letter to Pres. Nixon protesting the council's action, noted that the $1.90 exemption works out to an annual wage of only $3,962, below the 1970 poverty line.

Labor members of the board, seeking an exemption of all wages below $3.50 an hour, declared that if 1970 figures were adjusted for inflation, the poverty line for an urban family of four would come to about $4,200 today.

Reuss called on Nixon "promptly to overrule the Cost of Living Council" and leave the matter to the Pay Board.

He charged that the COL council's action was in clear violation of the autonomy Nixon promised for the Pay Board and the President's assurances that the COL council would not "approve, revise, veto, or revoke" standards and criteria established by the board.

Reuss also cited the language of the act which says that coverage of wage controls shall not extend to "any individual whose earnings are substandard or who is amongst the working poor."

Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.), who sponsored the amendment to the act exempting the working poor from wage controls, also wired Nixon, urging him to rescind the action.

Ryan said the $1.90 maximum was "totally inadequate and a gross violation of congressional intent."

About 15 percent of the work force would be exempt from wage controls under the $1.90 cutoff. Under the $3.50 exemption proposed by labor members of the Pay Board, nearly 50 percent of the labor force would be free from wage control programs.

The COL council already had exempted workers earning the federal minimum wage of $1.60 per hour —$1.30 an hour in the case of farm workers.

And the Pay Board declared that any pay increases required by the federal minimum wage law would be exempt from controls, but that employers would be prohibited from changing established wage bases due to these increases in relation to other pay increases.

The Pay Board's agreement with the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee recognizes that "special circumstances" in the construction industry could warrant wage adjustments beyond the board's announced guidelines.

Specifically, the Pay Board order says, "the CISC will continue to review all scheduled wage increases in the unionized construction industry regardless of company size and will review all economic adjustments including work rules changes. It also will consider intercraft and geographical relationships in reviewing cases submitted by the 17 craft boards."

The Pay Board stipulated that the CISC would review all deferred wage increases to determine if they were inflationary, that fringe benefits would be considered part of the base for computing wage increases, and that the CISC will review all new wage increases before approving them.

Salesmanship Bill Held No Cure for Trade Ills

The United States needs more than better salesmanship to step up its exports of manufactured goods and improve the nation's position in world trade, the AFL-CIO cautioned.

A bill being considered by a Senate subcommittee would set up export promotional machinery, enlist retired businessmen as commercial ambassadors and exempt export associations from antitrust laws.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller described the bill as well-motivated but ineffective in a statement filed with the subcommittee.

"The rise of multinational firms, managed economies, non-tariff barriers and high-speed international transportation and communication have made the bill's proposals unworkable," the federation testified.

Today's trade conditions, the AFL-CIO said, encourage the export of factories, technology and jobs, rather than manufactured goods.

It pointed out that U.S. firms have moved their technology and productive facilities abroad and are now competing with exports from plants here.

"Furthermore," it added, "those same foreign-based, U.S.-owned plants are now pouring an ever-increasing stream of those manufactured goods into the United States. How long can we preserve our factories at home to supply our domestic markets, much less produce for export?"

Rather than merely exhorting industries to step up exports of goods, the AFL-CIO said, Congress should take steps to save the industrial capacity from further erosion.

Specifically, it urged legislation which, among other items, would provide:

- Taxation of U.S. corporations' overseas operations so that they more closely relate to the tax rules domestically.
- Regulation of the torrent of imports that have smothered U.S. production and cost hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs.
- Regulation of the outflow of capital from the U.S. which has sent billions in U.S. dollars, equipment, technology, patents and jobs overseas without regard to the harm done to U.S. citizens and communities.

"What America needs," the AFL-CIO said, "is a comprehensive policy for balanced employment and production here at home.

"The Administration talks of trade proposals that would use remedies applicable to conditions of a decade ago, but are totally out of date for the Seventies."

Seafarers Mourn Kerr, Secretary-Treasurer

Brooklyn, N.Y.—Al Kerr, secretary-treasurer of the Seafarers for the past six years, died unexpectedly at his home in Oradell, N.J., Jan. 26. He was 51.

Kerr joined the SIU in 1943, when the union was still in its formative years. He served the union in various capacities, including dispatcher, organizer, port patrolman (field representative), and trustee of the SIU welfare, vacation and pension plans.

He had been secretary-treasurer of the SIU Atlantic & Gulf District since 1960. He also was the union's fiscal officer from 1961 to 1965, when he was elected secretary-treasurer of the international.

In a message of condolence to Kerr's family, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland expressed sadness at his untimely death.

"He was an energetic and sincere trade unionist," and "his record of service to his fellow men will stand as a lasting tribute to his memory," Meany and Kirkland said.

Kerr is survived by his wife Mildred, three children and one grandchild. Kerr was buried in George Washington Cemetery in Oradell Jan. 29.

Former Head of Litho Union Dies

Chicago—George A. Canary, a president for three years of the Lithographers before the 1964 merger with the Photoengravers, died at 68.

Canary was executive director of the Lithographers & Photoengravers inter-local pension fund when he retired in 1969. He was the founding chairman of the fund.

Canary joined Lithographers Local 4 in Chicago in 1921 and later served as secretary and president of the local. He was president of the Lithographers from 1956 to 1959.

Nixon Challenged On Aerospace Pay

The Machinists have challenged Pres. Nixon to explain what other segments of American society are having their standard of living reduced to the extent of the $353.60 the Pay Board has ordered cut from the annual earnings of aerospace workers.

In an open letter to Nixon, run as an advertisement in daily newspapers of eight aerospace cities, IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith said "the aerospace workers have a right to ask why this has happened to them."

"They have a right to ask what purpose is being served by their sacrifice of $353.60 this year. They have a right to ask what other segments of our society are having their standards of living cut back in the same proportion. So far they have received no answer to their questions."

The IAM represents more than 150,000 aerospace workers.

Meanwhile, in St. Louis, members of IAM District 837 voted to reject a contract offer from the McDonnell-Douglas Corp. that would hold wages to the limit voted by the Pay Board and authorized a strike at the discretion of district leaders.

Of the 10,000 McDonnell-Douglas employes at St. Louis, 6,600 took part in the balloting. They voted 5,671-914 to reject the company proposal and 4,884-1,325 for strike authorization.

District 837 Business Rep. Cosimo (Gus) Troia said the company had offered 8 percent in the first year of a three-year contract, far below the settlement negotiated by the Machinists and Auto Workers for West Coast aerospace workers. Although the Pay Board refused to approve the latter settlements and set a limit of 8 percent on the amount it would approve, the two unions are moving ahead with plans to challenge the action in federal court.

Troia said cost-of-living provisions and fringe benefits offered by McDonnell-Douglas in St. Louis also were far below those in the West Coast settlements which the Pay Board left untouched.

The average hourly base wage at the St. Louis plant is $4.40.

In the open letter to Nixon, the Machinists pointed out that the original West Coast aerospace settlement would have provided wage rates "no higher than those already paid in other industries for comparable work," and the increase would have been "less than the Pay Board has approved in other recent settlements."

The letter pointed out that public members of the Pay Board had indicated while aerospace negotiations were under way that settlement terms were approvable under existing Pay Board standards, but changed their position after the settlements were reached.

"They were convinced that they were doing what you wanted them to," the letter said.

"When aerospace workers protested, a member of your Cabinet—a millionaire many times over [Treasury Sec. John B. Connally Jr.]—speaking to a meeting of other millionaries, talked about 'greedy trade unions' and 'total selfishness.'

"The fact is that aerospace workers are not asking to live like millionaires. They will earn less than $10,000 this year on the average, even if the full increase is approved."

The letter pointed out that it costs about $11,300 a year to maintain an urban family of four at what the Labor Dept. calls "a modest but adequate" standard of living.

"The only income aerospace workers have is what they earn by their labor. They have no expense accounts, no stock options, no bonuses to make it easier.

"Yet instead of helping them, your Administration is lowering their standard of living," the letter charged.

Cutlery Workers Qualify for Aid

About 100 members of the Steelworkers were certified eligible for cash allowances and training because their jobs were severely affected by imports of stainless steel flatware, the Labor Dept. reported.

The USWA filed a petition with the Tariff Commission last October requesting the trade adjustment assistance for the workers who were employed by the Utica Cutlery Co. at plants in Utica and New York Mills, N.Y.

The Labor Dept. said that imports caused a cutback in jobs at the two plants in 1968 and again last year. Besides receiving weekly benefits up to $87 a week, the affected workers are eligible for testing, counseling, training and job placement and relocation.

The agreement provides that each employe will receive the difference between what his gross earnings would have been had he worked the 2,100 hours of the lockout, less his earnings from any interim employment. By agreement, each full claimant's minimum interim earnings were established at $2,750. Partial claimants' minimum earnings were set proportionately less.

Each employe's check will include 12 percent interest for the period up to Feb. 1, 1972. Before payment, National Airlines will deduct federal withholding, state and local taxes where applicable, social security, union dues, and the union's payment for group life and health insurance. The latter two deductions are to be paid to the union.

By agreement, the union and the company will litigate the question of additional vacation credits that the union believes are owed the employes.

The back pay settlement for National Airlines' mechanics tops the previous high of the 1960 Kohler Co. back pay award. The Kohler award ordered by the National Labor Relations Board totaled $4.5 million. It was divided among 1,371 members of the Auto Workers who participated in the six-year strike at Kohler, Wis.

In the current IAM case, the court action was spread over nearly two years. Plato Papps, IAM chief counsel, Atty. Joseph Manners of Miami and Atty. Bernard Dunau of Washington, D.C., argued the case to its successful conclusion.

Two Retired AFL-CIO Field Directors Die

Two retired AFL-CIO regional directors died within a day of each other—Hugh Thompson, former director of the New England region, and Carey E. Haigler, who headed the now consolidated North Carolina-South Carolina region.

Haigler, in poor health for about a year, died in Birmingham, Ala., Jan. 26. Thompson died in Wolfboro, N.H., hospital of a blood disorder the next day. Both were 69.

In messages to the families of Thompson and Haigler, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland extended condolences. They cited the years of dedicated service both men gave to the labor movement and their fellow workers.

Thompson served both the AFL and the CIO before the 1955 merger and headed the six-state New England region for 12 years before he retired in 1967.

Active in the labor movement since 1933, Thompson was a founder and first president of AFL Local 18276 in Detroit, which later became Auto Workers Local 2.

He joined the CIO staff in 1936 and served as director of the western New York region for a number of years. In 1953, Thompson was named CIO New England regional director and retained that post after merger.

Thompson was also highly active in community affairs. He was a trustee of the University of Massachusetts and a member of the New England Board of Higher Education.

Haigler had been an official of a Steelworkers local in Birmingham before being named a USWA field representative. In 1942, he joined the CIO southern organizing staff and took part in the formation of nearly every industrial union in Alabama until 1955.

Following the AFL-CIO merger, he became director of the Carolinas region. Haigler was named the assistant regional director in 1964 of the expanded region of North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee. He retired in 1967.

Mortgage Trust Grows To $30 Million Mark

More union funds are being pumped into the construction of low- and moderate-income housing and into vital social projects as participation in the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust has reached the $30 million mark.

Investment in the MIT grew by almost $6 million in the past six months, reported John Evans, director of the federation's Dept. of Urban Affairs. At that growth rate, Evans said the trust should easily achieve the January 1974 goal of $50 million.

The trust, established in 1964, offers affiliates and labor-management funds opportunities for investment in insured mortgage programs. Besides providing security and a high yield on the investments, the MIT spurs housing construction and helps create more union jobs.

During the past year, construction of 4,000 housing units was completed or started through MIT financing programs.

This building activity translates into about 14 million man-hours of employment for union craftsmen, Evans pointed out.

Most of the MIT projects involve multi-family dwelling units, and loans are limited to federally insured and guaranteed mortgages. These loans in recent years have financed construction projects in California, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, New York, Vermont and Virginia.

A non-housing project the trust is financing is a new community health center on Chicago's near west side. The $2.5 million facility will serve about 25,000 persons—mainly from the minorities—living in a one square mile area.

The new Mile Square Health Center will replace an existing facility which operates in a remodeled apartment building. The center's operations are funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity to provide health care for the poor.

The new structure is expected to be completed in April 1973.

Among the numerous projects financed through MIT loans was the $3 million Penn Circle Towers in Pittsburgh that provides apartments for 152 families.

In Seymour, Ind., a 56-unit complex of six structures was completed last year, employing the factory-built modular construction concept.

The MIT was also involved in a St. Louis urban renewal program that restored 50 inner city homes which had been condemned, thus enabling the residents to remain in their old neighborhood.

Evans reported that among the patricipants in the trust are 34 international and national unions, 31 locals, 16 district councils, five state federations, three central bodies and three building trades councils. The AFL-CIO Staff Retirement and General Funds are also investors.

The yield on the MIT investments has been running at a rate of better than 8 percent for the past year for new investors, a higher return than many pension funds are receiving on other investments, Evans noted.

Union Job Corps Film Available

A new film produced by five AFL-CIO building trades unions sponsoring Job Corps programs for underprivileged youth is now available from the AFL-CIO Film Library. The 27-minute color film, "Lost and Found," which was recently described in the AFL-CIO News, shows how new skills are learned in classroom instruction and on-the-job training in the trades of painting, carpentry, bricklaying, plastering and heavy equipment operation.

Orders for this film can now be placed with the AFL-CIO Film Division, 815 16th St. N.W., Washigton, D.C., 20006. At least two weeks advance notice should be given along with the specific date on which the film will be shown.

The Shifting Tax Burden

BUSINESS GROUPS have been extremely successful in reducing their share of the cost of running the nation.

In 1960, the corporate share of the federal income tax was 35 percent; individuals paid the balance. Although the ratio bobbed and weaved in the early 1960s, a sharp decline began in the latter half of the decade. In 1968 and 1969, when corporate profits skyrocketed to all-time peaks, the corporate contribution to the income tax burden slipped below 30 percent.

And, according to U.S. Treasury estimates made before the enactment of the 1971 tax cuts for business, the tax burden was expected to shift still further away from corporations and toward individuals.

For example, according to the estimates published in last year's federal budget, individuals were expected to pay 72 percent of the nation's income taxes while corporations would pay only 28 percent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972. More recent estimates, taking the current tax changes into account, indicate that corporations will pay only 26 percent in fiscal 1972. Over the decade the corporate share will range around 26 to 27 percent.

Thus, if these estimates prove correct, corporations will have their share of the tax burden reduced from roughly one-third in the early 1960s to only one-fourth by the late 1970s. Individuals, of course, will be making up the balance.

If, in fiscal 1972, corporations kept up their 1960 share of the federal tax burden, federal revenues would be $15 billion higher.

A SIMILAR SHIFTING of the tax burden away from business and onto individual workers and consumers has also occurred in the states and localities.

Between 1957 and 1967, according to a study by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, the business share of the state and local tax burden dropped from 34.2 percent to 29.4 percent.

This means that if businesses had kept paying their relative share of the tax burden, another $4 billion annually, at 1967 tax rates, would have been available to help ease the fiscal pressures faced by most states and virtually every local government.

On property taxes, the subject of much recent controversy, the same study showed that in 1957 business property accounted for 45 percent of total state and local property tax burden. It fell to 42.8 percent in 1962 and down to 39.5 percent by 1967.

No matter what future studies of tax burdens may show, tax relief to a business is a direct and immediate boost in the income and purchasing power of the individual owner, the partners or its shareholders. And the losses in government income and purchasing power are as immediate and direct.

The benefits to workers and consumers, to the extent there are any benefits, occur only after a comparatively long process of trickling and filtering down.

In short, reducing the business share of the tax burden is little different from adding new tax escape hatches for those of wealth and taxpaying ability—shifting the burden to those whose livelihood depends on a paycheck rather than on an interest receipt, a dividend or an asset sold or leased at a profit.

A Word Edgewise:

New Realism Marks Clean-Up Of Campus 'Revolution' Debris

By John P. Roche

IF YOU HAPPENED to inhabit that small, esoteric corner of the American universe populated by the intelligentsia, there was a bizarre aspect to the period 1967-1971. The Revolution was coming! The old order was tottering into the grave! The masses were in motion! Everywhere you turned, you found self-nominated radical messiahs summoning their following to Armageddon. Just one more little push and the most repressive society in history would collapse, and the poor, the blacks, the young, the liberated women, and other random constituencies would build a new community on the rubble.

The din was overpowering, but it was, historically speaking, a bad trip: clinical madness substituted for political theory. Yet the attrition was appalling for those who said so. Take Roy Wilkins or Bayard Rustin of the civil rights movement. A legion of radical black spokesmen popped up around the country to denounce these dedicated men as "honkie stooges" and other variations on "Uncle Tom." (Obviously none of them had read "Uncle Tom's Cabin"—Uncle Tom was a heroic figure.)

When Wilkins or Rustin tried patiently to explain that the United States is not Kenya, that blacks constitute only 11 percent of the population, that the only future for an expanding civil rights movement lay in the politics of coalition, what answer did they get? The witless braying of "Black Power!"

Or meditate on H. Rap Brown's classic message that "violence is as American as cherry pie." Historically he had a point, but it is not one that the traditional victims of violence would be wise to highlight. Indeed, Cassius Clay-Muhammad Ali straightened that one out beautifully. Questioned on a TV show how he felt about arming the Negro population, he asked the interviewer to put his dukes up. The latter, aghast, said he wouldn't last two seconds in a fight with Ali, who agreed and pointed out that armed Negroes would face the same odds.

It was on the nation's liberal arts campuses, however, that the pseudo-revolution had its greatest appeal. Colleges and universities were going to be restructured, reactionaries purged from faculties, grades abolished, and "relevance" imposed on the curriculum. Since extremism in the cause of righteousness is no vice (to paraphrase Barry Goldwater), direct action was resorted to—classes were disrupted, buildings burned, and professors and administrators intimidated.

THE GREAT CAMBODIAN SPASM, which some interpreted as the first stage in a national uprising, was, curiously enough, the last gasp. Nixon remained President, the war continued, and suddenly the great bulk of the population—which is prepared to put up with a lot of nonsense provided it is entertaining—came down with a thud: "This - - - - has got to stop!" The campuses, where the faculty and students had somehow convinced themselves that they were the national majority, were permeated with a new and sobering realism: "My God," one of my students said, "there are 200 million of them out there."

So now we are left with the cleanup job. Symbolic of the new realism in the academy is the dismissal, after elaborate due process, of a tenured member of the Stanford University faculty. Prof. H. Bruce Franklin had been agitating for some strange version of revolution, but he went beyond discussion and advocacy: he urged students to tear the place apart, clearly inciting them to illegal violence. In the riots and guerrilla attacks, Stanford took a beating: the bill for broken glass alone was allegedly more than $100,000. Franklin is out and justly so, but what is remarkable is that his firing brought little more than a large yawn from students and faculty.

Indeed, it ended on a note of bathos. Franklin held a press conference to denounce the "liberal Fascists," and his wife was there carrying an empty carbine. Her husband explained that the gun "is what political power comes from." He may know more about political power than I do, but I can give him some advice on guns: no power ever came from an empty gun.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Policyholders Short-Changed:

Poor Record of Auto Insurance Spurs Call for No-Fault Plan

The following is excerpted from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation 1972 Fact Sheet No. 1 on "No-Fault Auto Insurance."

THE 108 MILLION MOTORISTS in the United States are well aware of the crisis in the auto insurance industry. Arbitrary cancellations, inordinately high premiums, unfair eligibility requirements and insufficient claims compensation all characterize a system aptly described by one state insurance commissioner as a "legalized racket of colossal and cruel proportions."

A recently published 24-volume Dept. of Transportation study on the auto insurance system, reached similar conclusions and handed down the following indictment:

"In summary, the existing system ill serves the accident victim, the insuring public and society. It is inefficient, overly costly, incomplete and slow. It allocates benefits poorly, discourages rehabilitation and overburdens the courts and the legal system. Both on the record of its performance and on the logic of its operation, it does little if anything to minimize crash losses."

Legislation has been introduced in the 92nd Congress proposing various changes in the existing system on a nationwide basis. One concept—no-fault auto insurance—has been advanced in bills introduced in both Houses of Congress.

If enacted, this plan would reduce insurance costs, particularly legal fees, and bring about improved insurance coverage for policyholders. Additionally, those insured would be protected against many of the arbitrary methods characteristic of the present system, especially in the areas of policy cancellation, eligibility standards and costs.

The AFL-CIO, consumer groups and a number of insurance underwriting companies have endorsed the no-fault legislation as a responsive alternative to the present system.

Under the existing tort-liability system a person injured in an automobile accident cannot collect any compensation until fault has been determined—a process which often entails lengthy and expensive court litigation either by the individuals involved or by their insurance companies. Many more inequities are evident. For example, in the Transportation Dept.'s study it was found that the present system:

- Costs $1.07 to operate for every $1.00 paid out in net benefits to victims.
- Pays benefits to only 45 percent of all fatally or seriously injured victims of auto accidents.
- Delays final payments to seriously injured victims or their survivors an average of 16 months.
- Contributes more than 200,000 cases a year to the nation's court load and absorbs more than 17 percent of the country's total judicial resources.

The most recent survey at the national level shows that in 1970, $9.5 billion in premiums were paid by policyholders for personal injury and property damage liability coverage, of which only $4.5 billion was paid in claims for compensable economic losses totaling $13.1 billion.

Of the $9.5 billion in premiums paid to insurance companies, $2.6 billion (equivalent to 60 percent of the amount paid in claims) was spent for lawyers and agent fees and the remaining $2.4 billion went for litigation expenses, overhead and adjustment costs.

It is therefore not surprising that the impetus for reform on the national level has been increasing over the past few years.

Only in two states—out of 33 in which no-fault reform bills were introduced in 1970-71—does there now exist a viable and pragmatic reform program.

IN CONTRAST to the present system, the no-fault auto insurance plan is designed to reduce insurance costs, particularly legal fees, by allowing the parties involved in accidents to settle with their own insurance companies, regardless of fault, thus avoiding expensive court procedures.

For example, if an accident occurs, those injured would seek reparation from their respective insurance companies (first-party insurance) or the company insuring the vehicle in which he or she was a passenger. In the case of an injured pedestrian, compensation would be recovered from the insurance company covering the vehicle causing the damage.

The amount saved by the insurance company from reduced legal costs and other features of the system would be passed on to the policyholder in the form of lower premiums and improved insurance coverage.

In the State of Massachusetts, which in 1970 had the highest rate of personal injury claims among the 50 states, a limited no-fault system was initiated on Jan. 1, 1971. After six months of operation under this plan, statistical data comparing this period with the first six months of 1970, were released and revealed these results:

- 53.2 percent drop in the number of bodily injury claims cases from 66,401 to 31,103.
- 53.4 percent drop in claims paid (from 11,393 to 5,306).
- Decline from $343 to $160 in the average amount of claims paid by the insurance companies.

Although the Massachusetts plan is severely limited in a number of respects (medical coverage limited to $500 and lost wage payments of $2,000; no compensation for pain and suffering losses; and no coverage for property damage), it has produced some significant results and is expected to bring cuts in excess of 20 percent next year.

Burden on Workers:

Nixon Eyes National Sales Tax To Offset Giveaway to Industry

THE AVERAGE TAXPAYER will "pay dearly" for the Administration's tax program adopted last year, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison warned. He predicted that the President will now push for a national sales tax to offset the "giant tax giveaway to corporations."

Pointing out that taxes for a typical four-person family under the 1971 amendments will be cut only about 36 cents a week for 1971 and about $1 a week in 1972, Denison said those small savings will be more than wiped out by the Administration value-added tax.

He said that a 3 percent value-added or national sales tax, for example, "would cost the average family about $200 a year."

"That's a considerable price to pay—in an election year—in a tax bill," Denison declared, as he was questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Denison said "there will be an attempt to package" the sales tax proposal "to make it palatable," but "it will take a great deal of Madison Avenue gimmickry to sell it to the average American."

Value-added taxes are used in many European countries where "there is great difficulty in collecting taxes," he noted. But that's not the case in the United States, he stressed, and "we do not need this kind of very complicated, involved tax" that is applied at every step of the manufacturing, distribution and sales process.

A far better approach, he said, would be solid reform of the tax system to ease the burden that now falls heavily on moderate-income workers and their families. He said that "tax reform is badly needed" in such areas as tax-free bonds, foreign tax credit, capital gains and estate and gift laws, and would produce about the same amount of revenue as a 4 percent national sales tax.

But, he asserted, such reform would strike very heavily in the areas of interest to the "very wealthy and the large corporations," and the President "is disinclined to go that way." He pointed out that "the tremendous tax advantages that wealthy people receive" allow some to "pay no taxes whatsoever" on yearly incomes exceeding $1 million.

By Press Associates, Inc.

MY ADMINISTRATION, Pres. Nixon declared in his budget message, "has begun widespread reform and has sought to take new directions in federal human resources programs."

He spoke of major growth in "outlays for these purposes" from 1969 to 1972, saying that the increases were designed to buy "real improvements" in human resources programs.

The President designated seven areas in which he said that his Administration has made major advances, calling them "a substantial record of progress" but admitting that "our work is far from complete."

The debatable issue on Capitol Hill and throughout the nation is whether this Administration is, in fact, meeting the needs in human resources and whether its claims are justified.

The President, for example, takes credit for "greater benefits for the aged and other beneficiaries under social security."

The record suggests a different picture. For example, in 1969 the President proposed a 7 percent increase in benefits to meet rapidly rising living costs. When it became apparent that Congress—recognizing the critical plight of the elderly—was going to pass a far higher benefit package, Nixon said he would veto any increase above 10 percent.

To get around the threatened veto, Congress had to attach the 15 percent increase to the tax bill which made the social security rise possible.

In 1970, when the Senate Finance Committee was considering benefits above the Administration's 5 percent proposal, White House maneuvers stymied action until the final days of the session when the Senate voted a 10 percent increase.

No action was taken in the House until 1971 when the Administration fought to roll back the increase to 6 percent. The only way Congress could get the 10 percent through was to attach it to other legislation the President could not veto—the rise in the federal debt limit, in this case.

Another claim of the President is that his Administration has brought about "better health care for millions of low-income persons and for the aged."

Last year in his budget message, the President actually recommended that Medicare hospital benefits be sharply reduced.

Under the present program, the elderly are now assured of 60 days of full hospital insurance subject only to an initial out-of-pocket payment of $60 with no co-insurance except from the 61st day to the 90th day.

The Administration urged that the starting point be reduced to 15 days after which co-insurance equal to one-eighth of the deductible would be imposed up to 60 days and one-fourth thereafter.

ON HEALTH CARE, the President came out for a form of national health insurance only after pressure was built up for National Health Security. However, the Administration is seeking only to "regulate the health insurance industry" and not to meet the crisis in health care delivery, which the Kennedy-Griffiths bill would do.

With the increases in unemployment during the first three years of the Nixon Administration, the number of persons below the poverty level has spiraled. However, there has also been a slowdown in the rise in the number of people receiving welfare payments. These cutbacks are directly attributable to the cutbacks by financially strapped state governments, not eased by the federal government.

The Administration itself scheduled a plan which would have denied food stamps to 2.1 million people, effective Feb. 1. Only after protests from a number of governors, mayors and members of Congress did the Administration reverse itself.

In other areas the President has vetoed public works programs, public employment, child care, job corps programs which would have utilized vast human resources now idle.

A NATIONAL SALES TAX will be the price Pres. Nixon will seek to levy on the average taxpayer to cover his "giant giveaway to corporations," AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Michael Posner, left, of United Press International and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Nonlabor Costs Soar As Wages Are Curbed

The Administration's economic stabilization measures have held down wages while leaving nonlabor unit costs untouched, and these costs skyrocketed during 1971, Labor Dept. statistics reveal.

A report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that nonlabor costs per unit of output in the private nonfarm economy—including profits, profit-concealing depreciation write-offs and interest payments—advanced at an annual average of 6.6 percent during 1971.

The figure was nearly double the 3.4 percent advance in unit labor costs.

In addition to profits, depreciation and interest, nonlabor costs include rent and indirect taxes.

While tax depreciation giveaways to big business and high interest rates contributed to nonlabor costs, real compensation per manhour advanced only 2.5 percent as continuing price inflation washed away a major part of the 6.9 percent money compensation per manhour.

In manufacturing, the increase in real compensation was only 1.8 percent.

A BLS report on costs and productivity showed clear evidence of the Nixon Administration's success in holding down wages.

In the fourth quarter of last year, compensation per manhour in the private sector rose at an annual rate of only 4.3 percent, well below the 6.1 percent in third quarter and the 6.9 percent average for the year.

Labor costs per unit rose at an annual rate of only eight-tenths of 1 percent during the fourth quarter—partly due to the wage freeze and partly due to rising productivity.

Another report from the BLS—the first in a new monthly series of statistics on prices, wages, costs, profits and productivity—bore out these findings.

It showed, for example, that nonlabor unit costs rose 11.8 percent from the second to third quarter of 1971—the most recent figure available—while labor unit costs rose only 1 percent.

Regarding productivity during 1971, the BLS said that output per manhour in the private sector rose 3.6 percent—the biggest increase since 1966 and well above the 20-year average of 3 percent.

But the upturn in productivity also reflects a continuing decline in manhours worked in the private sector of the economy, according to the BLS figures.

While the output of goods and services rose 2.9 percent last year, labor input actually decreased by seven-tenths of 1 percent.

In manufacturing, which has been operating at far below its total capacity, labor input dropped 3.7 percent last year, following a 5.3 percent drop in 1970.

High Jobless Rates Persist In 54 Areas

Six of the nation's 150 major labor areas were removed from the Labor Dept.'s "substantial unemployment list" during January, leaving the number of labor markets with jobless rates of 6 percent or more at 54—only 11 less than last October's 10-year high of 65.

The areas removed were Sacramento, San Francisco-Oakland and San Jose, Calif., Rockford, Ill., Boston and Philadelphia.

The six areas dropped only a notch in unemployment rates according to the Labor Dept. classification system. They slipped from the 6-to-8.9 percent category to the 3-to-5.9 percent bracket.

The Labor Dept. defines substantial unemployment as a rate of 6 percent or more with that rate expected to continue for at least two more months.

Four smaller areas were removed from the substantial list, but three were added and two others were added to the "persistent" unemployment category—areas with unemployment of 6 percent or more for the past year and a rate at least 50 percent above the national average for several years.

There are 863 labor areas classified as having either substantial or persistent unemployment.

Rail Union Staffer Russell Blake Dies

Detroit — Russell J. Blake, research director of the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employes for the past year, died while on a union assignment in Chicago. He was 53.

Blake joined the union in 1939 and served as his local lodge's secretary-treasurer for 17 years and as its chairman for 15 years. In addition, he was chairman of the executive board of the union's Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific System Federation.

In Face of High Unemployment:

Manpower Programs Shift To Focus on Job Creation

Manpower programs have been expanding and changing since their inception in the early 1960s in an attempt to keep pace with the nation's needs—especially in the face of mounting unemployment, an article in the Federationist reports.

The early programs focused on retraining workers who had lost their jobs to automation. But in recent years, with the jobless rate holding at the 6 percent level, the thrust has shifted to direct action to lower the unemployment ranks, writes Alan E. Adams in the January issue of the magazine.

"Where project training in a variety of forms had been emphasized in the past, attention turned to the process of job creation," Adams notes.

However, the changes did not come about easily—as evidenced by continued resistance from the Nixon Administration.

"As a consequence and through much pulling and tugging between Congress and the Nixon Administration, the outlines of a broad scale effort to put the unemployed back to work have been drawn," he reports.

One of the major breakthroughs was the enactment of the public emploment program in 1971 that allotted $2.25 billion over the next two years for the creation of 200,000 public service jobs. Adams points out that Pres. Nixon had vetoed similar legislation a few months earlier.

Adams also cites two other key directions assumed by the manpower programs. They are:

- Reorganization and broadening of base program operations to state and local levels.
- Extension of training techniques to enhance upgrading on the job.

The programs first began with passage of the Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962, Adams recalls.

"In a sense, manpower training has been experimental in the first 10 years," he says. "Programs were developed, altered, redirected and redesigned and unemployment persisted—particularly among the disadvantaged, minorities, teenagers and veterans."

It took a long time to realize job creation was the key to piercing swollen joblessness "because it meant a shift from original theory that unemployment would succumb to a trained work force," Adams says.

"One of the most telling arguments" that led to the passage of the Emergency Employment Act to create public service jobs was that "the rate of unemployment would not succumb to the Administration economic policies," he stresses.

Despite the obvious need for federal assistance, Adams notes that EEA jobs have been filled with only moderate success because of Administration guidelines and Labor Dept. regulations.

"As if to blame local governments for the minimal pace of the program, Pres. Nixon wrote personal appeals to governors, mayors and county officials urging the communities to speed up public service hiring, despite his original reluctance to support the program," Adams points out.

An accompanying piece in the magazine cites labor's stand on the public service jobs, which the AFL-CIO convention termed "an important initial step." The statement says in part:

"It would be unfortunate, however, if the program were to be endangered by inept and politically motivated administration. Already funds have been allocated and program agents designated in a manner which distorts the intent and nature of the program in clear violation of Congress.

"We intend to maintain a close watch over the administration of this act and we will bring to the attention of Congress the extent to which it has been ignored or flouted. . . ."

Adams observes that the AFL-CIO has been involved in various manpower programs through its Human Resources Development Institute, state and local central bodies and affiliated unions and locals.

A representative program of worker upgrading in the public sector is being conducted by the State, County & Municipal Employes in Maryland.

The project is under way at 10 facilities of the Maryland State Hospital System in an effort to lift hospital aides out of dead-end jobs and into new career opportunities.

"Over a two-year period," Adams reports, "some 550 trainees have moved up the job ladder to become better-trained, more highly qualified workers."

By creating training and education programs for workers whose advancement after one year was not automatic, AFSCME could qualify them to move into more demanding jobs.

Entry-level positions are also created, Adams reports, as workers who formerly held them begin to move up to a professional, semi-professional or technical level.

Adams says that today's manpower efforts indicate a pattern for the future of decentralization of operations, consolidation of funding, and some decategorization of programs.

Rollcall on Enforcing Equal Opportunity Law

The Senate on Jan. 26 voted 48-46 to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission the power it needs to enforce the ban on job discrimination through "cease and desist" orders. The action confirmed an earlier vote that had been nullified by passage of a motion to reconsider it.

Labor strongly supported the position of the 48 senators who voted for enforcement powers by rejecting an amendment that would have gravely weakened the bill.

All-Out Effort Planned:

Filibuster Holds Up Job Bias Legislation

Supporters of a stronger law against job discrimination fought to break a Senate filibuster launched by southern Democrats and conservative Republicans after the defeat of a series of key amendments aimed at weakening the legislation.

The first two attempts to close debate mustered majority support, but fell short of the two-thirds margin required by Senate rules.

Because of the traditional reluctance of the Senate to invoke cloture in the early stages of a filibuster, the civil rights coalition did not seek to persuade senators with important out-of-town commitments to return for the votes.

But an all-out effort is planned for what is considered the showdown vote, with civil rights supporters from both the Democratic and Republican sides of the aisle meeting to set the timetable.

The labor-backed legislation before the Senate would strengthen the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by giving it power to issue "cease and desist" orders to halt job discrimination based on race, religion, sex, color and national origin. All it can do now is try to persuade offenders to comply voluntarily with the law.

It also would expand coverage of the equal opportunity law to millions of local, county and state employes now exempt, including teachers. And it would cover also presently-exempt small establishments.

The enforcement power proposed for the EEOC is patterned on the machinery the National Labor Relations Board uses to enforce the nation's basic labor law. Opponents sought to substitute a cumbersome system of court enforcement which the House adopted last year by a narrow vote. The court procedure amendment was beaten, 48-46.

Other weakening amendments were rejected by substantial margins. An effort to strike out coverage of public employes was beaten, 59-16. And a move to exempt educational institutions was defeated by a similar margin.

The first effort to limit debate was supported, 48-37, but this was nine votes short of the needed two-thirds. A second try two days later resulted in a 53-35 vote for cloture—an encouraging gain, but still six votes under a two-thirds majority.

Meanwhile, the Senate adopted a two-shift schedule it has used before so that other major bills could be considered during the filibuster.

Under this plan, the Senate puts aside the equal opportunity bill at about 4 p.m. each day and turns to other business.

Using this procedure it took up a foreign aid appropriations bill in a new effort to reach agreement on spending for aid programs in a fiscal year that is already more than half over.

In a related area, the House passed a series of bills authorizing continued American contributions to the various international development banks that provide loans for high-priority projects in underdeveloped nations.

The House amended the legislation to bar U.S. support for loans to any nation that fails to take adequate steps to prevent international traffic in drugs.

HIGH FEDERAL STANDARDS are vitally needed for the workmen's compensation system to provide just benefits for workers and their survivors, Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke testifies. Burke, second from left in the foreground, was one of nine labor representatives testifying at hearings of the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws.

NLRB Examiner Cracks Down On Employer, Sweetheart 'Union'

A trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board has recommended a hard-hitting crackdown on a notorious "sweetheart" organization in the New York area that masquerades as a union.

He proposed to dissolve the contract between Amalgamated Local 335 and a Long Island auto dealer, compel the union and employer to reimburse employes for dues and initiation fees paid to the fake union, and require the union and employer to reimburse an Auto Workers local for its organizing expenses and attorney fees paid in connection with the labor board hearings.

The so-called "Amalgamated Local 335" is not affiliated with any union or union federation, in or out of the AFL-CIO. It has a long history of labor law violations involving collusion with employers to freeze out legitimate unions and sign substandard contracts covering workers.

In recognition of this past history, Trial Examiner Stanley N. Ohlbaum also recommended that:

- For a three-year period, Local 335 be barred from obtaining recognition to represent any new group of workers except through an NLRB secret election. Its past practice had been to obtain consent recognition from employers on the basis of alleged card authorizations—generally obtained by foremen and other management officials, the examiner noted.
- Also for the next three years, all membership applications and authorization cards of Local 335 would have to prominently display the following statement:

"The National Labor Relations Board has found this union guilty of collusion with employers to violate the rights of employes, and this union has been adjudged to be in contempt of court."

The court reference is based on fines levied by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals against Local 335 and two of its officials, Bernard Tolkow and Henry Stirt, for violation of previous NLRB orders involving similar cases of sweetheart agreements.

The trial examiner, in fact, listed 15 such violations by the fake union.

In urging the NLRB to uphold his recommendations and take forceful action against the so-called local, Ohlbaum said the time is "more than ripe" for such a crackdown.

"It should not be necessary," he said, "for the federal agency armed with responsibility for policing industrial relations to 'fox hunt' recidivists to earth with the same dull weapons which have repeatedly proved ineffective in the past. Nor is the board required to play hide-and-seek with violators of the National Labor Relations Act."

In the specific case, the trial examiner noted that the Auto Workers local had several years ago won an NLRB election to represent workers at the company, Russell Motors, Inc., and the company was found guilty by the NLRB of refusal to bargain in good faith and seeking to oust the union.

The examiner noted that the firm continued in its hostility "to the extent of threatening to go out of business" and then "foisted a sweetheart union" on its workers.

If the NLRB backs up its trial examiner's recommendations, both the employer and Local 335 will be compelled to post notices declaring their guilt in clear and simple terms.

The so-called local, for example, would have to say that the NLRB found that it had violated the law guaranteeing the workers the right to be represented by labor organizations of their own free choice "by entering into a sweetheart contract with Russell Motors . . . after using Russell supervisors to get Russell employes to sign Local 335 membership cards."

Firm Ordered to Pay Legal Costs For 'Frivolous' Refusal to Bargain

The National Labor Relations Board in a landmark decision ordered a company to reimburse the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the board for legal expenses incurred as a result of the company's "frivolous" refusal to bargain.

The case stems from refusal of Tiidee Products, Inc., at Dayton, O., to bargain with the IUE in 1967.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings hailed the award of legal costs as "an important breakthrough for unions in their efforts to overcome employer obstructionism in resisting workers' right to collective bargaining."

"The costs to the IUE in this case come to many thousands of dollars; the expense to the taxpayers totals additional thousands," Jennings observed.

He said, however, that the NLRB ruling still fell short of full protection of workers' rights.

He noted that the board failed to follow a court recommendation that it "make whole" workers for their losses "as a result of not having a collective bargaining agreement in four years that have passed since they voted for IUE representation."

Jennings said the Labor Board decision "takes this case only halfway to justice. The IUE intends to pursue it until full justice is achieved."

The union has petitioned the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Washington, D.C., to review the board's order.

The IUE said the Tiidee case, like the Auto Workers famed Ex-Cell-O case, provides a focal point of organized labor's efforts to get the Labor Board to provide effective remedies against employers who unlawfully refuse to negotiate with a duly certified bargaining agent.

Organized labor has long protested that inadequate remedies applied by the NLRB enable managements to profit from long legal battles over refusal to bargain during which union strength is sometimes dissipated through employe turnover and frustration.

Besides reimbursing the IUE and the NLRB, the board's order requires Tiidee to:

- Give the IUE access to company bulletin boards for union notices during the course of contract negotiations.
- Furnish the union with up-to-date lists of the names and addresses of company employes for a period of one year.
- Mail to each employe an NLRB-prescribed notice pledging not to commit further unfair labor practices, to take certain remedial actions and to bargain collectively with the union.

In February 1969, the board issued an order directing Tiidee to bargain, but it did not grant the union's request for a broader remedial order that would have made employes whole for wages and benefits lost due to the company's refusal to bargain. The union also sought reimbursement for lost dues and initiation fees because its standard practice was to waive dues and fees until a contract was executed.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Washington upheld the NLRB order, but sent the case back to the board for further consideration on the question of additional remedies.

Although the board decided that it did not have the authority to issue the "make-whole remedy" for employes, it held that ordering Tiidee to pay litigation costs "will undo some of the baneful effects" that were found to have resulted from the company's "clear and flagrant violation of the law."

Board Members John H. Fanning, Howard Jenkins, Jr. and Ralph E. Kennedy said the remedies contained in the NLRB decision will "aid the union in rebuilding its strength so that it may bargain effectively."

They suggested that the order directing Tiidee to pay litigation costs would discourage similar "brazen" refusals to bargain.

NLRB Chairman Edward B. Miller concurred in the decision but issued a separate opinion in which he expressed the belief that the effect of the order was to "ally this board with the union's organizational efforts."

'71 Settlements Show Average Of 8.1 Percent

Average wage increases negotiated in major collective bargaining agreements during 1971 dipped to 8.1 percent measured over the life of the contracts, down from the 8.9 percent average for 1970 settlements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Settlements included in the 1971 tabulations cover nearly 3.5 million workers in railroad, auto, agricultural implement, can, aluminum, steel, copper, communications, apparel and bituminous coal jobs.

The BLS said an additional 500,000 workers were affected by settlements reached after Nov. 13 and were not included in the 1971 statistics because they had not been acted on by the Pay Board during the year.

Major contracts covering 4.5 million workers expired last year, but not all had been renewed by the end of 1971 and the settlement terms of some were not yet known by the BLS, the report said.

Wage increases in contracts with cost-of-living escalators also declined from 1970, dropping to 7.1 percent from 7.3 percent. The average pay gain in contracts without the escalators was 9.2 percent, a drop from the 10.1 percent of the previous year.

Although the average wage increase in manufacturing settlements increased to 7.2 percent from 6 percent a year before, the average in nonmanufacturing industries declined sharply from 11.5 percent in 1970 to 9.0 percent last year.

Asks Major Assault on Poverty:

Labor Presses New Drive On Social Security, Welfare

as well as the House bill's proposed cutback in full hospitalization coverage.

● On social security and Medicare financing, the AFL-CIO urged a further step-up in the taxable wage base from the $10,200 in the House bill to "at least $15,000." Labor also stressed the need for a share of the social security cost to be met from general government revenues.

● The House-passed bill narrows eligibility for Medicaid, the federal-state program of medical services for low-income persons regardless of age. It also would impose a set of charges based on income and reduce the scope of covered services. "These amendments would fatally undermine the promise and potential of this program," the AFL-CIO warned.

● The present form of the family assistance plan—the welfare reform section of the House bill—is "unacceptable" to the AFL-CIO.

The basic approach is sound—to provide "an income floor for those who can't work but are eligible for welfare payments and provide an incentive for all who can work to improve their income."

Biemiller and Seidman strongly supported the amendment originally introduced by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) which would raise the guaranteed income level to $3,000 for a family of four with no wage earner and provide welfare supplements for the working poor in gradually reduced amounts up to about $5,600 a year in total income.

Ribicoff, irked at the sniping by the Nixon Administration at his amendment at the same time that the Administration was expecting him to carry the ball for welfare reform against the adamant opposition of the conservative lineup on the Finance Committee, said earlier in the hearings that he was dropping his amendment to supplement the income of the working poor. Instead, he proposed a series of pilot programs to test the workability and cost of the program.

The AFL-CIO witnesses urged that the legislation provide for full implementation of the program after a testing period so that the already two-year-old drive for welfare reform wouldn't have to start from scratch.

Ribicoff said the concept of welfare reform is good. But he protested that he has received "no support" from the Administration and is convinced that "the President doesn't really believe in it."

After Ribicoff's blast, top Administration officials hastened to Capitol Hill to make peace with the Connecticut senator, who is a former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

Press reports indicated that substantial agreement was reached on support for legislation that would set a firm date for a national welfare reform program, preceded by smaller-scale tryouts of pilot programs. Congress would have an opportunity to change the basic program if it wasn't satisfied with the results of the pilot projects.

Biemiller and Seidman strongly urged that welfare recipients able to work be assigned only to jobs that pay at least the federal minimum wage or the prevailing wage, whichever is higher.

They vigorously protested proposals to subsidize employers by using federal funds to pay part of the payroll costs or to allow hirings below the minimum wage with welfare grants making up the income loss.

Such devices, Seidman noted, would depress standards for workers now employed and would be an incentive for companies never to raise the wages of their lowest-paid workers.

Testimony by the AFL-CIO, by Pres. George Hardy of the Service Employes and by Paul Minarchenko for the State, County & Municipal Employes urged strong protections for the job rights and working conditions of local and state employes currently administering welfare programs.

The final form of the legislation, Hardy said, should include continuation of collective bargaining rights for welfare workers shifted into the federal system and economic assistance to those not required for the new program.

The National Council of Senior Citizens protested the inadequacy of the 5 percent social security benefit increase in the House-passed bill.

Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the 3-million-member council, said that if Congress accepts the recent actuarial recommendations of the government's Social Security Advisory Council, benefits could be immediately raised 20 percent without any increase in the social security tax.

The Senate committee also heard a strong endorsement for liberalizing the House-passed family assistance program from John E. Cosgrove, social development director of the United States Catholic Conference, the arm of the nation's Catholic bishops.

The group's proposals closely corresponded to the recommendations of the AFL-CIO witnesses.

Two to Get Ready

Legislative Report Cites Backlog of Major Bills

The unfinished business of the 92nd Congress overshadows the accomplishments of the first session in the AFL-CIO's annual legislative report.

A new edition of Labor Looks at Congress provides both a detailed account of the progress of major bills and a five-page foreword that analyzes the effect of the conflict between Congress and the Nixon Administration.

The pamphlet, latest in a continuing series, was prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation and its director, Andrew J. Biemiller.

It recites the efforts of the White House to block needed social legislation and push "programs accommodating the narrow, more conservative concerns of big business."

The tactics used, "regrettably, with some success," included vetoes, veto threats and withholding of appropriated funds."

Similar tactics can be expected during the 1972 session, the pamphlet notes.

"The AFL-CIO believes this opposition can and must be overcome," the foreword concludes. "America's needs are too important to permit the narrow views of this Administration to prevent progress in this country."

The body of the pamphlet recites the background and step-by-step legislative progress of bills the AFL-CIO supported or opposed during the 1971 congressional year.

They are grouped under broad headings: Jobs and the Economy; Housing and the Environment; Health, Education and Welfare; Consumer Protection; Labor Legislation; Civil Rights, Civil Liberties; Elections, Congressional Reform, and Foreign Affairs.

And a concluding section, Unfinished Business, in effect presents labor's agenda for the second session of Congress that is now under way.

It includes such high priority issues as National Health Security, minimum wage improvements, foreign trade legislation, social security and welfare reform.

Single copies of Labor Looks at Congress 1971, Publication 77M, are available free from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Additional copies are 15 cents each or $13.50 for 100.

Companies Flunk Learning Test, Reinforce AFL-CIO Opposition

The conclusion that business-run programs have failed to improve the learning ability of public school children reinforces the AFL-CIO position against performance contracts, Education Director Walter G. Davis said.

The contracts got a poor report card from the Office of Economic Opportunity, which had signed up six firms to bring their teaching machines into 18 school districts across the country.

After a one-year experiment costing $5.6 million, the OEO concluded that the business-operated classes for 13,000 children had produced "no significant improvement" in reading or mathematics achievement.

When the contracts were signed in 1970, OEO hailed the programs as a way to boost achievement, cut costs and make schools accountable for results.

At that time, Davis said the AFL-CIO "was concerned with the attempted departure of the federal government from a public education system as it has been developed."

"We documented previous experiences with this system by other countries," Davis noted, "and held that the profit motive did not have any effect in developing the abilities of American young people to master reading and mathematics."

In announcing the agency's disappointment in the performance of the education companies' programs, OEO Director Philip V. Sanchez said his agency would not pay for any more business-run ventures in the schools.

Before the results of the year-long achievement study were made available, another OEO study determined that the contracted programs were costing more than regular classes. The new results showed that the 13,000 students involved in the company-run programs did no better than other low-income children.

Davis said that labor hails the "forthrightness of the OEO in reporting the results of the evaluation and in indicating its willingness to go back to the drawing board."

"It would be helpful if in the future serious attention is given to the views of American teachers who are on the front line of the awesome struggle to bring about quality education for all Americans," he added.

Both the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association said the OEO report proved them right in their opposition to performance contracting.

In reviewing Pres. Nixon's budget proposal for education, Davis also expressed concern that inadequate funding seriously jeopardizes effective programs developed by Congress.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Davis said that Nixon's new $16 billion budget request "is not nearly enough" to bring the lagging educational system "up to par."

He pointed out that a great many of the programs designed to achieve "real quality education" are funded at only half or less of the authorized amount, noting that the Higher Education Act, for example, receives only 27 percent of the funds Congress approved for it.

Davis said a lack of "leadership" toward shaping "a solid system . . . a master plan" has resulted in "disagreement and division within the education community itself." And, he stressed, the multitude of specialized lobbies and "educational entrepreneurs . . . each with a new scheme and a new machine" to improve learning have helped "bog things down."

The AFL-CIO will "try to provide the leadership" needed in relationships with Congress to achieve a coordinated effort, he declared.

Davis said the Administration's "revenue-sharing approach" might take "the tension away from Washington . . . in a presidential election year," but it is not the key to more effective help at the local school level.

Key provisions of unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation laws in every state are listed in a newly-revised chart published by the AFL-CIO.

Benefit levels and coverage are shown as of Jan. 1, 1972.

Labor-Backed Democrat Wins In Louisiana

Baton Rouge—Strong labor support helped elect Democrat Edwin W. Edwards governor of Louisiana in a hard-fought campaign against a well-financed conservative Republican.

Edwards, who has represented a southwest Louisiana district in Congress since 1965, is considered significantly more liberal than incumbent Gov. John J. McKeithen (D).

In the general election, Edwards defeated Republican David Treen with about 57 percent of the vote. Last December, Edwards won a runoff primary for the nomination.

He had labor backing in the primary as well, and Congressional Quarterly magazine at the time described his victory as having been "made possible by a coalition—the first of its kind in decades in Louisiana—of blacks and low-income whites."

Forced Arbitration Voted Despite Accord on Docks

Profits Post Biggest Rise Since 1965

The nation's businessmen wound up the year 1971 with the sharpest gain in after-tax profits for any single year since 1965, according to surveys reported by three national publications.

And some of the cleared profits were a direct result of the helping hand given big business by the Nixon Administration in the form of accelerated tax writeoffs and credits.

The Wall Street Journal noted that in the case of high and unexpected steel profits that the fourth quarter's favorable results "were in many cases attributable to various tax credits and bookkeeping procedures."

"U.S. Steel for example, was aided by $48 million in fourth-quarter tax credits, a fact that had considerable impact on its 18.9 percent gain in that period."

Business Week said that "U.S. business could have loafed through the fourth quarter of 1971 and still earned more money than it did a year earlier, when the long General Motors strike sent corporate profits tumbling."

Business Week estimated net income to business as 20 percent higher than the $39.2 billion seasonally adjusted annual rate of the fourth quarter of 1970.

The magazine quoted the Commerce Dept. as estimating fourth-quarter profits after taxes at an annual rate of $48.8 billion. The Commerce Dept. put profits for all of 1971 at $47.4 billion, against $41.2 billion in 1970—the sharpest gain for any single year since 1965.

"The real strength in the fourth quarter, as it was through all of 1971, was with the companies that sell to consumers, and the companies that one way or another are involved with residential construction," Business Week said.

The Wall Street Journal surveyed 464 of the nation's firms and reported that their after-tax profits were up an average of 25.3 percent over the fourth quarter of 1970.

The Journal noted that although more than half of the 25.3 percent increase was due to a rebound by General Motors, the remaining 463 firms had earnings averaging 10.2 percent above the previous year.

Economic analysts were quoted by the Journal as saying that steel made a strong and unexpected showing with the earnings of 22 steel companies showing an increase of 43.6 percent in the fourth quarter.

Fourteen auto and automotive equipment manufacturers reported after-tax profits in excess of $596

Congress Gives In To Nixon's Demand

By David L. Perlman

Congress ignored a negotiated settlement of the West Coast dock strike and, under Administration prodding, passed a standby compulsory arbitration law.

Its action threw a damper over the initial elation at the news from the bargaining table. And it raised a big question mark over the impact of the forced arbitration threat on the contract ratification vote.

The Administration had scoffed at reports that the dispute was near settlement, and even after union and management negotiators announced an agreement, lobbyists from the White House and Labor Dept. kept up a steady pressure for passage of the bill.

It rolled through the Senate by a 79-3 margin. There was a stiffer battle in the House where the Democratic leadership and a majority of the House Labor Committee sought to block action in the wake of the strike settlement agreement. But a conservative coalition mustered a 203-170 majority on the key vote and the President had his compulsory arbitration bill.

The Senate, however, did rebuff a Republican effort to tie to the dock bill the permanent legislation sought by the Administration to impose a form of compulsory arbitration on all labor disputes in transportation-linked industries.

Although the union involved in the West Coast dispute—the Longshoremen & Warehousemen—is not an AFL-CIO affiliate, the federation took a strong stand against the attempt to bypass the bargaining table.

Jobless Rate Hangs Near 6% Mark

By Tom Castor

The nation's unemployment picture remained "essentially unchanged" during January, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported, with the jobless rate still hovering around the 6 percent mark—where it has been for the past 14 months.

The unemployment rate dipped to 5.9 percent in January from December's revised rate of 6 percent.

The BLS explained that the December figure was revised downward from 6.1 percent to 6.0 percent as a result of applying new statistics from the 1970 decennial census to the development of data on the civilian labor force, employment and unemployment.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, employment rose by 240,000 to 80.6 million. Unadjusted figures showed a drop of 1 million—less than is usual at this time of year.

The actual number of jobless workers increased by 750,000 to 5.4 million—near the 10-year high of 5.5 million unemployed reached last July.

But because unemployment us-

'Compulsory Poverty':

Abel, IUE Challenge $1.90 Wage Cutoff

The Nixon Administration is enforcing "compulsory poverty" as a result of the Cost of Living Council's decision to exempt only wages up to $1.90 an hour from pay controls, Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel declared.

Abel, one of the five labor members of the Pay Board, called for hearings on the council's action—as provided for in the Economic Stabilization Act—in a sharply worded letter to Donald Rumsfeld, executive director of the council.

In other developments, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers filed suit in the U.S. District Court at Washington, D.C. in an effort to block the COL council's action.

The IUE suit asks the court to bar the council from putting the $1.90 exemption into effect and to direct it to exempt all wages below $3.35 an hour from the government's economic stabilization programs.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had denounced the Cost of Living Council's limited exemption as "callous and intolerable." The labor members of the Pay Board had sought exemption of all wages under $3.50 an hour, noting that the Bureau of Labor Statistics lower level family budget for an urban family of four would be more than $7,000 at today's prices—nearly twice the amount exempt from controls under the council's ruling.

The council based its figures on the assumption that there are 1.7 wage earners per family so that only $3,962 per individual worker is needed to meet the lower-level standard of living. Dividing that figure by "an assumed 2,080 hours per year gives an hourly wage rate of $1.90," the council said. The Pay Board's labor members pointed out, however, that the BLS budgets are calculated on the basis of one wage earner per family.

Abel's letter to Rumsfeld said "it was with disbelief, shock and dismay that we learned of the council's action which restricts

Debt Limit Bill Used To Press Tax Reform

A labor-supported drive for tax reform picked up strong support in the House and Pres. Nixon was told that his next request for a rise in the national debt ceiling will meet a cool reception unless the Administration comes up with proposals to plug tax loopholes.

The President had asked for a $50 billion increase in the debt ceiling — an amount sufficient to cover anticipated deficit spending beyond Election Day.

Instead, the House voted only a $20 billion increase to enable the government to pay its bills until June 30. That would force the Administration to come back for new legislation this spring.

Before it does, House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) told the President, it had better get behind a plan to increase government revenue by cutting off some of the escape hatches the rich use to avoid taxes.

The blunt letter by Mills reflected a strategy developed by Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and a

Aerospace Unions Push Suits Against Pay Board

The Machinists and the Auto Workers moved ahead with court challenges to the Pay Board's ruling that denied more than 200,000 aerospace workers part of the increases they would have received under agreements negotiated by the two unions.

The UAW was first to file in the U.S. District Court at Washington, D.C. Its suit seeks a declaratory judgment that the aerospace contracts are legal, that the amounts negotiated should be paid and that the Pay Board acted unlawfully in denying the full pay increases provided in the agreements. The Machinists said the IAM suit would be filed within a week.

In other developments, the Pay Board acted to widen its scrutiny of deferred wage increases with a ruling that deferred raises of more than 7 percent covering units of 1,000 or more workers must be reviewed in advance by the board.

The board also modified its policy on merit raises applying a 5.5 percent guideline but making allowance for wide and varied exceptions.

Meanwhile, Judge George H. Boldt was formally confirmed by the Senate as chairman of the Pay Board despite organized labor's strong objections that he lacks qualifications for the post. The Senate

Nixon's 1971 Bonanza to Business Sets Back Drive for Tax Justice

Labor's goal of tax justice is more distant than ever as the result of the tax bonanza Congress gave to business and industry at the urging of the Nixon Administration.

Arnold Cantor, an AFL-CIO economist, describes the impact of the 1971 tax legislation as "a giant step backward."

In an article in the January issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine, Cantor terms the sharp reduction in corporation taxes "utterly lacking in economic or social justification."

He spotlights two critical defects of the new legislation:

- It decreases the share of the federal tax revenue paid by corporations, thus sharply reducing the business community's contribution to the costs of running the nation. At the same time, it increases the proportion of tax revenues taken from wage and salary earners.

- It severely limits the government's ability to meet the nation's needs by reducing the amount of revenue taken in.

"In a nation faced with glaring and obvious needs for sharply increased public investments in schools, hospitals, medical facilities, housing, mass transit and pollution controls, a tax-cutting spree is a luxury we obviously can ill afford," Cantor stresses.

Over a 10-year period, the article notes, the federal government will lose an estimated $100 billion in badly-needed revenue as a result of the new tax law.

"Of that $100 billion, individuals will receive $17 billion in income tax breaks while business will receive over $83 billion—a ratio of almost 5-1 in favor of business."

The tax changes, Cantor comments, are in line with the entire tenor of Pres. Nixon's economic game plans "to radically redistribute the nation's tax resources in favor of businessmen and the rich."

The tragedy, though, is that the tax cuts "are not temporary expedients for their damaging effects will continue long after this Administration's dismal record of economic mismanagement ceases to be news."

Corporations paid about one-third of the nation's taxes 10 years ago and will pay only about one-fourth in this decade.

The article spells out the harmful effects of the new tax loopholes opened up by the Administration and Congress—the accelerated depreciation formula which enables wealthy corporations to play accounting games at the expense of federal revenues, the investment tax credit which flows to businesses "whether they increase their rate of investment in machinery and equipment, decrease it or carry on as before," and the export sales gimmick which broadens existing tax loopholes.

But the trend towards taking a bigger proportionate bite out of the income of the ordinary wage earner won't stop with the 1971 tax law—if the Nixon Administration has its way.

The Federationist article takes a sharp look at the so-called "value-added" tax which the Administration is preparing to promote through a massive propaganda campaign.

The article stresses that the value-added tax is nothing but a national sales tax—which is ultimately passed on in its entirety to the consumer.

A portion of the tax is paid to the government at each stage of the process—from manufacturer to wholesaler to retailer. The wholesaler reimburses the manufacturer for the tax he has paid and pays the government an additional tax. The retailer reimburses the wholesaler for his entire cost—and adds the amount on to the price the consumer pays.

The consumer, of course, ends up paying the entire amount.

Cantor describes the value-added tax as "the darling of those who feel the federal corporate and individual income tax system overburdens wealthy individuals and businesses and treads too lightly on those whose incomes are modest."

Medical Experts Refute Racist Claims on Blood

Community services representatives of the AFL-CIO are being alerted to a new wave of racism that has emerged with greater awareness of sickle cell anemia—the genetic disease that exclusively affects Negroes.

Community Services Director Leo Perlis warned in a letter to the CSA representatives that new efforts are being launched to encourage segregation of blood plasma in blood banks along racial lines.

Perlis pointed out that although top medical authorities have rejected the theory that sickle cell anemia may be passed on through blood transfusions, racist groups continue to keep the myth alive.

Noting that these groups are attempting to restore the labeling of blood plasma by race, Perlis said that more than 25 years ago, "the American labor movement fought for the desegregation of blood—and won."

"We have no intention to lose this battle by permitting new myths to result in new racism," he stressed.

In letters to the Surgeon General of the United States, the American Red Cross and the Stanford University Medical Center, Perlis posed this question: "Can sickle cell anemia be transferred through blood transfusions?"

Answering for the Surgeon General, the Heart & Lung Institute of the National Institutes of Health said:

"The condition is transmitted only through inheritance; it cannot be transmitted through blood transfusion."

The Red Cross also said the disease is not transferable through transfusions. It further pointed out that "it is unlikely that patients with sickle cell anemia will ever turn up as blood donors because of the severity of their illness and would not be accepted because of anemia."

From Prof. J. Garrot Allen of the Stanford Medical Center came this response:

"The answer is a categoric no. It cannot possibly be transferred by transfusion in the sense of inducing sickle cell anemia in the patient receiving the blood."

Citing the replies to his inquiry, Perlis suggested that "we should be in a better position to combat the myth mongers and to help in legitimate voluntary efforts designed to combat sickle cell disease."

Burns Urges 'Flexibility' —On Prices, Not Wages

Arthur F. Burns thinks prices should be allowed to go up faster but the lid on wages should be tightened.

Burns is chairman of the Federal Reserve System and was the architect of Pres. Nixon's economic game plan that pushed up both unemployment and inflation.

In testimony before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, Burns said the Price Commission should be more flexible in allowing price increases because businessmen need capital to expand.

But he complained that the Pay Board has been too generous in approving "inflationary compromises" on wage increases.

Burns also reiterated his call for a law imposing compulsory arbitration of major labor disputes.

And he predicted that 1972 will be a glowing year for the nation's economy.

'Compulsory Poverty':

such relief to workers earning $1.90 an hour or less."

"By your decision, the United States government is enforcing compulsory poverty through your agency while supposedly combatting poverty through other programs," Abel charged.

The USWA president said that although the $1.90 figure is based on a 40-hour week for 52 weeks a year, the average American worker hasn't worked a 40-hour week since 1948.

"Hence, even the outside maximum . . . is an illusory figure under the council's $1.90 per hour ruling," he said.

Abel urged the council to rescind its action and instead exempt workers earning less than $7,000 a year, which Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), chairman of the House Banking & Currency Committee, said was the clear intent of Congress in passing amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act of 1971.

Abel requested a hearing on the council's action—as provided under the act—"to afford the United Steelworkers of America, and other interested parties, the opportunity to develop fully the comments expressed" in his letter.

The IUE's suit, calling for exemption from controls of all wages below $3.35 an hour, said this would mean that an estimated 20 million more workers could receive pay increases not subject to the limitations of the Pay Board.

In announcing the filing of the suit, IUE Pres. Paul Jennings charged that the COL Council's action "restricting exemptions to less than $1.90 is a deliberate attempt to violate the intent of Congress. Since this action was taken by the Cost of Living Council, made up of Cabinet members and other high Administration officials, it must be laid at the door of Pres. Nixon himself."

"With the inception of Phase 2," Jennings said, "we have seen the Price Commission grant exemption after exemption from price control regulations to merchants, manufacturers, landlords and other businessmen. Controls on profits are so loose that a 40 percent increase is permissible. The steady and substantial increase in food prices goes unchecked.

"Yet Pres. Nixon has seen fit to jam a lid on the wages of the principal victims of inflation—the millions of workers near the bottom of the economic ladder.

"It is a cruel blow at America's working poor. Of these hard-pressed citizens, the President is saying, 'Let them eat cake.' "

White Collar Steel Units Win Service Bonus Plan

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers have negotiated a landmark "service bonus plan" for 15,000 salaried office and technical employes which could mean an annual bonus of several hundred dollars to be paid around Christmas.

The bonus plan, announced by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, resulted from 1971 negotiations between the USWA and the nine largest basic steel companies.

That settlement included a provision that the companies set aside 10 cents an hour for each hour worked by employes in the salaried bargaining units of steel producing operations—effective Aug. 1, 1971—pending further negotiations to determine how the money was to be allocated.

Talks concluded Jan. 17 with agreement on a formula based on bonus credits for hours worked, annual hours worked, total number of employes in each seniority grouping and the employe's length of service.

The longer the length of service and the greater the number of hours worked, the greater the bonus, the union said.

At U.S. Steel, for example, employes will receive bonuses averaging $263, and under normal working conditions at that company, bonuses could range from $103 annually for employes in the lowest eligible seniority bracket to $533 for those in the highest brackets.

An employe at U.S. Steel with 20 years service who worked 2,000 hours during a 12-month calculation period would receive an annual bonus of $294. But an employe with the same amount of service, who worked only 1,400 hours during the same period would receive a bonus of $205.80.

The union pointed out that the bonus amounts would vary from company to company because of differences in the seniority mix.

The USWA said it is now seeking the same bonus plan for office and technical employes at other steel firms.

At the same time, the union announced that it has reached a similar agreement, called an "attendance bonus plan" for iron ore miners working in non-incentive, hourly-paid jobs.

Dystrophy Group Names McClennan to Board

Houston, Tex.—Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters, has been elected to the policy-making board of directors of the Muscular Dystrophy Associations of America, it was announced at the organization's annual meeting here.

The Fire Fighters and the union's local affiliates have since 1954 given volunteer services in support of MDAA organizations.

Despite Dock Settlement:

Congress Yields to Nixon, Imposes Forced Arbitration

miller stressed the labor movement's opposition to forced arbitration.

The AFL-CIO is "unalterably opposed to any legislation which would deny freedom of contract to workers and management by imposing compulsory arbitration," Meany wired.

And in an article for the New York Times, sent to all congressmen, Meany charged that the Administration had grossly exaggerated the economic consequences of the strike and had impeded a settlement by holding out the promise of government intervention to force the workers back. (See editorial, Page 4.)

Meanwhile, a caucus of local union leaders was to meet in San Francisco to set the date for a ratification vote and to decide whether ILWU members should return to work before the vote.

Details of the settlement were not officially announced, but negotiators said they had reached agreement on all economic issues in dispute and had agreed on voluntary arbitration of several non-money issues.

If the settlement is ratified by the members, it will be subject to Pay Board approval.

If the compulsory arbitration law is invoked, the arbitrator's decision will be final. But the legislation directs that the arbitration decision be "consistent with the policy of the Economic Stabilization Act."

The original Administration bill would have directed the Secretary of Labor to choose the arbitration board. But the version drafted by the Senate Labor Committee and approved intact by the Senate and House permits the two parties to choose the arbitrator. If they are unable to agree, the selection will be made by the chief judge of the federal district court in Northern California.

Before the settlement was reached at the bargaining table, the House Labor Committee had approved a bill that would have required the longshoremen to load shipments of military cargo—which they have been doing throughout the strike—all food products, and all cargo to and from Hawaii, Alaska and Guam during a 60-day period. But the strike could have continued for all other cargoes.

The Rules Committee, however, took the rare action of blocking the Labor Committee bill and sending to the floor its own resolution which would enable the House to vote directly on the Senate-passed bill.

A brief congressional recess for traditional GOP Lincoln's Birthday speaking engagements was used by compulsory arbitration supporters as an excuse for insisting on passage of the bill despite the tentative settlement.

Opponents, led by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.) argued in vain that it would be folly for Congress to blunder into the midst of the ratification procedure when it would be back in session the following week if the settlement should fall through.

"Let them tend to their business and let us stay out of it," Thompson urged. Compulsory arbitration, he insisted, is no way to bring labor and management together.

Never before, Bolling said, has the House "passed legislation purporting to establish a method of settling a strike after it has been announced by the parties involved that they had arrived at a settlement."

The key procedural vote of 203-170 for immediate consideration of the compulsory arbitration bill was followed by a 214-139 final passage vote.

The senior Republican on the Rules Committee, Rep. H. Allen Smith (Calif.), said during the debate that he had been assured by the White House that the President will hold off signing the bill provided the parties to the dispute "move expeditiously to consummate the agreement."

News reports on the dock settlement indicated that the parties had agreed on a two-year contract. The compulsory arbitration provision of the bill established an 18-month minimum for the duration of an imposed settlement, but no maximum. It also leaves the issue of retroactivity before the passage of the law to the discretion of the arbitrator.

The West Coast dock strike began last July and continued for 100 days before workers were sent back under an 80-day Taft-Hartley Act injunction. It resumed Jan. 17 after the expiration of the injunction.

Vote in Senate Blocks Permanent Strike Ban

When the Senate on Feb. 8 was considering a bill to halt the West Coast dock strike, Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) sought to add on the Administration's proposal for a permanent law that would curtail the right to strike in transportation industries and allow the President to impose compulsory arbitration.

The Senate tabled the Packwood amendment by a 42-39 vote, thus blocking its passage. Labor supported the position of the 42 senators who rejected the attempt to pass a permanent anti-strike law.

also confirmed C. Grayson Jackson as chairman of the Price Commission.

The IAM-UAW suits are the first such legal challenge to the Pay Board.

The UAW suit is divided into five parts, the first of which makes the point that of the 51 cents an hour negotiated in 1971 as the first-year wage increase in a three-year contract, 34 cents was a catch-up, cost-of-living increase agreed upon three years earlier.

The aerospace companies had agreed to the catch-up provision in return for a cap on a cost-of-living escalator contained in the 1968 agreement, the suit notes.

The Pay Board, in ruling on the aerospace contracts, disallowed 17 cents of that increase, tacking it on the second year of the agreement.

"We say this is clearly beyond their statutory authority," UAW Pres. Leonard Woodcock told a news conference.

The UAW further charges that:

- There was a "denial of due process" required by the Economic Stabilization Act, including lack of public hearings, denial of transcript and faulty procedures.
- The Pay Board is without authority to reject the aerospace contracts because no proper regulations governing interest rates and finance charges have been issued as required by the recent amendments to the act.
- The Pay Board did not support its disapproval by substantial evidence and made its decision for administrative and political convenience.
- The aerospace industry has historically been in a "tandem relationship" with the auto industry and the aerospace agreements reflected that relationship.

"Pay Board members assured the unions that this tandem relationship would be respected, but later voted to deny the effect of this relationship," Woodcock charged.

In its ruling on deferred wage increases, the board said its decision does not arbitrarily limit deferred wage increases to 7 percent. It said existing contracts would be allowed to take effect as long as they are not "unreasonably inconsistent" with the board's guidelines, and as long as interested parties or five members of the board do not challenge the raises.

Labor members of the board opposed the decision but the five business and four public members voted approval with Boldt abstaining.

Under the ruling, the board must be notified 60 days before the effective date of deferred increases covered by the decision and it must be shown that the increases are not "inconsistent" with policy.

The new ruling for the first time brings units of under 5,000 workers under such scrutiny.

On its merit pay resolution, the board said increases of up to 7 percent could be exempted from guidelines if it is part of an established pattern. It said the merit pay rules would be published in the Federal Register with public comment invited before specific regulations on merit raises are adopted.

NLRB Buttresses Right Of Workers to Counsel

The National Labor Relations Board, by 3-1 vote, has strengthened the right of a worker to be accompanied by a representative of his union when he is summoned for an interview during a dispute with management.

In a case involving the Upper South Dept. of the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Quality Manufacturing Co. of Point Pleasant, W.Va., the NLRB majority ordered that three workers who had been fired be restored to their jobs with back pay.

It also ordered that no employe be fired or disciplined for demanding the right of union representation in a dispute that could result in disciplinary action.

The dispute grew out of the insistence of the employer that an interview with a worker who had protested working conditions be held in private. The worker insisted on representation either by the union's chairlady or assistant chairlady. These, in turn, equally insisted that either one of them be present during the interview.

The technical issue at stake hinged largely on whether the worker could "reasonably" expect that the interview with the employer would result in disciplinary action. The NLRB majority decided that such was the case.

"This case," the board said, "appears to present an issue which we have not heretofore directly passed on. . . . After reflection, we have concluded that it is a serious violation of an employe's individual right to be represented by his union if he can only request or insist on such representation under penalty of disciplinary action."

Fire Fighters Hail Ruling by Usery

Pres. William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters has hailed as "precedent-making and highly constructive" a ruling by Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., that fire service captains are not supervisors and should be included in fire fighter collective bargaining units in the federal service.

Usery's ruling upheld a hearing officer's decision in a test case at the U.S. Naval Weapons Center, China Lake, Calif.

The assistant secretary ruled that fire captains hold only "routine or clerical" authority and are not supervisors within the meaning of the Presidential Executive Order.

Compulsion on the Docks

IT IS ALWAYS astounding and appalling when those who profess belief in the free enterprise system propose gimmicks and devices that are the antithesis of freedom in order to achieve a temporary goal.

That is exactly what the President and the Secretaries of Labor, Agriculture, Commerce and Transportation propose as the solution to the West Coast dock strike. Behind the slogans which characterize their approach is compulsory arbitration—the denial of freedom to certain Americans in order to aid certain other Americans.

Early in this Administration, the government conducted a full-scale study, commissioned by the then Secretary of Labor, George Shultz, into the facts and the truth about three previous longshore strikes—all on the East and Gulf Coasts. In those instances, previous administrations obtained Taft-Hartley injunctions, contending that the national health and safety were endangered.

This study concluded that these strikes did "not appear to have caused any lasting unfavorable shifts in the basic trends of either imports or exports." It also reported that there was "no visible impact on the economy as a whole."

Despite its own earlier study, this Administration did get a Taft-Hartley injunction against the West Coast longshoremen which has since expired. The government now seeks additional punitive action, basing its entire case on unsubstantiated economic statistics.

The Los Angeles Times, in a definitive study of these statistics, concluded that they were "wild guesses and exaggerations." For example, the government claims that California loses $17.5 million a day for every day of the strike—a statistic achieved by multiplying a guesstimate daily wage times every worker in the state involved in any manner with foreign trade. As the Los Angeles Times pointed out, if such had been the case, then the state's unemployment would have increased, not decreased as it did, during the strike.

The Des Moines Register commented that the statistics used by Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz to prove damage to farmers by the strike were just "wild statements." "The chances are," the paper wrote, "that the total export movement of feed grain and soybeans this year will be as great as it would have been without the dock strike."

IT IS AXIOMATIC that when one party to a labor-management dispute believes the government will bail them out, then there is no true collective bargaining. In this instance, the West Coast dock employers had every reason to believe the government would do what it has done—use the Taft-Hartley Act to enjoin the strike. And when that failed, that the government would seek new punitive legislation against the workers.

Having provided the employers with an incentive not to arrive at a collective bargaining settlement, the Administration now proposes an unprecedentedly broad compulsory arbitration measure. This proposal would ignore all agreements already reached by the parties to this dispute and would impose the will of the arbitrators on every single issue of wages, hours and working conditions.

The AFL-CIO is opposed to compulsory arbitration in any form, at any time, for any reason. We just as wholeheartedly support the concept of voluntary arbitration, where the parties jointly agree to an umpire's decision.

I don't like strikes, and I don't know a single union leader who does. But free workers—if they are to be free—must have the right to strike. Anything less is an abridgement of individual freedom.

A Word Edgewise:

Campaign Button No License To Argue Morality of Vietnam

By John P. Roche

AS PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES multiply arithmetically, it seems that campaign rhetoric increases geometrically. Only a lunatic perfectionist would expect politicians to be wholly logical or totally consistent, but there is one problem that requires special treatment: the morality of the Vietnamese war.

For some years now, characters who couldn't distinguish a moral principle from a railroad tie have been wandering around the United States sounding like the prophet Isaiah, condemning the war as "immoral, obscene, etc." In past months this has been compounded by the suggestion that we should confer amnesty on draft-dodgers because they took the truly moral course.

The net consequence of this moralistic orchestration has been to indicate to more than 2 million young Americans who fought in Vietnam that they were evil men engaged in a wicked enterprise, that if they had any spiritual foundations, they would have skipped off to Canada and joined the band of saints.

Like medieval lepers, veterans of Vietnam are supposed to go around in sackcloth, ringing a bell, and announcing themselves as "unclean." Or they can find instant redemption by joining the Vietnam Veterans Against the War, confessing to war crimes, and throwing their medals away.

Only a handful have in fact joined the anti-war group. The rest (and their families) are smouldering at what they instinctively consider the injustice of the indictment, waiting for someone to stand up in defense of their honor and decency.

Since politicians, intimidated by left-wing dervishes, seem reluctant to undertake this job, I will volunteer. For openers I submit that the war in Vietnam was as moral a cause as Americans have ever fought for, that our armed forces did their job with courage and dedication, and finally that by comparison with World War II the atrocity level in Vietnam was remarkably low, particularly given the context of guerrilla warfare.

To begin with the character of the war, there are two grounds, and two grounds only, for the argument that our intervention in Vietnam was "immoral."

First, those who say all wars are immoral, religious or philosophical pacifists, are quite within their rights to apply the designation to Vietnam. These, however, are people with no favorite wars: they condemn Arabs, Israelis, Communists, anti-Communists with complete impartiality. For them, there are no "just wars."

The second group with standing to question the morality of the war comprises those who believe it is wrong because we are shooting the wrong way, that is, they believe that Hanoi is right, that we are supporting a "reactionary, comprador clique" in Saigon against the "progressive" forces of Communist righteousness. For them, the war is "just" and Hanoi is the instrument of justice.

ALL THE OTHER ARGUMENTS against the war are prudential or pragmatic in nature. You can, for example, argue that it was a mistake to get mixed up in Southeast Asia, that the game wasn't worth the candle, that we should have fought a different kind of war . . . all eminently debatable questions. But not moral questions.

Let me make the point differently: in my judgment, an American armed response to the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968, would have been perfectly moral—there is nothing immoral about resisting totalitarianism. But in prudential terms it would have been a mistake.

Or, to shift to Africa, there would in my judgment be nothing immoral about supporting a black liberation movement in the Republic of South Africa. But given the power realities on the ground, it would be an act of irresponsible, bloody adventurism.

If the presidential candidates want to argue the wisdom of our commitment to Vietnam, they are free to do so, even though it is a waste of time. However, before they start throwing moral thunderbolts, they would be wise to consider the fact that, unless they are pacifists or Hanoi hawks, they have no standing as prophets. And furthermore, that 2 million Americans understandably resent being excommunicated by bogus messiahs.

Stock Deals, Interest-Free Loans:

Corporations Use Gimmicks To Fatten Income of Executives

By Phillip Ray

AT FIRST GLANCE, it would seem fair to rule —as the Pay Board did in December—that corporate executives had to sacrifice like the workers in their plants and restrict their pay increases to the same 5.5 percent general pay increase standard. Fair, that is, only at first glance.

It doesn't take a degree in economics to point out that 5.5 percent of a $200,000-a-year executive salary is $11,000—or about $211.50 a week. That same 5.5 percent rule applied to the wage of an $8,000-a-year worker means $440—or $8.46 a week.

So that corporate executives wouldn't have to sacrifice too much under the restrictive pay standard, the Pay Board left virtually unrestricted many of the other methods under which executives are compensated.

Forbes magazine reported, for example, that less than half of America's top executives depend upon their salary for their total compensation.

Stock options are a favorite gimmick of companies to reward an executive. While the Pay Board made a passing nod in the direction of stock options, the overall effect was little more than recognition the practice existed. Corporations were prohibited from granting more stock options than they did over the average of the last three years; however, absolutely no restraints were placed on the income that results when an executive exercises his options.

Thus, if the stock market goes up only a fraction of the most bullish predictions for 1972, then the income potential of the beneficiaries of the stock option gimmick will make the 5.5 percent pay standard a patent sham.

For example, according to Forbes magazine, the Wyly brothers—Sam and Charles—who hold the respective titles of chairman of the board and president of University Computer Co., were offered options in 1970 to purchase 225,000 shares of UCC at $26.50 a share. Last year, while the stock market generally was depressed, UCC stock climbed as high as $38.50. In 1968, UCC stock had reached a peak of $168 per share.

How high this stock will go is anyone's guess, but if it were to rebound to only half of its 1968 high, the Wyly brothers would realize a combined profit of $10.5 million. While their combined salary of $240,000 is subject to the 5.5 percent pay standard, the Wylys could receive a 4,100 percent compensation increase off their stock options.

Paul Thayer, chairman of Ling-Temco-Vought, shares the Wylys' hopes for a stock market rebound, the article noted. Thayer was voted options to 200,000 shares at $12.62 a share. If LTV stock goes as high as $25 a share—only one-seventh of its all-time high—then Thayer would realize a $2.5 million profit. His base salary in 1970 was only $262,000.

Thayer and the Wyly brothers are not atypical examples. A 1969 survey of 943 of the nation's biggest companies by the accounting firm of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. showed that 80 percent of the companies had stock option plans for their executives.

Another popular scheme for rewarding corporate executives is for a company to issue new stock options whenever the stock happens to decline in value. This is absolute protection against the normal risks taken by private investors. This is how the scheme works: Mr. Big, president of United Widget, was voted options on 100,000 shares of stock at $10 a share; but the price of the stock dipped last year to $5. Hence, Mr. Big would lose money if he exercised his option to buy the stock at $10 and sell it at $5. So the company helps out by voting him options at $5 a share. That way, if the stock goes back up to $10 a share Mr. Big would net $500,000.

MANY CORPORATIONS also help their executives over the tight-money hurdle of offering them interest-free or low-interest loans. A recent study of 165 major companies by the management consulting firm of McKinsey & Co. disclosed, according to Dun's, that one company in every 10 makes these loans to their top executives or at least is thinking seriously about doing so.

Xerox is one firm that makes loans to its executives. In its proxy statement from 1971, Xerox listed $10 million in outstanding company loans to 16 top executives. These loans enabled the executives to buy restricted stock at 50 percent of its market value. The company lent the full amount of the stock purchase price—$1.3 million in one case—to each executive in exchange for his promissory note. The interest rate on the loans was 4 percent. At the same time, Xerox workers were paying 8 percent interest on new home mortgages.

As generous as Xerox was, Ford Motor Co. went them one better. Ford lent six of its officers $538,000 in 1970—interest free, says Dun's.

No list of the gimmicks companies use to compensate their executives would be complete without the "phantom stock." Without ever having to buy stock, an executive receives the dividends and a cash payment of the difference between the option price and the stock value five years later. Of course, if the stock declines in value the executive doesn't have to pay the company the difference.

Campbell Soup and Du Pont have used phantom stock plans for years, Dun's says, and the idea recently spread to such companies as ITT and Kraftco. In fact, CBS recently started offering executive phantom stocks under the name of "performance share units." One stockholder objected to the arrangement. The stockholder: Investors Mutual, Inc., a multi-billion dollar mutual fund.

Keyed to Quality Care:

Health Security Financing Plan Offers Effective Cost Controls

SINGLE-SOURCE FINANCING of health care provided by the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill would bring "disciplines and controls" badly needed to hold down medical care costs, declared AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman.

The "so-called intermediaries . . . or middlemen" like Blue Cross and Blue Shield, who collect premiums and pay the doctors, hospitals and other providers of health care, Seidman said, "are completely indifferent to the costs of medical care."

He pointed out that the intermediaries "take about 13 to 15 cents of every dollar for their profits and administrative costs, which is entirely excessive," but do little or nothing to "improve the efficiency or quality of the medical care that the providers make available."

The private insurance companies "ought to be the agents of the people who pay" the premiums—workers and their employers, he asserted, but instead, "they seem to be the agents of the providers" of health care.

He noted that the Kennedy-Griffiths bill "calls for a large input of consumer representatives at every level," national through local, giving those who pay for the plans a much stronger voice in the efficiency, cost and quality of health care.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman said that while it is encouraging that the Nixon Administration now "recognizes . . . that the nation faces a very difficult health care crisis," its National Health Insurance Standards bill "falls far short of the mark."

He said the major shortcomings of the Nixon proposal are "inadequate benefits . . . financial barriers to people when they need medical care . . . and reliance on the private insurance companies, which have shown themselves completely inadequate, in terms of controlling either the cost or the quality of medical care."

THE BEGINNING of a new year always brings with it an analysis of what happened to the economy during the past 12 months and what we can expect from it during the next 12.

Usually it is an exercise enjoyed chiefly by economists—notably rival ones who like to boast about how right they were last year and how wrong the opposing school of economics was.

This year we are getting it hot and heavy.

Examination of the President's Budget which he has just sent to Congress, the Report of the Council of Economic Advisers and the 1972 economic forecast of the Dept. of Commerce reveals an interplay of economic theory and Nixonian politics that make this year's analyses of more than usual importance.

What this interplay boils down to is that Nixon politicians are glowing in their promises of a bright future; the Nixon economists are a lot more guarded for understandable reasons. Their 1971 predictions fell flat.

The record demonstrates this clearly. The 1971 forecast by the Nixon Administration called for a vigorous recovery of the economy from the recession of 1969-70; a Gross National Product of $1,065 billion was forecast; unemployment would drop from the December 1970 rate of 6 percent to about 4.5 percent; the rate of inflation would decrease to around 3 percent.

It didn't turn out that way. At year's end the GNP was many billions short of the January forecast; unemployment was actually 6 percent instead of 4.5; the rate of inflation for the year had been 4.3 percent instead of 3.

Faced with that kind of a disastrous record for forecasting by its economists, the Administration is still claiming victory for the past and a greater victory for the future.

The President's Budget message to Congress is filled with 1972 presidential politics. Putting the best possible face on a budget deficit for Fiscal 1972 estimated at $38.8 billion, the President promised to hold the 1973 deficit to $25.5 billion.

IN HIS ECONOMIC REPORT to the Congress, the President showed little sense of modesty about his accomplishments during 1971. "First," he said, "I imposed a 90-day freeze on prices, wages and rents; second, I suspended conversion of dollars into gold and other reserve assets; Third, I imposed. . ." etc.

These actions he counted as his accomplishments of the past year despite the fact that their efficacy is still open to grave doubts. Then, blaming the unemployment problem largely on the winding down of the war—the downturn actually started long before that happened —he promised to reduce the unemployment rate "significantly" this year. Again, no figure.

The Council of Economic Advisers also hedged on the rate. In its 1971 report, the council held out the bold promise of a "path that would see the unemployment rate reduced to the 4.5 percent level by the second quarter of 1972."

The 1973 "pitch" is different. This time the council cautiously outlined the measures now being taken by the Administration and suggested that employment will rise sharply "if" the rate of output hits about 6 percent. "This implies," the report said, "a fall in the unemployment rate to the neighborhood of 5 percent by year end."

Simply put, this means that the first two years of the Nixon Administration produced a surge of unemployment from the 3.4 percent level that prevailed when he came into office to 6 percent and the last two years will find the nation with the still shocking level of 5 percent and no guarantee that living costs will be much lower than they are now.

These are the human facts which go behind the statistics and forecasts. Workers this election year will find it essential to be aware not only of the economics of the situation but the politics as well.

DISCIPLINES AND CONTROLS needed to hold down medical care costs are key features of the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security plan, said AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Donald Finley, left, of United Press International, and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Union Efforts Help Perk Up School, Retool Courses for Airline Careers

New York—Things are looking up at the new August Martin High School with its retooled curriculum geared to prepare students for careers in the aviation industry—the result of trade union cooperation and innovation.

Until last fall, it had been the under-utilized Woodrow Wilson vocational school where morale was low, pupil attendance was spotty and graduating classes ran about 125, well below its capacity.

But John Burnell, a regional representative of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, came up with an idea on how to improve conditions.

Because the Jamaica, L.I., school is only a short distance from Kennedy International Airport, Burnell explored the possibility of putting to use the resources of the airport in vocational training.

A preliminary survey showed that jobs for ground support personnel at New York's major airports outnumber flight personnel 7 to 1, and with the increase in air travel, job opportunities are expected to grow.

Burnell, a member of the Transport Workers who also runs the job placement program for the New York City AFL-CIO, called on other local union leaders for assistance. They came from the Teachers, Machinists, Service Employes, Transport Workers, and the Teamsters. American Airlines also pitched in.

"We wanted a comprehensive high school, hooked to the airlines, that would motivate kids to higher things," Burnell said.

In 1969, an advisory commission to the new school was named, and in 1970, the board of education voted its approval and the change of name and direction for the school.

The school was named after a black aviator who was killed while flying emergency relief supplies to Biafra.

Under the plan, the old courses were phased out, and this fall 950 eager ninth-graders, all of whom had chosen to go to this particular school, entered Martin as its first class.

Next year, another class of ninth-graders will enter, and so on until the school has approximately 3,000 students.

As Principal Lawrence Costello explains it, Martin is one of three comparatively new "experimental" high schools in New York City—John Dewey and Hillcrest are the other two.

All are comprehensive schools, offering a mixture of academic and vocational courses, and all have some new ways of doing things, in common and individually.

For example, each is on a "cycle" system—short terms of courses throughout the year, minimizing the risk of failure and providing more variety for the students. Martin, along with Dewey, has paraprofessional workers staffing "resource centers," where students can go to study, rest, or chat. Each school provides for independent study, though not under identical circumstances.

Martin is using aviation and aerospace as both a motivational device in such traditional courses as English and math, and also as a lead to future occupations—such as ticket clerks, travel agents, stewardesses and stewards, cleaners, air controllers, and so on.

At present, the only jobs for which Martin students will be directly trained at the school are in the servicing of ground-support vehicles; all the others will require advanced or specialized education elsewhere.

In some other ways, the school is unique. All students take English, algebra, and a foreign language, and science. In ninth grade, all take practical arts. In the tenth grade, all will take typing. Costello believes Martin is the only New York City high school to require all students to take a foreign language, and certainly one of the first to have both boys and girls together in practical arts classes.

Teachers Local 2, which represents teachers at the school as well as in other New York City schools, was called upon to help work out curriculum plans for the new program, and teachers spent many months preparing for the new emphasis on air studies at Martin.

Things are working out well, with the attendance rate running at 93 percent. Teacher Martin Muller, who has been at the school for 10 years and who teaches carpentry and plastics, has girls in his shops this year for the first time. "They're tremendous," he said.

An advisory group of union leaders, community and industry representatives, continues to meet about once a month, and will have an important role in the school's future. So far, the verdict is unanimous, their cooperation has given a fine start to some deserving kids who might not have had it otherwise.

Trade Balance Vital to Labor In U.S., Japan

Tokyo, Japan — Greater understanding and cooperation are needed between the workers and peoples of the United States and those of Japan—especially in trade relations, Japanese unionists were told.

Pres. Joseph T. Power of the Plasterers, speaking for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the annual convention of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (DOMEI), said that the labor movements of both countries have responsibility of raising the living standards of their members.

Reciprocal trade procedures are vital to the well-being of trade unionists and workers in the entire world, he stressed. "Without equitable and balanced trade arrangements, the greed of international corporate powers and the designs of totalitarian dictators seeking world domination would be furthered," Power warned.

He said that DOMEI and the AFL-CIO are bound together in attaining for Japanese and American workers "a life free from the cruel burdens of poverty, the inhuman tyranny of dictatorship and the horrors of war."

"In fighting for the protection and improvement of our standards," Power observed, "we fight for your standards and those of working men and women the world over. . . . A cheap labor market anywhere is a threat to the economic, social and political welfare of all."

JOSEPH T. POWER

Effective Apr. 7:

Election Reforms Signed Into Law

Political candidates and parties with the most money to spend will have less of an advantage after Apr. 7, and big contributors will no longer be able to conceal their generosity under a camouflage of fund-raising committees.

Pres. Nixon waited until the last possible day to sign the new election reform legislation—which takes effect 60 days later. But he nevertheless found some words of mild praise for the measure, in contrast to his veto two years ago of a more limited bill that merely set a ceiling on campaign spending for television and radio broadcasts.

The new legislation covers most forms of campaign advertising, with spending restrictions on newspaper and magazine ads, billboards, paid telephone solicitations, radio and television broadcasts and spot commercials.

It doesn't limit total campaign expenditures, but it does close numerous loopholes in the existing, virtually unenforced law governing reporting of campaign contributions and identification of large donors.

An important provision in the bill from labor's viewpoint reaffirms the right of unions to carry on political education and action programs for their members—and to establish and administer voluntary funds for political purposes.

Thus, COPE and similar labor political committees may provide direct support to endorsed candidates through funds voluntarily contributed by union members.

Unions are also specifically authorized to use dues income to conduct registration and get-out-the-vote drives aimed at union members and their families and to communicate with their members on political and legislative issues.

All of these rights are in accordance with existing law and court interpretations. But in view of apparent attempts by the Justice Dept. and conservative groups to curtail union political activities, the new law more clearly spells out labor's rights.

In all elections to federal office, candidates are limited to spending either 10 cents for each registered voter or $50,000—whichever is higher—for the regulated areas of campaign advertising. But no more than 60 percent of this ceiling may be spent to buy television or radio time, although the entire amount may be used for non-broadcasting expenses.

Under this formula, the broadcast spending ceiling for each candidate in this year's presidential election would be about $8.4 million.

During the 1968 presidential campaign, Republicans spent $12.1 million on post-convention broadcasts for Nixon while the Democratic expenditures for Humphrey broadcasts came to only $6.1 million.

The new disclosure rule also for the first time requires full identification of all persons donating more than $100 to a candidate or campaign committee — including address and place of business.

For the first time, also, candidates are limited in the amount of their own money that can be used in a campaign—with a ceiling of $50,000 for president, $35,000 for senatorial candidates and $25,000 for House candidates.

Rep. Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.), a sponsor of the new law, said this provision should "reverse the trend which has made running for political office into a rich man's game."

While the legislation passed Congress with strong bipartisan support, both parties showed some reluctance to launch the reform without one last bite at contributors under the old rules. Thus the Democratic-controlled House delayed final passage of the legislation by about a month, until the second session of Congress. And the President held back his signature until the last day allowed by law to sign or veto a bill.

Compromise Proposed In Deadlock on Job Bias

Sponsors of a Senate bill to give the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to enforce the law against job discrimination proposed a compromise in an effort to break through a filibuster.

The Senate has struggled with the labor-supported bill since Jan. 19, and two attempts to limit debate have fallen short of the required two-thirds majority.

Opponents have centered their fire on "cease and desist" powers proposed for the EEOC, similar to those held by the National Labor Relations Board in dealing with unfair labor practices. The Administration and employers are backing a cumbersome court procedure included in a House-passed bill.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) proposed to break the deadlock by combining elements of both approaches. In effect, federal district courts would oversee the EEOC's enforcement operations, review the hearing record if objections were filed, and set the remedy through a court order.

But Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.), who led the fight for the House version, and southern filibuster leaders served notice that the change would not meet their objections.

Dominick said the Williams-Javits proposal amounted to giving "cease and desist" enforcement powers to the EEOC "without using the words."

And he warned that unless the Senate reverses itself and approves his own court enforcement amendment, there wouldn't be a bill.

Heavy absenteeism in the Senate has compounded the difficulty of getting votes on key amendments and mustering the maximum strength in the efforts to limit debate.

A secondary feature of the Williams-Javits compromise was adopted by the Senate on a 56-26 vote. This broadened coverage of the law prohibiting discrimination in employment to embrace establishments with 15 or more workers. The present law covers only firms with 25 or more employes and the bill that came out of the Senate Labor Committee would have dropped the coverage floor to eight workers.

Warning to Nixon:

Debt Limit Bill Used To Push Tax Reform

group of House liberals to use the debt ceiling bill as a prod for tax reform.

Since a number of conservative Republicans gag at the idea of a rising national debt and can't bring themselves to vote for a higher debt ceiling, the liberal bloc considered insisting on a tax reform amendment as the price for supporting the debt ceiling bill.

They were seeking a parliamentary way to attach an amendment that would require the President to submit a comprehensive tax reform program before May 1, 1972.

The amendment route was dropped after Mills, one of the most influential committee chairmen in Congress, wrote a strong letter to the President.

He called on Nixon to submit by Mar. 15 proposals to eliminate "loopholes in the federal income, estate and gift tax systems."

And with obvious reference to the liberal revolt, Mills told the President that "this matter has become all the more important because of developments in the House in recent days raising the question about support of continued increases in the debt ceiling unless such requests are coupled with tax reform."

The issue was also pressed by Reuss when George P. Shultz, director of the White House Office of Management & Budget, testified before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Reuss asked Shultz what Nixon would do if Congress refused to raise the debt limit until the Administration proposed "honest to goodness" tax reforms.

Shultz argued that the two subjects were not related and he told the lawmakers to "stop telling the President how to do his job." This isn't the time to raise anyone's taxes, Shultz insisted.

The debt limit bill passed the House, 248-147, after a number of liberal congressmen reiterated their insistence on tax reform as the price for future votes. It still must be acted on by the Senate.

In other action:

- The House voted 350-23 approval of a $250 million program of grants to enable states to provide one hot meal a day for the nation's elderly, with no charge to those on low incomes.

The projects would be operated by both public and private non-profit institutions and funds could be used to transport the elderly to community dining halls or to deliver meals to shut-ins.

A similar bill has already passed the Senate.

- Pres. Nixon renewed his proposal to shift virtually all federal manpower training programs to states and cities under a revenue-sharing plan, with only token federal supervision of how the money is spent.

He told Congress that America needs a better-trained workforce to increase productivity and make U.S. goods more competitive with products of other nations.

- A presidential message on environmental programs advanced one major new concept in addition to reiterating previous positions.

Nixon proposed a unique air pollution tax of from 10 to 15 cents a pound on sulphur oxide pollution from electric power plants, smelting, refining and other industrial plants in areas with dirty air.

Crafts to Take New Approach On Conferences

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The executive council of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., has decided that the department will not conduct a national legislative conference this year in keeping with a sweeping reorganization of activities authorized by the BCTD convention last November.

In past years, the legislative conferences have brought about 4,000 delegates to Washington to concentrate on matters of legislative importance to building trades unions.

"We are taking entirely new approaches to a number of situations," BCTD Pres. Frank Bonadio explained.

"These conferences have been generally highly successful," he noted. "But the executive council feels that the time now has come to consider a change in the format, just as we are restructuring a number of other activities to meet the new challenges and opportunities of the period."

In other actions, the council elected William Sidell to a council vacancy succeeding Maurice A. Hutcheson, who resigned as senior vice president of the department. Sidell is scheduled to succeed Hutcheson as president of the Carpenters Mar. 1.

EXCAVATION WORK for the two sub-level floors and foundation of the addition to the AFL-CIO headquarters building got under way Feb. 1 as remains of the razed Lafayette Hotel are dug up and hauled away. Carpenters, lower left, construct a barricade for "sidewalk superintendents," while an Operating Engineer, right, works the controls of a power shovel.

Job Expansion Emerges as Key To Minority Training Programs

New Orleans—The continuing task of developing minority training and hiring programs under the aegis of the labor movement was explored at a three-day conference here.

These programs must be linked closely to the creation of more jobs, it was stressed to the 350 participants in the fourth annual conference of the Joint Apprenticeship Program of the Workers Defense League/A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, said that the trade union movement "is the only instrument" that can provide the broad support needed to achieve vital economic and social goals.

He noted that through apprenticeship programs, thousands of minority youths are now working as apprentices and journeymen in the building trades.

But he warned, "Don't fall into the trap of developing minority programs only when they benefit the minority. Support them when they are for the good of all."

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman praised organized labor's Apprenticeship Outreach efforts as a program that has worked successfully even during an economic recession.

"This program was initiated and is run by young blacks," Slaiman noted. "Other programs should look at this and copy its success."

WDL Pres. Rowland Watts, while citing the need to develop more effective techniques in manpower programs, said that "there are only so many jobs and there is a problem of who is going to get them. We need to develop more jobs so all will be employed."

His comments were reinforced by Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO, who pinned the lack of jobs on national economic policies.

"If we expect to have job opportunity for people, we can't continue to have our economy stagnated by the Nixon Administration," he stressed. "We must elect a man who has some compassion for people. . . . There is little opportunity now because jobs do not exist for blacks or any other group."

Marvin Friedman of the consulting firm of Stanley H. Ruttenberg & Associates told the delegates that current manpower policy lacks sharp focus on specific problems and goals. He suggested shifting emphasis to "upward mobility . . . of minorities, not only in their jobs, but in education, health and housing."

A panel discussion on the housing crisis explored the government's role in construction programs, concluding that federal subsidies are not fully meeting their objectives.

AFL-CIO Urban Affairs Director John Evans said that the "only answer to housing is jobs. Subsidies to low-income people can help equalize opportunity, but government housing will never equal what a wage earner himself can earn."

Edward Gonzalez of Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations called for efforts to advance minorities in areas beyond employment through adult education programs.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis pointed out that the federation is trying to encourage non-whites to step up their involvement in union affairs. As low-income workers join unions to strengthen their position "they must make their voices heard by participating," Davis stressed.

Other key participants in the conference included Robert McGlotten, executive director of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute; Tom Kahn, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy; John Lewis, director of the Atlanta Voter Education Project; Prof. F. Ray Marshal, chairman of the University of Texas economics department, and Ernest Green, executive director of the JAP.

Meany Urges Aid To Heart Drive

Union members were urged by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to increase their support of the Heart Fund campaign during February to finance research in heart and circulatory diseases.

Meany, who is serving for the 20th consecutive year as a sponsor of the drive, noted that "the men and women of the AFL-CIO have always given generously of their time and money to support this worthy cause."

Since 1949, $179 million has been contributed to the Heart Fund, with a substantial amount coming from organized labor.

5.4 Million Unemployed:

Jobless Rate Near 6% for 14th Month

ually increases more during January, the BLS reported a seasonal decline in unemployment of 56,000.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson adopted an optimistic outlook as he stressed the seasonally adjusted gain in jobs.

"A look at the doughnut instead of the hole finds real growth in the economy," Hodgson said in a news release.

A note of optimism also was sounded by Herbert Stein who made his first appearance before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress as chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Stein predicted that the Nixon Administration's policies would reduce unemployment to 5 percent by the end of the calendar year.

But he rejected a proposal from the committee chairman, Sen. William D. Proxmire (D-Wis.), for a program to create 100,000 new jobs each month until the unemployment rate drops to the 5 percent level.

A program like that, Stein maintained, would cost $10 billion, on top of the budget deficit of $38.8 billion already expected in the Nixon Administration's fiscal budget.

The jobless rate for Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group stood at 8.5 percent in January, the same as the previous three months. The rate for nonveterans in the same age group also was relatively unchanged at 7.5 percent.

The BLS said there are now 4 million returning GIs in the civilian labor force and that 3.4 million of them have jobs.

The jobless rate for full-time workers declined from 5.7 to 5.5 percent, but the rate for part-time workers increased from 8.4 to 9.0 percent.

The rates for major age groups showed little variation from December at 4.2 percent for adult men, 3 percent for married men, 5.5 percent for adult women and 17.8 percent for the 16-19 year-olds.

Negro joblessness increased from 10.3 to 10.6 percent while unemployment for white workers remained at 5.4 percent.

The average duration of unemployment rose to 11.8 weeks from 11.3 in December. There were 562,000 persons unemployed 27 weeks or more and 1.2 million without work for at least 15 weeks.

The BLS report said the average workweek for all rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls declined more than usual between December and January.

After seasonal adjustment, the average workweek was down three-tenths of an hour to 36.9 hours. But the largest drop in working hours occured in manufacturing where the workweek moved down four-tenths of an hour to 39.9 hours.

Factory overtime was down two-tenths of an hour to 2.9 hours.

Average hourly earnings rose 3 cents to $3.53, the BLS reported, but despite this increase, the shortened workweek resulted in a loss of $1.35 in average weekly pay to $129.20.

The BLS said that compared with January 1971, average weekly earnings were up $7.32 or 6.0 percent. During 1971, the Consumer Price Index rose at an average annual rate of 4.3 percent, the BLS said.

million compared with a deficit of $98.6 million a year ago, the survey found.

The New York Times reported that earnings after taxes for 932 nonfinancial corporations showed an increase of 24 percent over the corresponding quarter of 1970, and a 14 percent increase over the third quarter of last year.

The Times quoted a survey by the First National City Bank which disclosed that fourth-quarter profits for the 932 firms were nearly $6 billion as compared with $5.2 billion in the previous quarter and $4.8 billion for the final three months of 1970.

Transit Fare Cut Spurs Sharp Rise in Bus Use

Terre Haute, Ind.—More people are riding the bus in Terre Haute these days.

They're paying a lower fare and they're getting improved service.

The city government, the Amalgamated Transit Union and the management of the municipally-owned bus service are all enthusiastic about the experiment.

Their eventual goal is a no-fare system, a concept endorsed by the AFL-CIO convention last fall as a means of overcoming traffic-clogged streets and reversing a national trend towards high fares and declining patronage of mass transit systems.

The fare cut, the local union reported, resulted in a dramatic rise in bus usage in little more than a month.

Fares had been 25 cents, with an additional 5-cent transfer fee.

At the same time that fares were cut to 15 cents, the frequency of service was stepped up and routes were extended to several outlying areas that had been without bus service.

Patronage nearly doubled and the system is collecting as much money from the reduced fare as it did at the higher rates. Six new drivers have been added, and plans are under way to replace old buses with new equipment.

The local union president, Robert J. Pond, reported to the international union publication, In Transit, that patronage on his own bus run has risen from fewer than 100 passengers a day to more than 200.

Terre Haute's recently-elected Mayor William Brighton was pledged to a no-fare transit goal—a concept that also has the strong endorsement of the city's central labor council.

The already-adopted budget blocked immediate implementation this year but the city is seeking a federal grant to speed up improvement of the transit system.

'You Can't Paint Me Over!'

Employers Win Delay On Reporting Injuries

The Labor Dept. has relaxed the rules for employers on record-keeping and reporting on-the-job injuries and illnesses despite the protests of organized labor.

Amended rules will allow firms covered by the Occupational Safety & Health Act to hold off up to six working days before reporting injuries to workers. Earlier, reports had to be completed within 48 hours.

And if a safety log is maintained at a computer installation away from the local plant where the injury occurred, employers will have 45 days to update the local plant log.

The rules changes were issued by Commissioner Geoffrey H. Moore of the Bureau of Labor statistics and Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who heads the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Guenther said the amendments resulted from petitions by employers for exceptions from record-keeping requirements of the job safety act. The new rules provide "more flexibility" to the employers, the Labor Dept. said.

George H. R. Taylor, secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said the changes further reflect the Nixon Administration's policy of giving special favors to employers.

"This is another instance where OSHA has tempered its stand for industry at the expense of the workers," Taylor observed.

The AFL-CIO had objected to the changes after the proposed regulations were published in the Federal Register last November.

In a letter to Guenther Dec. 2, the federation's safety committee suggested that OSHA alter its proposal for computerized safety logs so that data on accidents and injuries would be available at all times at the local plants.

"If the multi-unit establishment processes occupational illness and injury data at a centralized place, we propose that a carbon copy of the log be made and retained at the individual establishment when the original is sent to the central place," the federation urged.

With the availability of the duplicate report at the local installation, inspection officers would have access to past and current data to assess the safety record of the establishment, it noted.

However, OSHA put its amendments into effect without commenting on the federation's recommendation. It also ignored other AFL-CIO suggestions, Taylor reported.

In a another report, Guenther announced that 49 states have declared their intent to submit plans with OSHA to assume responsibility for occupational safety and health programs as an alternative to federal enforcement of the act.

OSHA has encouraged the states to develop their own programs. But labor is opposed to the policy on the grounds that states have poor records on job safety enforcement.

Facing the likelihood that state legislatures will upgrade their safety laws—but not to the protections offered in the federal law—the AFL-CIO has issued model occupational safety bills to guide state and local labor organizations in the development of safety legislation.

CONVENTIONS

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO has scheduled its 1972 convention for Pittsburgh, Feb. 29.

The American Postal Workers' 1972 convention will be held at New Orleans, Aug. 14-16.

The New York AFL-CIO has scheduled its 1972 convention for Kiamesha Lake, Sept. 6-8.

CWA Strikers Vote on Pact In New York

New York—Communications Workers throughout the state of New York were voting on a tentative agreement with the New York Telephone Co. that could end the seven-month strike that has idled more than 38,000 telephone workers.

The mail ballot, under the supervision of the Honest Ballot Association, was scheduled to be completed by Feb. 16.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne recommended acceptance of the proposed contract terms which include a full agency shop for the New York workers.

The settlement also includes premium pay of 15 percent for Saturday work as opposed to the past practice of paying straight time to employes whose fifth consecutive working day fell on a Saturday.

The union also won an additional increase of $1 during the first year of the contract for top craftsmen who would receive a $29 weekly hike. An additional $1.50 was secured for workers scheduled to receive a weekly increase of $26.50 during the first year.

The national agreement, accepted by other CWA units across the country last July, provided increases of $29 in the first year, $7.50 the second year and $8 during the final year of the contract term. The weekly rate for the top classification had been $193.

The proposed New York settlement also includes improvements in overtime pay, pensions, payroll deductions and insurance premiums.

U.S., Mexican Musicians Reach Accord on Jobs

New York—Agreements designed to protect the jobs of professional musicians in the United States and Mexico have been ratified by the American Federation of Musicians and the two unions representing musicians in Mexico.

AFM Pres. Hal C. Davis expressed optimism that "musicians on both sides of the border will benefit, because the agreements call for equal jobs, equal opportunities, and equal exchanges."

He added that "they also insure that professional wages and working conditions will prevail in both countries, and that the AFM and its counterparts in Mexico will assist each other in compiling and exchanging information vital to the protection of all the unions' members."

Davis recently led an AFM delegation during three days of negotiations in Mexico City with officials of the Sindicato Unico de Trabajadores de la Musica del Distrito Federal, representing musicians working in Mexico City, and the Sindicato Nacional de Trabajadores de la Musica de la R.M., which has jurisdiction in the provinces.

The agreements provide that the musicians unions in Mexico will exert "all possible efforts to persuade the Mexican Immigration Bureau" to enforce union membership as a prime condition of visa approval.

The AFM has recently given new emphasis to stronger relationships with unions of musicians in other countries.

Last year, Davis announced new agreements with the British Musicians Union.

Council Spurs Mobilization For Crucial Election Battle

Support for COPE Stressed as Vital

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO summoned the labor movement to do battle in the November elections with a call for "total mobilization" to meet the "most serious challenge the trade union movement has ever faced."

There is a clear and pressing need, the Executive Council declared, "to elect progressive, liberal men and women" at every level of government. With an all-out effort through COPE "we can win the most important election of the century," the federation said.

The election call-to-arms highlighted the mid-winter meeting of the council here in its opening days and was supplemented by a number of statements dealing with critical national problems and failures of the Nixon Administration.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a series of press conferences, made it clear that the federation would make no choice of presidential candidates until after the nominating conventions. A major federation goal is to have as many trade unionists as possible at the major party conventions so that labor would have a voice in the decisions.

Meany commented that there is a long way to go until November and that many things can happen. He said he doesn't believe that Pres. Nixon is a "shoo-in" for re-election and that he could not foresee how the President would win this year any of the states he lost in 1968.

The AFL-CIO president said the federation's endorsement would come at a meeting of the General Board after the nominating conventions, but he ruled out any possible backing of Alabama Gov. George Wallace, whom he termed a "bigot and racist and anti-labor down to the soles of his feet."

The council's statement calling for full support of COPE said that while there were many candidates who deserved support on the basis of their liberal, progressive records, many incumbents are proven allies of big business "dedicated to the disproven 'trickle-down' system of economics, uninterested in the plight of the poor and minorities and opposed to the programs of progress essential to the well-being of workers." They deserve defeat, the council said.

The council called for "the total mobilization of the labor movement at every level for a commitment by all members and all union officials to join in the COPE program to the fullest possible extent."

This involves registration drives, educational programs, assignment of staff to help with various programs, involvement of retirees and young family members and the strengthening of the labor-minorities coalition.

Justice, Equity Demanded:

One-Sided Controls Seen Victimizing Workers, Poor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—"Flagrant favoritism" that puts the burden of wage-price controls on workers and the poor "is rapidly destroying public support" for the economic stabilization program, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

To restore some semblance of fairness and equity in the Nixon program, the federation called for a series of actions that will insure justice for the working poor. The council statement called for:

- Action by the Pay Board to reopen the question of exempting only earnings of less than $1.90 an hour from wage controls, determine an equitable figure and petition the Cost of Living Council to adopt it.
- Support of legal challenges to the $1.90 ruling, applauding those unions which are taking such steps and pledging to back them.
- Support of workers who "will be forced to strike against these regulations."
- Opening of oversight hearings by congressional committees so that the mandate of Congress will not be flouted and, if necessary, enactment of new legislation.

The Executive Council reviewed the operations of the controls program and found them "completely inequitable."

The unanimously adopted resolution declared that "to the worker at the bottom of the economic ladder the control program means his wages are strictly regulated but the rent he pays and the price tag on most of what he must buy is free to rise."

The statement emphasized that about 75 percent of the nation's retail stores are exempt from price controls as well as nearly 50 percent of all rental units. Interest rates were never controlled and neither were prices of fresh foods, many used items, life insurance premiums, state and local taxes and the price of homes and loans.

The statement cited the report by the President's Council of Economic Advisers that 21 percent of items reflected in the Consumer Price Index are not subject to any controls.

Citing the Cost of Living Council's ruling exempting only hourly earnings below $1.90 an hour from wage controls, the AFL-CIO council stressed the COL council "rejected the Pay Board's advice and flouted the congressional mandate" for a higher figure.

Labor Supports Busing That Benefits Children

Bal Harbour, Fla.—School busing that will improve educational opportunities for children and result in quality, integrated education is wholeheartedly supported by the AFL-CIO.

The Executive Council unanimously adopted a statement emphasizing its opposition to "those individuals or groups who are creating a divisive political issue out of America's vital need for quality, integrated education," and voiced its opposition to "the constitutional amendment approach" because it runs counter to educational needs.

The council's statement strongly reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's long-standing support for quality and integrated education, federal funds to improve substandard schools and legislation to achieve open housing as the most effective way to achieve integrated education. The school busing statement, it said, is a natural extension of those views.

Federation Pres. George Meany told reporters that organized labor's position goes back to its strong support for the 1954 Supreme Court decision on school desegregation and that the AFL-CIO is very actively opposed to present proposals for a constitutional amendment to prohibit busing. He said there is a great deal of confusion as to where Pres. Nixon stands on the question, and there has been such confusion over the past few years.

3 New Vice Presidents Fill Council Vacancies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Presidents of three large unions were elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its mid-winter meeting here, filling vacancies left by the retirement of their predecessors.

The new council members, who also become vice presidents of the AFL-CIO are: James T. Housewright, president of the Retail Clerks; George Hardy, president of the Service Employes, and Al H. Chesser, president of the United Transportation Union.

Resigning from the council were James A. Suffridge, president-emeritus of the Retail Clerks; David Sullivan, president-emeritus of the Service Employes, and Charles Luna, president-emeritus of the United Transportation Union.

Suffridge had served as an AFL-CIO vice president since 1957, Sullivan since 1965 and Luna since 1969.

Of the new council members:

Housewright, 50, has been president of the Retail Clerks since 1968.

POLICY RESOLUTIONS charting the position of the AFL-CIO on major issues were studied, discussed and acted on at this meeting of the federation's Executive Council at Bal Harbour, Fla.

Direct Government Share Sought To Finance Social Security Costs

Bal Harbour, Fla.—One-third of the total cost of the social security system should be covered by general tax revenues to achieve a more equitable system and a decent standard for the elderly, the AFL-CIO declared.

The current method of contributory financing by workers and employers has been of key importance in achieving the present level of benefits while maintaining the right to the benefits, the federation's Executive Council said in a statement.

But, it added, to extend and improve benefits exclusively through the present system "would place too heavy a tax burden on low and middle income workers." These workers, the council said, "are rightly concerned that the social security tax rate is already quite high and is scheduled to rise still higher."

The federation recommended an increase in the earnings base on which benefits are paid from the present $9,000 to eventually $15,000 and a general revenue contribution gradually reaching one-third of the cost of the program.

This combination would increase benefits by approximately 50 percent from the present inadequate level of payments, the statement said.

The concept of a general revenue contribution to the social security system is "not a radical new idea but only an old proposal that has never been properly implemented," the council said as it traced the history of the concept.

The original social security legislation submitted to Congress in 1935 contemplated an eventual government contribution to reach one-third of the total cost of the program, and 1965 was mentioned as the likely year when an initial government contribution might be required.

A provision contemplating such a contribution was included in the Social Security Act in 1944 through 1950 and then dropped despite the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Social Security.

The use of general revenue funds would help reduce the cost of public welfare programs by increasing social security benefits; a large part of present contributions are now being used to cover past service liability; general funds could be used to cover prior service costs; and the principle of general revenue payments has already been accepted by the system in a number of specific areas—military service, hospital insurance benefits for non-insured persons, special age 72 benefits and half of the Part B Medicare cost.

The AFL-CIO, the statement pointed out, has long advocated that the wage base be increased to cover the same proportion of wages and salaries as was covered in 1935.

When the program began, about 97 percent of the persons in the social security system had their full earnings covered; that proportion is now about 77 percent.

"We recommend," the council said, "raising the earnings base to at least $15,000 so that a larger proportion of the earnings of high income workers will be covered. Thereafter there should be subsequent periodic adjustments in line with increases in workers' wages."

Nixon Assailed on Veto Of Day Care Program

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Pres. Nixon was sharply condemned by the AFL-CIO for vetoing a dramatic new national program of day care centers and placing political strategy above the needs of the country's children.

The federation's Executive Council accused the President of playing "cruel politics with the welfare of pre-school children and their working parents" and filling a veto message with "right-wing rhetoric pleasing only to ultra-conservatives."

The council pointed out that there are 3.7 million working mothers with children under the age of 5 and day care facilities for only 700,000 children. It noted that the President had earlier seemingly taken note of the need and that, in addition, the 1970 White House Conference on Children had made a comprehensive child development program a top national priority.

Congress, responding, passed legislation that would have made an important start toward meeting these needs with a wide range of educational, health and nutritional services for young children along with day care centers controlled by local communities and involving parents, with fees based on ability to pay.

The President vetoed the legislation, leading to the federation's condemnation and a call to Congress "to re-enact a similar day care program during the present session." The statement voiced the hope that the President would reconsider his position and "place the needs of young children above political strategy."

Senators Walter F. Mondale (D-Minn.) and Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) have introduced a modified version of the vetoed child care bill which would carry a somewhat smaller price tag.

Mondale insisted, however, that children of working mothers need quality day care centers, not merely custodial "baby-sitting" facilities.

Meany Expresses Tribute to Graham

Dr. Frank P. Graham, the North Carolina educator and world statesman who died at the age of 85, "served America with distinction and humanitarianism," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany termed Dr. Graham a "well-loved friend of the American trade union movement and my long-time personal friend."

Dr. Graham had served as president of the University of North Carolina, as a public member of the War Labor Board, as a leading adviser to Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, as a United States senator, and as a United Nations mediator in the dispute between India and Pakistan.

For Quality Education:

Labor Backs Busing To Benefit Children

tion, he emphasized, is the "welfare of the children."

The council adopted also statements on financing education and new developments in career, or vocational, education and the positions taken by the Administration in these areas.

The council's reasoning on the school busing issue was that in many communities busing is not only feasible but desirable to improve educational opportunities for the children involved. Where school board and parents—both white and black—and local education authorities all support a plan to upgrade the quality of education for disadvantaged children, the law should permit the plan to go forward, even if busing is used as a tool.

However, busing merely to achieve racial balance that does not guarantee improved education opportunities should be opposed. The basic test is whether it helps the children.

School busing is fairly prevalant today in the U.S. with 19.6 million children involved at a cost of $1.5 billion a year. Of the total education outlay at all levels the amount spent on busing ranges from 0.7 to 6.9 percent.

The AFL-CIO has taken no position on widening school district boundaries embracing several counties, the problem involved in the court case covering the Richmond, Va., area.

The federation generally considers the Nixon Administration's approach keyed to political considerations, because the White House has not supported full funding of federal school aid legislation designed to achieve quality education in substandard schools.

In its statement on financing of education the council noted the series of state and federal court decisions holding that the states have a responsibility to insure equal educational opportunity and that school financing in many systems is not equitably raised now nor equitably distributed.

The council said "we must begin now to formulate new and more equitable solutions to the critical problems of educational finance" with the states and the federal government taking over a "substantially larger share."

The Nixon regime has shown "little enthusiasm" for federal aid to education, the council noted, and is now considering raising federal education funds via a "shocking" federal sales tax known as a value-added tax.

The council said that plugging loopholes in the federal income tax system would yield an additional $15 to $20 bilion to finance the needed federal share of education costs.

In a statement on career education, the council warned that "we will not allow it to be won at the expense of" basic vocational education programs. While the general approach is in line with federation thinking, the council said, labor's enthusiasm has been "tempered" by Administration plans that fail to adequately fund existing programs and that would, through block grants, endanger specific career education programs.

The statement assailed a proposal that would in effect turn "a major part of the public schools over to a 'consortium of employers'" and also grant new tax loopholes to employer groups.

Article XX Sanctions Imposed on Laborers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified all affiliates that the Laborers' International Union of North America has been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland and Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan. The dispute involved city employes in Jacksonville, Fla.

In his notification to affiliates, Meany said the Laborers, effective Feb. 9, 1972, would be subject to the following provisions of Sec. 15 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Sec. 16;

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article;

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution;

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to the Laborers, the following unions are currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision: the Air Line Pilots Association, National Maritime Union, International Typographical Union and International Printing Pressmen.

Text of Council Statement On School Busing Issue

Text of the statement on school busing adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Feb. 15, at Bal Harbour, Fla.

The AFL-CIO has consistently supported both quality education and integrated education. We have just as staunchly supported mass investment of federal funds to improve substandard schools. We have fought for legislation to achieve open housing as the most effective way to achieve integrated education.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council categorically reiterates these positions and adds:

1. We wholeheartedly support busing of children when it will improve the educational opportunities of the children.

2. We deplore the actions of those individuals or groups who are creating a divisive political issue out of America's vital need for quality, integrated education.

3. We will oppose the constitutional amendment approach because it will do a disservice to the quality, integrated education which we support.

Council Calls for Election Mobilization

Stresses Support for COPE Drive To Meet Crucial Test for Labor

"It means," the council stressed, "an all-out effort to collect $2 for COPE from every member possible to help narrow the funding gap that always exists between labor's political friends and its political foes."

At a meeting of the COPE Administrative Committee, consisting of the COPE Operating Committee, the federation Executive Council and about 20 presidents of affiliated unions, Meany said COPE had developed a most effective and efficient operation and he was sure it would pull its full weight in the elections this year.

COPE hopes to increase sharply the number of delegates to the Democratic National Convention from the 200 plus 100 alternates of 1968 to about 500 this year. It is expanding its registration drives to identify unregistered union voters in 40 states and anticipates greater success in light of favorable changes in state registration statutes.

Polls of delegates to three recent COPE regional conferences indicated an overwhelming rejection of Pres. Nixon, very low percentages for Wallace and basic preferences for Humphrey and Muskie. The meetings in Atlanta, Dallas and Cincinnati were attended by more than 1,600 local union leaders in 15 states. The highest Nixon percentage was 1.1% at the Atlanta meeting covering seven southern states.

The political drive will work cooperatively with the A. Philip Randolph Institute, senior citizens organized in the Concerned Citizens for Better Government and young voters through Frontlash. It is working also with a group of trade unionists who have developed an anti-Wallace campaign in Florida —the Committee for a Vote that Counts. (Story Page 10.)

A new COPE film on key issues in the '72 elections was premiered for the Administrative Committee. It deals with the Nixon Administration and is entitled "Promises and Performances."

In policy statements adopted in the first days of the session, the Executive Council:

- Called for "immediate" action by Congress on the stalled minimum wage legislation. The wage floor of $1.60 set in 1966 is below poverty levels by present-day living costs. (Story, Page 4.)
- Warned that public support for wage-price controls is being destroyed by "flagrant favoritism" at the expense of workers and the poor and termed the administration of the stabilization program "completely inequitable." (Story, Page 1.)
- Denounced Pres. Nixon's veto of a day care program for children of working parents and urged Congress to revive a similar bill in this session. (Story, Page 2.)
- Asked a substantial increase in federal funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and development of long-term financing. (Story, Page 5.)
- Stressed the need to provide federal general revenue funds to meet one-third of the total cost of social security benefits to provide a decent standard for the elderly without a sharp rise in payroll taxes. (Story, Page 2.)
- Endorsed a national voter registration law that would remove artificial barriers that discourage or disqualify persons from registering. (Story this page.)
- Warned against moves to make "a divisive political issue" out of school busing, opposed a constitutional amendment, and reiterated support for "quality, integrated education." (Story, Page 1.)

The council also elected three new members to fill vacancies left by the retirement of Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge, David Sullivan and Charles Luna. Named to the council were James T. Housewright, president of the Retail Clerks; George Hardy, president of the Service Employes; Al H. Chesser, president of the United Transportation Union. (Story, Page 1.)

The council heard a report from a delegation of British Trades Union Congress leaders on problems affecting both countries as well as distinctly TUC problems. The delegation was headed by Victor Feather, general secretary of the TUC.

At a series of press conferences Meany made the following points:

- Labor members will remain on the Pay Board because it would serve no good cause to leave at this time. If the country gets fed up with the ineffective enforcement of price controls while wages are strictly curbed there may be a new policy, a new presidential "flip-flop."
- Nixon's China visit was keyed to the 1972 elections and it will not produce any important changes in China and its dictatorship. Meany expressed again, however, his general support of the President's policies in Vietnam on winding down the war and the Vietnamization program.
- Assailed top White House aide H. R. Haldeman for his attack on Democratic candidates as consciously aiding the enemy in North Vietnam, but said the candidates opposing Nixon's Southeast Asia policies were encouraging Hanoi to believe that it can win a victory from the American people.
- Termed the dock legislation adopted by Congress a "disaster" and a first step toward the destruction of the free American way of life.
- Said that visits with the council by Democratic presidential candidates Hubert H. Humphrey, Henry "Scoop" Jackson and Vance Hartke were frank and friendly discussions of important problems.

Meany said that the council had a particularly useful discussion with Jackson on the busing issue. The federation president and a number of council members met with Edmund S. Muskie during the sessions here.

PRESIDENT of Carpenters, M. A. Hutcheson, leans over to chat with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at council session. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland is at left.

National System Backed For Voter Registration

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A measure that would dramatically increase voter registration and improve participation in elections was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO as a "wise" and badly needed law.

The Executive Council urged passage of the national voter registration program introduced by Sen. Gale McGee (D-Wyo.) as a "citizens bill" that would open the "voting booth equally to all."

The program would sweep away artificial barriers that prevent citizens from registering for federal elections, the council said, noting that while only 60 percent of the potential eligibles vote in presidential elections, more than 80 percent of those registered cast ballots.

The McGee bill would establish a national voter registration program for all federal elections and pay the states for the cost of administering a "registration-by-mail procedure." States also would be encouraged—though not forced—to accept the federal registration for state and local registration as well.

The measure provides that registration forms be mailed to each postal address in the United States not earlier than 45 days and not later than 30 days prior to the close of registration. Forms would be available without a time limit in post offices and other government offices.

By filling out and mailing a simple form, a citizen would thus be registered. This is a far cry, the council said, "from the present system which in many states obliges persons to travel some distance to a central registration office at hours inconvenient for most citizens—certainly for wage earners—and often to endure a long wait once there."

The council pointed out that the program set up under the legislation would help to relieve the labor movement of the responsibility of devoting substantial resources, time and energy to a non-partisan registration campaign, and at the same time "likely yielding a larger number of union member registrations."

'To Elect Our Friends, Defeat Our Enemies'

Following is the statement on support for COPE adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at Bal Harbour, Fla., Feb. 17, 1972:

The elections of 1972 pose the most serious challenge the trade union movement has ever faced.

At every level of government, there is a clear and pressing need to elect progessive, liberal men and women, committed to moving this country forward again.

Many of the candidates for national and state office are proven friends of workers, consumers and ordinary citizens. They deserve re-election and they merit our support.

On the other hand, many incumbents are proven allies of big business, dedicated to the disproven "trickle-down" system of economics, uninterested in the plight of the poor and the minorities, and opposed to the programs of progress essential to the well-being of workers. These incumbents deserve defeat and they merit our opposition.

In every instance, the judgments of the AFL-CIO will be made on the records of the candidates, regardless of their party affiliation. In every case, we will do our utmost to elect our friends and defeat our enemies.

To achieve this goal, the AFL-CIO Executive Council calls for the total mobilization of the labor movement at every level, for a commitment by all members and all union officials to join in the COPE program to the fullest possible extent.

This entails a massive effort to register every union member and voting-age member of his or her family, to wage a full-scale educational campaign, to acquaint our members of the truth about the record of the candidates and to produce a record turnout of union people at the polls.

It will require complete cooperation from every affiliated union and state AFL-CIO council, the assignment of staff people to COPE to assist in this political-educational effort among union members; the involvement of retirees and young family members in the drive and strengthening of the labor-minorities coalition that has been victorious in the past.

It means all-out effort to collect $2 for COPE from every member to help narrow the funding gap that always exists between labor's political friends and its political foes.

The 1972 election will be a major task. We enter it with our COPE operation in peak condition. With all-out support of COPE, we can win the most important election of the century.

Ingredients for Victory

Randolph Is Voted Murray-Green Prize

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council broke with precedent and voted one of its own members—A. Philip Randolph—the Murray-Green Award for outstanding humanitarian service.

Federation Pres. George Meany announced the decision to give the award to Randolph, a vice president of the AFL-CIO since its founding and president-emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters. Randolph is the dean of the nation's civil rights leaders.

Meany said the award honors Randolph's "great contribution" to America.

The annual award, labor's highest honor, is given in memory of Philip Murray, late president of the CIO, and William Green, late president of the AFL.

PRESS CONFERENCE following AFL-CIO Executive Council session gives newsmen a chance to question Federation Pres. George Meany. Leading newspapers, magazines, wire services and television-radio networks covered the council's mid-winter meeting.

Congress Urged to Act On Wage Floor Increase

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on the House Rules Committee to quit stalling on the minimum wage bill approved by the House Labor Committee and report it out for floor action.

The Executive Council declared there must be "immediate" and "affirmative congressional action" to bring the minimum wage up to acceptable levels.

The $1.60 minimum wage floor of 1966 "no longer even approaches the federally defined poverty level for a family of four," the council said in a statement, and the buying power of that minimum "has been all but destroyed" by a rise in living costs of more than 25 percent.

Enactment of the House bill with an immediate increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour and extension of coverage to about 5 million more workers "would be a valuable step forward," the council said. But it cited the goals adopted at the November 1971 AFL-CIO convention of a $2.50-an-hour wage floor, full coverage, equal wage levels for all workers and a single standard.

The council warned that the Administration is working for a measure that "would undermine the minimum wage by establishing a separate subminimum rate for youth," and stated its categorical rejection of this concept.

The President's subminimum wage for young workers would not increase employment; "it would merely rearrange the statistics of unemployment," the statement asserted.

The council statement called also on the Senate Labor Committee to complete deliberations and report a bill to the Senate for prompt action.

Metal Trades Ask End To Hatch Act 'Shackles'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Amendment of the Hatch Act "to permit federal employes to become first-class citizens" was given a top priority by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

At a meeting of its executive council here, a campaign to remove the "shackles" of the act was approved as a matter of "high legislative priority."

The council declared that the act, originally designed to protect federal workers from political pressures and preserve the integrity of federal employment has "become an anomaly and an albatross around the necks of all federal employes." The council's statement declared:

"Federal workers in our changing society must have the shackles of the Hatch Act removed. They are entitled to first-class political, economic and social citizenship. They are entitled to run for federal office on the same terms as all other citizens; to make political contributions individually or through their organizations in the same way as other citizens and otherwise to engage in political action individually and through organizations of their own choice. The Hatch Act has not freed federal workers; it has served only to enchain them politically."

The council adopted also a statement urging the "immediate release of already-appropriated funds being held back by the Nixon Administration."

In view of existing wage and price controls, department Pres. Paul Burnsky said, "Pres. Nixon no longer has an excuse to claim that release of funds would add fuel to inflation."

Release of the funds, the department statement stressed, is urgently needed "to provide jobs for Americans who merely want an opportunity to earn a decent living . . . the real problem simply is getting America back to work."

Strikers Vote On West Coast Dock Accord

San Francisco—Members of the International Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union were voting on a tentative settlement in the West Coast dock strike after a caucus of local union leaders decided to put the 18-month contract to a vote and recommended its acceptance.

Meanwhile, leaders of the International Longshoremen's Association set March 8 for a ratification vote on a new national contract that would prevent the renewal of strikes at East and Gulf Coast docks.

Just after the tentative West Coast dock settlement was reached, Congress passed and sent to Pres. Nixon a bill that would force an end to the West Coast walkout through compulsory arbitration. Key congressional Republicans reported, however, that Nixon had pledged not to sign it into law as long as he is satisfied progress is being made toward ending the strike.

The vote among rank and file ILWU members at 24 ports in California, Washington and Oregon was expected to be completed by Feb. 19. If the agreement is ratified, the 15,000 strikers could begin returning to work the next day, the union said.

A caucus of the local leadership from the 24 ports questioned ILWU Pres. Harry Bridges and his fellow negotiators for four days before recommending acceptance of the agreement reached with the Pacific Maritime Association.

Settlement terms were not made public pending the ratification vote. Among major issues in the dispute were guaranteed annual wage provisions and containerization.

Protests Force Utility Freeze:

Skepticism Mounts On Price Policies

The Administration's Economic Stabilization Program was faced with new controversies and skepticism as it completed its first six months.

Responding to a rising public protest over utility rate increases, the Price Commission reversed an earlier policy and decided to take another look at all companies whose rates are regulated by federal or state agencies.

The commission imposed a 30-day freeze on utility rates to gain time to study the 900 rate boosts that have already been approved by regulatory agencies and to reexamine its policy in this area.

Previously, the Price Commission had delegated authority to approve utility rate increases to the individual agencies requiring only that it be given reports of the actions.

Opponents of this policy had maintained that regulatory agencies are usually staffed with persons close to the industry they are charged with regulating, with the consumer given little or no consideration.

Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson acknowledged that the freeze had been instituted because of the magnitude of a number of the rate increases.

Criticism has surfaced within the commission of its policy allowing a company to pledge to hold its total price increases below 2 percent in exchange for the freedom to boost individual prices as much as it chooses.

Grayson contends that price increases have been held to 1.5 percent of sales, but critics assert that increases approved by the commission itself are running much higher.

The average increase granted during a one-week period in February came to 4.55 percent, significantly above the 2.5 percent guideline.

Meanwhile, the Cost of Living Council is still "formulating the guidelines" for informing complainants of the disposition of their complaints.

More than five weeks ago, the COL council said it would notify persons who complain about price violations to the Internal Revenue Service of the validity and disposition of their complaints in a "number of circumstances."

As yet, no complainant has been notified as to the validity of a complaint or whether restitution of overcharges is required.

Workers, Poor Called Victims Of Controls

A wage of $1.90 an hour, the federation said, is below the government's poverty line in terms of annual earnings and is "about 44 percent less than the hourly earnings needed to reach the $7,000 annual income, which is the Labor Dept.'s lowest estimate of what it costs a family of four to live in an American city."

The statement asserted that "no amount of slick propaganda can hide these self-evident facts from the American people—there is no fairness and equity in the Administration's so-called control program. It is weighted against workers and their families, with the greatest burden placed on the backs of those at the bottom of the economic ladder, who are least able to protect themselves."

A key to achieving economic justice is ending the $1.90 an hour limitation for exemption from wage controls, the federation statement concluded.

He joined the RCIA in 1947 in Indianapolis and was elected secretary-treasurer of Local 725. He was named to the union's international staff in 1953, serving as a division director, executive assistant to the president, and international vice president before his election as president.

Hardy, 61, became president of the Service Employes last May after having served as a vice president for 23 years.

He joined the SEIU in San Francisco in 1932—when the union had less than 400 members in the entire state. He formed the first California state council of the union and helped build the SEIU's membership above the 100,000 mark. In 1946, he was named director of the union's Southern California organizing drive. He also was a leader in establishing the 11-state Western Conference of Service Employes.

Chesser, 58, was the national legislative director of the United Transportation Union when he was elected president at the UTU convention last summer.

He began his career as a brakeman on the Sante Fe Railroad at Wellington, Kan., and later transferred to Amarillo, Tex. He served as legislative representative for his lodge of the former Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, later became state legislative representative and, in 1962, the BRT's national legislative representative. He retained the top legislative post in the subsequent four-union merger that established the UTU.

The three replacements for the retired council members bring the Executive Council to its full complement of 33 vice presidents plus the federation's president and secretary-treasurer.

'Opening Wedge':

Maritime Trades Hit Anti-Strike Measure

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. called for all-out opposition to Administration-sponsored legislation that would curtail the right to strike in the transportation industry.

The department's Executive Board at a two-day meeting here gave top attention to a resolution declaring that the threat to transportation workers was a threat to every other industry and worker and is part of "an opening wedge" to "render America's unions and their members helpless" in their struggle for a fair share.

MTD Pres. Paul Hall warned the board of the encroachment on free collective bargaining and said the situation would require top priority attention from the labor movement.

The resolution strongly opposed "any form of compulsory arbitration in the settlement of labor-management contracts, for compulsion and freedom are incompatible."

The board called on Congress to eliminate all "national emergency" sections of the Taft-Hartley and Railway Labor Acts.

In other actions the board:

- Pledged its active support of the foreign trade and investment bill to restrict the unregulated growth of multi-national corporations and to stem the export of American jobs, technology and capital.
- Heard a report from Department Administrator O. William Moody, Jr. that the department will focus on promoting jobs during the current session of Congress, with special emphasis on maritime matters.
- Received reports on the necessity for a national policy covering all modes of transportation if the nation is to avoid serious economic and social consequences and of the need for a drastic change in economic policy "to replace the pious rhetoric of the past three years."
- Called on all MTD affiliates to support actively the "watchdog units" of the AFL-CIO in riding herd on price increases under Phase II of the Administration's program.
- Urged legislation to provide for safety glazing that would eliminate needless injuries and deaths due to people walking through glass doors and panels.
- Called for immediate implementation of the 30-merchant-ships-per-year construction program promised in the Merchant Marine Act of 1970.
- Criticized the Administration for its failure to enforce the Jones Act governing U.S. waterborne domestic commerce and urged closing of existing loopholes in the act.
- Renewed its call for retention of Public Health Service Hospitals and accused the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare of "attempting to hoodwink Congress" on their intentions, which are directed to transfer or closing of the hospitals.

Moody told the sessions that job prospects in the maritime industry for 1972 are no better that they were in 1970 or 1971 and that every effort must be made to push for job-producing legislation.

ALL-OUT FIGHT against Nixon Administration's bill to curtail the right to strike in transportation industries is urged by Maritime Trades Dept. Pres. Paul Hall at a meeting of the department's executive board. A resolution termed compulsory arbitration "incompatible" with freedom.

Funds Urged For Non-Profit Broadcasting

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An immediate substantial increase in federal funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting as a stopgap measure until stable long-term financing can be enacted was called for by the AFL-CIO.

The federation made clear, also, its opposition to the "Administration's attempt to circumvent the intent of the Congress by syphoning off funds for the CPB to be administered by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare."

Public broadcasting, the Executive Council said, has made significant and continuing progress in recent years, but it must be guaranteed a stable, long-range system of financing to develop and reach its full potential. Such a system would remove "this vital medium" from potential political pressure and constantly changing governmental budgetary standards.

Long-term financing would allow increased assistance to local stations and community-oriented programming, the council said, pointing out that the Administration's approach would inject partisan politics into public broadcasting "at a time when public television and radio must be insulated from such pressures."

Factory Injury Rate Rises to 19-Year High

The injury rate in manufacturing climbed in 1970 to the highest level in 19 years, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Preliminary data show that the number of disabling injuries per million man-hours rose from 14.8 in 1969 to 15.2 last year. This was the highest level since 1951, when the injury-frequency rate was 15.5, the BLS noted.

The rates are based on the American National Standards Institute records and not on the Occupational Safety & Health Act record-keeping system, which went into effect in July.

Despite the increase in the factory injury rate, coal mining and contract construction continued as more hazardous occupations.

Disabling injuries in coal mining were at 41.6 per million employe-hours last year, slightly lower than in 1969. The injury rate for construction was 28, the same as a year earlier.

The BLS said that the injury rate tapered off between 1951 and 1960, but since 1961—when a rate of 11.8 was recorded—it has moved upward.

In the manufacturing group, the high-risk occupations were lumber and wood products, food and kindred products, stone, glass and clay products, fabricated metal products, and furniture and fixtures.

The injury rate for lumber and wood products was 34.1 last year, down five-tenths from 1969. The rate for food and kindred products rose to 28.8 from 27.3 in 1969. Also on the rise were injuries in stone, glass and clay products at a rate of 23.8, and fabricated metal products, 22.4. The injury rate for furniture and fixtures dipped slightly to 22.

Crafts Cite Plant Maintenance Gains

Bal Harbour, Fla. — The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. reported that significant progress is being made in expanding contract plant maintenance work with 35 major contractors.

The progress reports came at conferences here among 13 building trades unions participating in the program of renovation, modification and maintenance of existing facilities and contractor representatives.

The sessions covered maintenance rates, greater flexibility of work crews and methods of handling disputes.

Michigan Union Leader 'Gus' Scholle Dies at 67

Detroit—August Scholle, retired president of the Michigan AFL-CIO who was a leader in the labor movement's successful fight for "one man, one vote" legislative apportionment, died in his cottage on Saginaw Bay on Feb. 15.

"Gus" Scholle, 67, was released from a hospital a few days earlier where he had been taking treatment for cancer. His wife, Kathleen, died Jan. 7.

Scholle retired in 1971 after 30 years as a state body president. He headed the Michigan CIO Council from 1940 until the 1958 merger of the two state units and continued to head the state federation until last June.

Besides his 15-year fight for fair congressional and legislative districting, Scholle was also successful in leading the battle to the U.S. Supreme Court that entitled workers to "portal to portal" pay.

In a message to the Michigan AFL-CIO, Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland said, "Gus was a staunch trade unionist, a great leader, an outstanding citizen of Michigan and a fine gentleman. We valued our long and warm friendship with him. We shall miss him."

Scholle left high school in 1920 for a job as a glass worker and later as a construction worker. In 1935, he was elected president of the Toledo, O., Local 9 of the Flat Glass Workers, a forerunner of the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

The glass union was one of the original affiliates of the CIO, and in 1937 Scholle was appointed CIO regional director for Michigan and northwestern Ohio. He held that post until 1954, except for a period in 1939 when he was the CIO regional director in Illinois.

He also headed the CIO Political Action Committee in Michigan, and after merger he became chairman of the Michigan AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

In 1946, Scholle's legal suit for "portal to portal" pay reached the U.S. Supreme Court, which ruled that workers should be paid for the time they spend on the employer's premises. The suit involved the claim of Mt. Clemens, Mich., pottery workers that they were not paid for nearly an hour of time spent getting their equipment ready and walking to and from work stations while on plant property. The decision by the court meant millions of dollars of additional wages for workers throughout the country.

In the high court's ruling on "one man, one vote," the final decision contained many of the arguments presented in Scholle's suit.

Besides his many and varied functions in the labor movement, Scholle was also highly active in a number of public service organizations, including membership on the boards of trustees of both the University of Michigan and Wayne State University.

Commenting on Scholle's death, Michigan AFL-CIO Pres. William C. Marshall and Sec.-Treas. Walter Campbell said: "The vitality of the Michigan labor movement today results from Gus Scholle's pioneer efforts in the early days of the CIO and his dedicated leadership of the AFL-CIO."

Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers said of Scholle, "His service to the total community was as great and dedicated as to the union members he represented. The UAW mourns a close ally and good friend."

Scholle is survived by two daughters. Private services were held Feb. 17, and public memorial rites were scheduled for Feb. 19 in Madison Heights, Mich.

Rules Issued To Clarify Pension Rights

New rules have been proposed by the Labor Dept. to give workers a clearer understanding of the benefits and pitfalls in private pension programs.

In announcing the proposals, which were published in the Federal Register Feb. 1, Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., said that many pension plan participants and beneficiaries are "misinformed and misled as to their rights."

He said the regulations would require administrators of the plans to furnish on request of their participants "a comprehensive description of what the pension plan provides in simple non-technical language."

The information would also have to specify clearly "the circumstances under which they might lose benefits."

The rules would further require the administrators to notify in writing all persons covered by the plans of their right to examine and receive copies of the plan descriptions.

A one-year study by the Labor Dept. led to the formulation of the rules which implement the provisions of the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act.

No Fairness, No Equity

ALMOST WITHOUT exception, the decisions of the Cost of Living Council—the key mechanism in the Nixon economic control program—have been completely inequitable.

Instead of trying to achieve a better balance in the control program, the Administration is continuing to move it in a lopsided direction. When on Jan. 19, the Cost of Living Council, headed by Sec. of the Treasury John Connally and Director Donald Rumsfeld, lifted price controls from three-quarters of all retail stores and nearly half of the nation's rental units, its excuse was that complaints of violations were so numerous it was necessary to reduce the workload of the Internal Revenue Service.

Ten days later, the council added to the record of unfair policies by exempting only hourly earnings below $1.90 an hour from wage controls. This was clearly contrary to the terms of the amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act, which had been adopted towards the end of 1971.

In enacting those amendments, Congress had determined that wage controls should not be imposed on wage increases of "any individual whose earnings are substandard or who is amongst the working poor." Moreover, in response to a tentative recommendation from the Cost of Living Council, a clear majority of the Pay Board had decided that a $1.90 limitation was too low and would be "inconsistent with the purposes of the amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act."

A wage of $1.90 an hour results in annual earnings of $3,952 for a full working year—below the government's poverty-line of more than $4,100 for a four-person family at current prices. It is about 44 percent less than the hourly earnings needed to reach the $7,000 annual income, which is the Labor Dept.'s lowest estimate of what is costs a family of four to live in an American city.

NO AMOUNT of slick propaganda can hide these self-evident facts from the American people—there is no fairness and equity in the Administration's so-called control program. It is weighted against workers and their families, with the greatest burden placed on the backs of those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

This flagrant favoritism is rapidly destroying the public support that is a prerequisite for a successful stabilization effort in a free society. It is undermining confidence in the ability of the government to manage the nation's economy in the public interest.

A key to achieving economic justice is ending the $1.90-an-hour limitation for exemption from wage controls. We do not believe the unconscionable rejection of the needs of low-wage workers and their families by the Cost of Living Council can be allowed to stand. There are four avenues to justice for these workers:

1. The Pay Board can and should immediately reopen this question, determine on an equitable figure and publicly petition the Cost of Living Council to adopt it.

2. Legal challenges can and should be undertaken. We applaud those unions which are taking such steps and we will support them.

3. Some workers will be forced to strike against these regulations and we will support such efforts as well.

4. The Congress must not allow its mandate to be flouted. The appropriate congressional committees should immediately open oversight hearings, call before them Sec. Connally and Director Rumsfeld and demand an explanation of this clear violation of congressional intent and, if necessary, enact new legislation that will insure justice for America's working poor.

A Word Edgewise:

Vigilante Reprisals in Ghettos No Solution for Lawlessness

By John P. Roche

THE POLICE in many big American cities are increasingly faced with a novel problem in law enforcement: the return of the vigilantes.

The initial signs were bodies of "known" dope-pushers that turned up, killed by a person or persons unknown. The cops, who have plenty of important jobs to keep them occupied, have not exactly broken their backs trying to solve these particular homicides. Their philosophy here parallels that toward "gangland slayings": One less for us to worry about."

Actually vigilantism is one of the major strands in the American tradition. The police force as we know it is a modern invention. For the best part of our history the enforcement of the laws was delegated to the citizenry with the sheriff's posse the standard instrument.

In time of crises, the sheriff would swear in able-bodied men as deputies. Under certain circumstances, where for example the sheriff was corrupt or inert, the citizens would simply act without badges. The famous vigilantes who cleaned up San Francisco back in the 1850s fell into this category.

From one viewpoint there is something commendable about this do-it-yourself approach to law and order—the community of concerned participants is part of the democratic ideal.

However, there is and was an ugly side: too often it was impossible to differentiate the posse from a lynch mob. And the vigilantes seldom wasted much time on legal niceties; as the expression went, they gave a man a fair trial and hanged him. This notion—that "bad" men have no rights—runs head-on into those standards of decency and equity called due process of law.

However, before getting unduly pious about civil rights, we have to realize that the new vigilantes have arisen in the black ghettos to cope with the appalling reality of drug addiction and the fearful crime rate that goes with it. And it must be confessed that city police forces have failed, often for perfectly understandable reasons, to provide minimal standards of law in the ghetto.

First of all, there simply are not enough police; the cruiser is no substitute for patrolmen on the beat. Second, there is an imperative need for Negro policemen to deal with the black neighborhoods. This is not racism—the Boston "Soul Patrol," a special task force of Negro police, makes excellent police sense.

What lunatic would ever send Italian cops to break up a St. Patrick's Day brawl? There are certain cultural realities that have nothing to do with racism.

BUT WHILE CONCEDING that the ghetto vigilantes are responding to a genuine need, and admitting that we have failed to cope adequately with their baleful problems, we simply cannot as a society accept Georgia State Rep. Julian Bond's formulation that "the sellers of poison to our children know that the price of drugs is death at the hands of the community." (The impassioned young black legislator did later back off somewhat, denying that he advocated murder.)

In a Mosaic sense, of course, Bond was right, but we can't run a society of more than 200 million people by the lex talionis—the "eye for an eye and tooth for a tooth" system.

If private enterprise in law enforcement ever gets legitimated—even in the most worthy cause—there is no telling where it will end. Thomas Hobbes, the English philosopher, probably described the end product correctly as the "war of each against all" where life is "nasty, poor, brutish and short."

Calls for Changes in Makeup:

Meany Condemns Unfairness Of Pay, Price Control Panels

The following is excerpted from an interview with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, published in the Feb. 21, 1972, issue of U.S. News & World Report magazine.

Q. Apart from the disagreements you have over the Pay Board, do you think that generally the control system is doing what it is supposed to be doing in slowing down inflation?

A. No, it's not doing what it's supposed to do.

Q. Why do you say that?

A. Because it's not working fairly. I mean, the Pay Board is working unfairly. I think the Price Commission is working unfairly. I think they're giving out exemptions right and left and—

Q. Do you think prices are going up too fast?

A. They're still going up.

Q. What do you think should be done about it?

A. Change the Pay Board, change the Price Commission.

Q. Change them to what?

A. Appoint people who are interested in the welfare of the country as a whole.

The Price Commission is practically under government control. The Pay Board is government controlled. And that means "this Administration control." In other words, decisions are made on the basis of what they will do to enhance the image of the Administration.

Q. After you advocated wage-price controls very early, did you change your position when they were imposed, as some Administration officials have said?

A. I didn't change. I yelled "Foul!" I said, "You gave us the controls, but you gave us a stacked deck."

The big scrap with Pres. Nixon during August, September and October was over his action in invalidating contracts and the wage increases they promised in the freeze period. But Congress ordered these deferred pay raises paid—they passed the labor members' proposal word for word, and the President signed the law. The labor members of the board had said, "Validate the contracts, give us our retroactivity, and we'll take the 5.5 percent as the formula for new contracts."

Q. On the basis of recent Pay Board decisions, Mr. Meany, do you think the labor members will stay on the board or walk off? Have things improved or deteriorated from labor's point of view?

A. Well, they haven't gotten any better, I would say. We don't feel at this moment that there is any particular good we could gain by getting off, but the thing is not working too well.

The decision of the Cost of Living Council on an exemption for wage increases for low-wage workers is almost a tragedy, to me. Congress insisted that these workers be exempt.

Labor members of the Pay Board wanted to allow wages to go to $3.50 an hour without requiring board approval. The board finally said the $1.90 figure recommended by the council was too low, but the council held it to $1.90.

The Pay Board, as a result, is going to be bogged down with disputes. When you have to take action on raises for anyone going above $1.90, your case load could be very much higher. There may be strikes over this figure. And it is just terribly oppressive and unfair to the low-income family.

Q. Is there any chance the AFL-CIO will support Pres. Nixon for re-election?

A. I would say the answer at this time is the chances are very slim. His record on domestic matters has been awfully bad. And I'll tell you, I'm not too much pleased with his turnaround on foreign policy.

I'd like to know from someone in this Administration how the hell we got into this Pakistan mess on the side of Pakistan—how we got in on the side of a military dictatorship, murdering people by the tens of thousands, and how we stayed with them and turned against India.

After all, India is a democracy, Pakistan is a military dictatorship, and we were with them 1,000 percent. Why, I don't know. And no one has ever explained why.

And I don't think we should allow ourselves to get into a box that I think Nixon is going to get himself in going to China just because of his re-election. That's the only thing he can possibly get out of the visit to China, if he gets a favorable response from the people in this country. But he's not going to outsmart the Chinese.

Q. To get over on the positive side of this thing what criterion do you have in judging candidates when it comes to domestic policies, for instance?

A. Our own view as wage earners and citizens: the economy, attitude toward labor, attitude toward civil rights, attitude toward consumer legislation, attitude toward poverty, attitude toward the ecology, and all of these things—the whole bit. We cover the whole bit.

We don't just think in terms of wages and hours for our people. You go over to our shop, and you'll find that we're all over the domestic scene.

Q. What marks would you give Mr. Nixon on his whole performance?

A. Bad. The domestic stuff—very bad. He makes good speeches but he doesn't deliver. He vetoes. He talks about poverty, he talks about the elderly—every bill that comes along that would mean anything for these people, he vetoes. So his record is bad.

Watchdog Report:

Inadequate Enforcement Cited In Runaway Price Increases

LACKING CLEAR-CUT rules and stiff enforcement, the Nixon Administration's Phase 2 price controls show "weakness in every aspect," the head of a union-sponsored price-watching effort in New York City declared in a network radio interview.

Elizabeth Feinstein, director of Operation Price-Watch, said that store-by-store surveys made regularly by volunteers throughout the city "show that prices are continuing to rise at an appalling rate," despite the optimistic claims of Administration officials.

"Grocery prices," she said, are "going up at as fast a rate of inflation as we've ever had," and meat prices are reported to be "the highest ever." Operation Price-Watch is sponsored by District 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

There is a real "need for consumers to be their own police," Miss Feinstein stressed, because the Internal Revenue Service, assigned as the Administration's enforcement arm, has neither "the money, nor the manpower, nor the facilities" to do the job.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Miss Feinstein said that some 300 union members and their families are now working with Operation Price-Watch in New York City, and a growing number of other groups and individual citizens are aiding the volunteer effort.

She said that "boycotting stores could bring a press focal point on the issue," but the greater need is for the federal government to adopt the "strictest possible controls" and enforce them vigorously.

"Hopefully, under a new Administration or under a different system, we would have a more equitable standard for controlling prices for working people and poor people," she declared.

"Item-by-item controls . . . would actually be an easier system for the IRS to monitor," she stressed, noting that "audit of the entire books of the store . . . or audit of all the stores in a chain" is the only way to determine whether or not particular price hikes are proper under the present system of "aggregate increases."

WITH THE ELECTION still more than eight months away, Pres. Nixon's Cabinet is plunging into presidential politics at a time and to a degree unprecedented in past administrations.

No less than six Cabinet secretaries—Labor, Agriculture, Transportation, Commerce, Housing & Urban Development and Treasury—have unleashed attacks on the trade union movement in the dock strike that went far beyond the immediate dispute.

The far-ranging operations of Sec. of Agriculture Earl Butz and Sec. of State William Rogers—to underscore two case examples—provide a solid indication that Nixon has given his Cabinet members the initial role of attacking Democratic presidential hopefuls.

Within a week's time, Butz twice fired off letters to the five Democratic senators demanding that they use their influence on behalf of Nixon's compulsory arbitration scheme for ending the West Coast dock strike.

The Secretary accused the senators of "foot dragging" on ending a strike that "has cost farmers $1 billion in income." Butz, who organized a farm lobby of Congress in an effort to drive through the Nixon bill, was challenged on this figure at a press conference. "I can't prove it was a billion," he snapped, "but nobody can prove it wasn't, either."

Butz further boasted that the candidates didn't know farmers "as I do." Ironically, this issue was precisely the one upon which the AFL-CIO, the National Farmers Union and even some farm state Republicans opposed the confirmation of Butz last year. They charged that the only farmers Butz "knew," or represented, as an assistant to Ezra Taft Benson in the Eisenhower Administration, were of the "corporation" variety, not the family farmers.

THE BUTZ INTRUSION into the labor-management field underscores the prediction of a number of politics-watchers that Nixon's re-election drive will center on a try at turning union members against their leaders, and the public—including farmers—against unions.

As for Rogers role, New York Times columnist James Reston pointed out that past Secretaries of State—Marshall, Acheson, Dulles and Rusk—carefully avoided debate with a presidential candidate of the opposition party, knowing how often they had to appear before Congress for support of their policies.

But one cannot conclude that because every other President since 1944 has "recognized the dangers" of sending Cabinet officers into election battles, a free-swinging Nixon will be deterred.

In 1970, a non-presidential year, he announced in advance of the campaign that he alone would quarterback it. His unconcern for the future effectiveness of Cabinet officers was shown then in the amazing dispatch of Transportation Sec. John Volpe to Indiana to campaign against Sen. Vance Hartke, who headed a subcommittee handling most major transportation bills.

Hartke survived a close race and—sure enough—a few days after the election his subcommittee entertained Volpe as a witness. What followed was a merciless, Hartke tongue-lashing of the Secretary for failing to meet his responsibilities, climaxed by a not-too-subtle reminder that the senator "would be around for some time." Volpe squirmed for an hour, barely getting in a word.

Butz and Rogers are dealt with here because their participation in politics has been the most noticeable. But others are busy, too. Sec. of the Interior Rogers Morton has campaigned against Muskie in New Hampshire.

The activity is such as to intimate that Nixon, who loquaciously postures as being above politics at this time, already is running as scared as any President in history.

WEAKNESS SHOWS UP in "every aspect" of Phase 2 price controls, despite claims of Nixon Administration officials, declared Elizabeth Feinstein, center, director of Operation Price-Watch sponsored by District 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employes. She was interviewed on Labor News Conference by Lynn Langway of the Chicago Daily News and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Surging Prices on Food Items Scorn Government Controls

By Sidney Margolius

CHUCK STEAK went up 18 cents a pound in Detroit in just the first two weeks of January, and 6 cents in New York in one recent week. Price tags on chopped beef jumped 6 cents a pound in New York and 8 cents in Baltimore. In one city the lowest price for bacon was 58 cents mid-January. Near the end of the month, the lowest price market reporters found was 79 cents.

Frankfurters, typically 59 cents a pound in mid-January in promotional supermarkets, now more often are 79 cents and in some stores as much as 99. Rib roast is up a dime; stew beef up 6 cents; shoulder pork chops, 6 cents.

These are just a few of the many increases in food prices that have suddenly erupted in supermarkets since the first of the year in a price surge that has made a mockery of the government's price control program.

The fact is, the government's current drive to require stores to post their base prices now represents only an illusion of price control. Few consumers check the lists of base prices and it wouldn't do them much good if they did.

Some of the most important foods are not under controls anyway, and retailers are permitted to pass along price increases, in any case. As well as increases officially granted by the Price Commission, manufacturers have other ways of bypassing the purported price controls, such as dropping lowest-price models and reducing the discounts and promotional allowances they often give on official list prices. Thus, real prices go up while "list prices" remain the same.

While the jump in meat prices is most drastic, especially since meat alone takes 25 cents of your food dollar, a number of other food items have gone up too, our study of prices in three major cities shows. Some varieties of fresh and frozen fish are up 10 cents a pound in just the past two weeks, and as much as 30 cents since Dec. 1.

Milk, too, has gone up 2 cents a half-gallon in many cities.

Price increases also have been noticeable on fresh produce. Of 32 vegetable items surveyed, nine went up in late January. Only one went down (collards). Among prominent increases have been jumps in prices of tomatoes, and increases on potatoes of a dime for a five-pound bag.

Prices of canned produce also have been affected. Consumers now pay a penny or two more for canned pears, corn and tomatoes; as much as 5 cents more for cut green beans, and 6 to 10 cents more for sliced pineapple.

Consumers have complained about rising coffee prices, too. A check with wholesalers indicates that large roasters have maintained official list prices to retailers on some types but reduced discounts; in effect forcing an increase in retail prices.

Other recent wholesale increases on dry groceries soon will show up in the stores. Some Campbell's soups are going up about 2 cents a can. Sugar will cost about 4 cents more on a five-pound box. Some brands of baked beans will cost a penny more.

THE NET EFFECT of the boost in food prices is certain to be another jump in total living costs on top of the rise of about one-half of 1 percent in December (a rate of approximately 5 percent a year). Food alone rose 1.1 percent in December even before this new upsurge in meat and other food prices.

The other hot spot for cost-harassed working families is housing. Some rental units have been removed from price controls completely; in many others, hikes have been permitted or are possible for landlords to secure. Average increases are variously estimated at 3.5 to 10 percent.

Not even the official cost of living index reflects the full extent of the actual recent and pending price increases. The index, for example, does not fully reflect the shift to higher-priced items in supermarket sales, and the dropping of lowest-priced items in some home furnishings lines.

The price control attempt was a futile, half-hearted one from the start, with no attempt to control farm prices, and no effort to solve the four major causes of rising living costs, namely, the high prices of food, housing, transportation and medical care.

With meat prices bouncing, what's left to eat? The three best buys at this time are eggs, eggs and eggs. This versatile food is selling at distress prices such as 50-60 cents a dozen (that's a pound and a half of no-waste food). Cured pork products such as smoked hams and shoulders lag behind the rising prices of pork. Poultry has not been affected seriously yet.

The only other strategy left, if the Administration and Congress don't take real action to stem price increases, is to use smaller portions of meat, stretching them with lower-cost protein foods like eggs and some of the milk products and grain foods. If the livestock people and middlemen have more meat left on their hands they can either eat it themselves or reduce prices.

PUBLIC EMPLOYES prefer bona fide AFL-CIO unionism to independent union status, Federation Organization Director William A. Kircher, left, is told following a smashing election victory in San Diego County, Calif., by the State, County & Municipal Employes. AFSCME Local 127 rebuffed a raid attempt by the Independent Employes Association to retain bargaining rights for 560 county probation office employes. With Kircher are, from left, Local Business Rep. Joe Carpenter and members James Massa and Clyde Weston, who headed the election campaign.

Severe Health Problems:

Inner Cities Suffer Brunt of Pollution

HEALTH PROBLEMS related to a polluted environment are much more common and serious among inner city residents than they are among residents of the nation's more affluent suburban communities, a group of scientists and urban specialists told the Subcommittee on Environment of the Senate Commerce Committee.

Harlem has environmental problems that neighboring Westchester County never dreamed of, witnesses said. Diseases such as rat bite fever, salmonellosis and murine typhus fever may be unknown in the suburbs, but they are common in the ghetto, was the refrain.

Subcommittee Chairman Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) said the two-day hearing was called precisely to explore this "often ignored" aspect of our environmental crisis. "I refer to the environmental degradation imposed on our inner cities and their residents," he said.

Gustav Heningburg, president of the Greater Newark (N.J.) Urban Coalition and chairman of the National Association of Coalition Directors, testified that ghetto residents suffer not only from inadequate shelter, jobs and educational opportunities, they must also bear the added burden of residing in the most environmentally degraded real estate in the world.

Pollution to the middle-class American, who has some options about where and how he lives, means DDT, chemicals added to food products, unregulated streams and rivers, and other esoteric problems, Heningburg said.

But the ghetto dweller knows the problems of pollution as a constant companion, and their solution is urgent because it is a matter of survival, not convenience, he asserted.

Everyday environmental problems, he testified, are compounded in the ghetto: the sheer size of the garbage and solid waste in inner cities; over-crowding and congestion of unregulated land use patterns; highways cutting through urban neighborhoods pouring pollutants on densely-populated areas for long periods of time, and the lack of federal commitment to clean up ghettos.

THE INNER CITY POOR in general are exposed to 30 percent higher levels of carbon monoxide and other automotive pollutants, according to Dr. James Sullivan, of the Washington, D.C.-based Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI). He also cited research data showing that noise levels in living quarters of the poor—due, in part, to crowding and poor construction—can be ten times the levels in suburban communities.

Louis Lombardo, a former urban poor specialist with the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), and now with CSPI, revealed what he identified as an internal EPA memo on a study indicating that ghetto children are possibly being exposed to toxic quantities of lead from automobile pollution. He urged a federal standard requiring the complete elimination of lead in gasoline by 1977.

Turning to another serious ghetto problem—that of solid waste disposal—Lombardo urged the Hart subcommittee to see that EPA's future plans for Federal support of sewage plant construction put special emphasis on locating and speeding up construction of such facilities so they benefit the poor.

He chided Congress for "being too soft" on holding EPA and other government agencies accountable for rigid enforcement of programs under their jurisdiction. "We've got some pretty good laws on the books, but they're no good unless they're enforced," he said.

He suggested the creation of a special advisory council—composed of "environmental activists"—to see that EPA does what it is supposed to do.

Bargain Sales, Super Products, Time Saving Devices All Flop

By Jane Goodsell

I PURCHASED six sheets and 12 pillowcases at a January white sale at 25 percent off the regular price.

And I subscribed to a weekly magazine at the special two-year subscription rate which saves me almost 15 cents an issue.

And I bought a pair of gloves, regularly $11.50, on sale for a limited time only at the bargain price of $8.99.

And I redeemed a valuable coupon allowing me to purchase a nationally advertised brand of cake mixes, regularly 38 cents each, at the weekend special savings of 3/$1.04.

And I took advantage of a special introductory offer which entitled me to a purse-size flacon of cologne absolutely free if I purchased a jar of nutrient moisture cream and a bottle of astringent lotion.

And I drove to a grocery store 20 blocks out of my way to use a coupon entitling me to 100 extra trading stamps with a $5 or more purchase.

And what puzzles me is, how can someone as thrifty as I am be so broke?

MY BRAND of cigarettes is made of the highest quality mild tobacco.

And the dishwasher detergent I use fights drops that cause embarrassing water spots.

And my deodorant is one that I can count on not to let me down.

And my shampoo has conditioners to give my hair extra body, glow and gloss.

And my camera has a foolproof electronic shutter that automatically times my snapshots for me.

And the milk I buy is fortified with extra vitamins.

So how come I still have these feelings of insecurity?

MY FROZEN PEAS come in a nice little oblong box, already shelled.

And my electric can opener zips cans open lickety-split when I press the little lever.

And my instant oatmeal cooks in less than a minute.

And my automatic washer and dryer liberate me from washday drudgery.

And my no-iron fabrics don't need any ironing hardly.

And my dishwasher saves me hours of clean-up time.

So how come I always feel rushed and harried?

Key Vote on Compulsory Arbitration

The House on Feb. 9 voted to act on a compulsory arbitration bill for the West Coast dock strike even though a settlement had already been negotiated at the bargaining table.

The rule that made the legislation in order was adopted on a key 203-170 vote.

On labor's scoreboard, the 160 Democrats and 10 Republicans who voted against the compulsory arbitration maneuver were Right (R). The 64 Democrats and 139 Republicans who supported it cast Wrong (W) votes.

Other symbols: PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired. Numerals show districts; AL—at large.

Oilers Reach Wage Accord On Railroads

The Firemen & Oilers have won wage increases of 97 cents to $1 over 30 months for the 13,000 railway shopcraftsmen the union represents.

Because union negotiators, led by Pres. William E. Fredenberger, had been authorized to complete the agreement, the new contract, which runs from Jan. 1, 1971 to July 1, 1973, will not require ratification by the membership.

It will, however, require Pay Board approval.

The settlement follows the pattern set by four other shopcraft unions that already have signed. The only other union that hasn't reached agreement with the nation's railroads is the Sheet Metal Workers which is seeking restoration of certain work rules eliminated in the last round of bargaining two years ago.

In a letter directed to the membership, Fredenberger noted that "we were successful in getting 2 cents an hour more for all current rates at or below $3.30 an hour, and 1 cent for those at $3.31.

"While the amounts may be small, they affect almost 10,000 of our members and constitute recognition by the carriers of our problems with some of our base rates, which we have been trying to raise to get our pay level program into a more uniform and equitable position which will help boost all our rates."

Fredenberger said a most important part of the settlement "is the assurance of cooperation of the carriers to continue to negotiate in good faith on individual properties on our reclassification and wage adjustment problems."

The schedule of raises includes: 10 cents an hour as of Jan. 1, 1971; 15 cents an hour, Apr. 1, 1971 for stationary engineers and 8 cents an hour for all others on that date; 5 percent Oct. 1, 1971; 5 percent Apr. 1, 1972; 5 percent Oct. 1, 1972, and 25 cents Apr. 1, 1973.

Gains also were made in fringe benefits including an additional holiday — Veteran's Day — after Jan. 1, 1973. This brought the total of paid holidays to nine.

Sex Bias Laid to GE On Height Standard

A minimum height requirement of 5 feet 7 inches for employment at a General Electric Co. plant in Tyler, Tex., is being challenged by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, in a sex discrimination suit that charges the rule excludes more women than men from employment.

Citing the latest national "Weight, Height, & Selected Body Dimensions of Adults," published by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, the IUE asserted that the GE rule "disqualifies more than 94 percent of all females aged 18 to 79 from employment" at the plant and, therefore, is discriminatory against women.

The height case—one of two sex discrimination cases filed by the IUE against GE recently—was initiated in the U.S. District Court division at Tyler by the international and its Local 782 on behalf of six women who were turned down for jobs at the plant because the company said they weren't tall enough.

IUE asked the court to bar GE from imposing the 5-7 rule because it violates the Civil Rights Act of 1964, to order GE to offer the women jobs, and to require that GE pay lost wages and damages—plus interest—resulting from the previous denial of employment.

The IUE pointed out that the height rule, as applied to both men and women, "is not a reasonable or necessary requirement for employment" because "the vast majority of all jobs in the Tyler plant can be performed in the most efficient and satisfactory manner" by persons less than 5 feet 7 inches tall.

The plant produces central air conditioning units for the home.

The IUE said the height rule also discriminates against men and that the union is pursuing action on behalf of male workers denied employment at the Tyler plant on those grounds.

In the union's other sex discrimination suit, it charged that a General Electric plant in Fort Wayne, Ind., paid two matrons 35 cents less an hour than it paid male janitors in the same plant for work requiring "equal skill, effort and responsibiilty . . . under similar working conditions."

The union noted that the Equal Pay Amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act forbid paying less than equal pay for equal work.

The IUE said that both the Tyler and Fort Wayne complaints are class action suits seeking recompense and relief "for other, unnamed persons who have been similarly discriminated against."

Asbestos Plant Closed:

Workers Lose Jobs To Health Hazards

Rather than correct health hazards at the Pittsburgh-Corning Corp. plant in Tyler, Tex., the company shut down production of its asbestos insulation operations—throwing 60 employes out of work, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers charged.

The plant ceased operations Feb. 3, shortly after it was fined the second time by the federal government for failure to correct the hazardous conditions. Excessive exposure to asbestos dust can lead to serious diseases, including abestosis and lung cancer.

Government occupational health officials had been made aware of the conditions at the plant several years ago, but failed to act on the complaints until last December. And then, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration imposed a fine for "non-serious or regular" violations.

Another inspection was conducted by OSHA in January. This time, Pittsburgh-Corning was fined $6,990 when it was found that the company had not abated the health hazards.

In addition to failing to correct hazardous conditions for workers, OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron warned that Pittsburgh-Corning was polluting the atmosphere by dumping asbestos wastes in open fields near the plant.

In a telegram to William Ruckelshaus, administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, Grospiron said that the firm should be required to bury its wastes, rather than allow the abestos fibers to blow around the countryside.

The threat of exposure to asbestos dust extends beyond the Tyler area, Grospiron further noted.

Burlap bags in which asbestos was shipped to the plant have been sold to nurseries in the area which in turn have used them to ship rose plants all over the nation.

"These bags are heavily polluted with asbestos fibers and this poses a health hazard to nursery workmen and possibly others, including ultimate consumers," Grospiron pointed out.

"We understand that Pittsburgh-Corning stopped selling these bags some months ago," he said "but we know thousands of them are still in use."

Grospiron estimated that during 18 years of asbestos production operations at the plant, 1,500 workers have been exposed to the health hazards. He said that "medical evidence is that many of them assuredly will suffer chest cancer or asbestosis."

In another telegram to Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who heads OSHA, Grospiron said that while Pittsburgh-Corning has chosen to stop production rather than correct the conditions, the government's safety agency should maintain surveillance of the situation. He warned that the operations may be moved to other plants.

"In view of the past conduct of this company," Grospiron asked, "is there any assurance that future employes of the company in other locations will not be subjected to such grave hazards?"

The union also urged the Environmental Protection Agency that a public announcement be made involving the health hazards of the burlap bags to gardeners. It suggested that all the bags be traced and recalled.

OCAW also warned that Pittsburgh-Corning should be watched closely by the EPA to prevent it from renewing open dumping of asbestos wastes if it shifts production to other areas.

Florida Unionists Spur Drive Against Wallace

Orlando, Fla.—Two trade unionists who voted for Alabama Gov. George Wallace in 1968 are now spearheading a campaign against Wallace in the Florida Democratic presidential primary.

They say that those who vote for the Alabama governor on Mar. 14 will, in fact, be voting to help Richard Nixon.

Cris Carnes, president of the Machinists' lodge in St. Augustine, and Al Ference, a member of the Railway & Airline Clerks in Tampa, feel so strongly about opposing Wallace that they have organized a Florida rank-and-file workers' Committee for a Vote That Counts.

They cite evidence showing that Wallace is pursuing the same tactics as "spoiler" in the 1972 elections that he did four years ago. Wallace now boasts his 1968 campaign was "effective enough to defeat Hubert Humphrey for the presidency of the United States," the co-chairmen said.

"We voted for Wallace in 1968," Carnes and Ference said, "and we know what a mistake it was. Wallace couldn't win. What we did was to help elect Nixon because Wallace took away enough votes to make the difference. We don't want it to happen again in this year's Florida presidential primary."

Sharing a common interest with other former Wallace voters, the co-chairmen explained they formed the committee as the best way to spread the word about voting for Wallace.

"We do not know if it is true, as has been charged, that there is a deal between Wallace and Nixon," Carnes and Ference said, "but it doesn't really make any difference. The effect of Wallace's candidacy is the same as if there was."

The committee intends to be active throughout the state. Worker meetings are planned, along with the distribution of leaflets displaying the Wallace-Nixon record and how it came about.

One feature of the campaign will be the distribution of aluminum half dollar-sized coins showing Nixon on one side and Wallace on the other. The slogan on both sides of the coin tells the Wallace-Nixon message: "Heads they win, tails we lose."

Veteran Organizer Charles Elder Dies

Covington, Ky.—Charles M. Elder, a veteran organizer for the AFL-CIO, died Feb. 10 in Covington of a blood clot after he had been hospitalized for a broken hip. He was 71.

Elder was a field representative in the federation's Ohio-West Virginia-Kentucky region when he retired in 1965 after 22 years as an organizer for the labor movement. He held several official positions with Boilermakers Local 120 in Louisville before joining the AFL organizing staff in 1943.

Juvenile Justice Studies Conducted by Unions

Organized labor is becoming actively involved in national efforts to curb crime and to guide juvenile offenders from repeating their run-ins with the law.

Pilot projects to aid union members in their understanding of the juvenile justice system are being conducted in a number of cities across the country by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services in cooperation with the National Council on Crime & Delinquency.

Programs have been launched in several communities in Ohio, Indiana and the Kansas City area.

Community Services Director Leo Perlis said that labor is encouraging unions and their members to promote a more effective system of "law and order and justice for all."

Initially, union members and citizens must get acquainted with the functions, responsibilities and problems of the criminal justice system "as it affects not only youthful offenders, but the entire community," Perlis stressed.

Volunteers from labor's ranks are also needed in the correction process, he said, not only to help obtain jobs for ex-offenders, but also to assist in probation and parole programs.

Labor's first project was conducted in Terre Haute, Ind., under the direction of CSA Rep. B. G. Culver. Other programs followed in Akron, O., and in the Kansas City area.

The programs include a series of training institutes that run for several weeks to acquaint union members and AFL-CIO leaders in the problems of crime and delinquency and what steps can be taken to overcome the shortcomings of the justice system.

In Akron, the Central Labor Council has formed a committee that is doing a 16-week research study of the strengths and weaknesses of juvenile justice process in Summit County.

Projects in Kansas City included a one-day seminar and a six-week training course that was attended by juvenile court officials, PTA members, educators, citizens groups, as well as union members.

And from the Terre Haute efforts, spin-off programs resulted in South Bend, Kokomo and Indianapolis. A short course on juvenile delinquency problems is planned for Columbus, O., early this year under CSA sponsorship.

Backs Employer Arguments:

Hodgson Rejects Pay Floor As Alternative to Welfare

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson told Congress that the federal minimum wage cannot and should not provide an "adequate family income."

Welfare payments from the government, not more money from employers, should make up the difference, Hodgson insisted.

As required by law, Hodgson submitted to Congress his annual report on the impact of the Fair Labor Standards Act and his policy recommendations to achieve the law's social goals.

Hodgson conceded there were "no obvious adverse effects" of the last step-up in the wage floor and the expanded coverage.

But he dusted off all of the arguments that have been used by employers since the enactment of the first wage-hour law in 1938 to warn that raising the wage floor too high or too fast and expanding coverage to millions not now protected would curtail employment and harm the economy.

"Too much has been asked of the minimum wage in the past," the Secretary of Labor insisted.

It is an "illusion that minimum wages can be set at a level equivalent to an adequate standard of living without regard for productivity, individual capacity or family size."

Hodgson also dragged in the Administration's wage-price control program, contending that an immediate jump to $2 an hour and expanded coverage as provided in bills pending in the House and Senate "would make the task of the Pay Board difficult if not impossible."

The pressure to maintain differentials for higher-paid workers, he contended, would make it difficult to hold increases to a 5.5 percent guideline for workers earning just above the minimum wage level.

As for expanded coverage, Hodgson claimed it is "unnecessary" to extend coverage to state and local government workers, it would be difficult to enforce a wage floor for household workers, and it would be "inconsistent with other public policy objectives" to cover employes of small businesses or farms.

Hodgson reiterated the Administration's contention that the minimum wage should only be permitted to rise to $1.80 this year and from the present $1.30 level to $1.45 for workers on large farms—and that the rate for teenagers should be frozen at the present level.

He conceded that "it is probably not possible to demonstrate what contribution the pay increases under the increased minimum rates had in the price inflation in the late 1960s," but he speculated that "they were not quantitatively unimportant."

The presidents who looked on the wage-hour law as a means of providing "enough for those who have too little"—as Franklin D. Roosevelt expressed it when he signed the original law—were starry-eyed idealists, Hodgson implied.

"From the beginning," Hodgson claimed, "it was unrealistic to expect that the minimum wage could assure a minimum but adequate level of living for wage earners regardless of family size."

Keeping the wage floor low, while supplementing income through welfare program grants, he said, will keep open job opportunities "for the less skilled and inexperienced and disadvantaged" and keep wage rates in line with "productivity and individual capacity."

PICKETING FOR THEIR EMPLOYER, not against him, members of Ladies' Garment Workers Local 130 in Lakewood, N.J., march in a demonstration with their children to have the landlord renew the lease of Loyal Cloak Co. They were successful and the shop remains open for business.

Labor Dept. Director Tilts to Management

Dallas, Tex.—The Labor Dept.'s new regional director here told a news conference that his goal is to "look after the interests of management a little better."

Truman Branscum, long active in the right-wing of Oklahoma Republican politics, managed to make headlines in the Dallas News with his "man bites dog" view of the Labor Dept.'s mission.

The department, he thinks, has for too long concentrated its efforts on organized labor while treating management indifferently.

"It's time in this department that we represent management more," the newspaper quoted Branscum.

Branscum was an unsuccessful GOP candidate for Congress in 1966 and served as state highway director under former Republican Gov. Dewey Bartlett. The Dallas News story said that for the past year Branscum has served "as chairman of a volunteer committee of 17,000 Oklahomans" who are pushing for the election of Bartlett to the Senate.

If Branscum seems to have the Labor Dept.'s mission mixed up with that of the Commerce Dept., his confusion may be understandable.

A recent article distributed by Press Associates Inc., a union-oriented news service, suggests that a rundown of key policymakers in the Labor Dept. "reads like a Who's Who in Business."

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson was a corporation vice president and industrial relations director, and Under Sec. of Labor Laurence H. Silberman specialized in labor relations law—for management. Silberman's executive assistant was an insurance company industrial relations official.

At the assistant secretary level, only W. J. Usery, Jr., who came out of the Machinists, has a union background.

The other assistant secretaries include an investment banker who formerly was a management industrial relations official, the president of a non-union hosiery company, a former management official in the auto industry, and the vice president of a big corporation.

The PAI article, by Harry Conn, notes that when the Dept. of Labor was established in 1913, Congress directed it "to advance the public interest by promoting the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, improving their working conditions, and advancing their opportunities for profitable employment."

Norman Smith Dies, Led Farm Union Group

San Bernardino, Calif.—Norman Smith, formerly director of the AFL-CIO's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AWOC), died in a hospital here after surgery. Burial was in Steelville, Mo.

A one-time representative of the Auto Workers, in 1959 Smith became director of AWOC one of the predecessor organizations that formed the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee in 1966. During his directorship, AWOC conducted many strikes in California's Central Valley, helped raise California farm workers' wages substantially and focused national attention on the plight of agricultural employes. Smith retired in 1964.

George P. Delaney Dies, Envoy for U.S. Labor

George P. Delaney, former international affairs representative for the AFL-CIO and retired State Dept. official, died Feb. 9 of a cardiac arrest shortly before his 63rd birthday.

Delaney, known to his friends as "Phil," had been with the State Dept. from 1963 until he retired last March as special assistant to the Secretary of State and Coordinator of International Labor Affairs. He served in the Labor Dept. 1959-63 in a similar capacity.

Born in Washington, D.C., Delaney became an apprentice molder at the U.S. Navy Yard in Washington in 1928. From 1938 to 1942 he was an international representative with the Molders.

After three years in the U.S. Navy during World War II, he joined the AFL as an international affairs representative and continued to serve in that post with the AFL-CIO following merger.

In a message of condolence to Delaney's widow and family, Federation Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland called him "a devoted trade unionist who served his fellow workers with diligence in many crucial assignments . . . a warm friend, a true gentleman."

Delaney began a long association with the International Labor Organization in 1948 as a worker delegate and a member of the ILO Governing Body. He was influential in the adoption of ILO conventions on reduction of working hours and on the abolition of forced labor. He also was active in the formation of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Delaney left the AFL-CIO in 1958 to become the director of organization for the Operating Engineers. In 1959, he was named the special assistant for international labor affairs in the Labor Dept. and served on the U.S. government delegation to the ILO 1963-70.

Also, starting in 1964, he served as the first director of the Office of Labor Affairs in the Agency for International Development.

On his retirement from the State Dept. last year, Delaney was presented the department's Superior Honor Award and AID's Distinguished Honor Award.

Following retirement from the government, Delaney served as the Washington representative for the Longshoremen.

He is survived by his wife Margaret, four children and one grandchild.

Responses to IBEW Survey Reveal Retired Workers' Economic Plight

The economic plight of retired workers trying to make ends meet with inadequate social security checks and pensions is poignantly documented in responses to a survey by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Data from the survey, conducted by the IBEW's new Special Services Dept. will be used to develop programs for retired members or those about to retire.

More than 21,000 retired IBEW members responded to the survey. Some described their problems in detail. Among samples of the replies:

"I did not have a vacation for 25 years before I retired and, now that I have the time and health for a vacation, there is no extra money for one."

"I have arthritis so bad I have to be on crutches. My social security check and my pension are just not enough to live on."

"I had to retire from the trade this year at the age of 58 on account of medical disability. I thank the IBEW every day for my pension, which is a major factor in helping me get by. However, I worry how I'm going to make it in the period ahead."

The IBEW was gratified by the overwhelming response to the survey, noting that 55 percent of 42,000 retired members replied to the questionnaires. Many communications experts consider a 2 percent response good, the union noted.

IBEW Pres. Charles H. Pillard said in releasing the comments of the retirees that the union's Special Services Dept. was established to better serve its retired members.

The department is headed by Harold G. Tate, a former executive board member and assistant business manager of an IBEW local in Corpus Christi, Tex.

Referring to the problems of the retirees, Pillard said that "retirement should be the beginning, not the end."

"We of the IBEW have a sincere desire to provide information and assistance to improve the economic, social and community life of our retired members," he stressed.

Among comments received from retired members' wives were:

"We own our home but, after 28 years, you need a new roof, a new furnace and house repairs you cannot handle yourself. So you take out a sizable loan.

"What all of us need is a higher pension—more income. We all pay the higher prices everyone else pays, and we have a tough time making a go of it."

Another wife wrote: "My husband has had four heart attacks and the last left him with brain damage. He was president of his local union four years and gave his all for the union. I am proud of him for it.

"Now, poor man, he is in the Veterans Administration hospital. I manage to get by on his social security and union pension and have about $20 left to carry me over from one month to the next. It is very hard to get along."

Labor Aides Added To Red Cross Units

Five AFL-CIO community services representatives have been named to the staffs of newly established Red Cross divisions, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis announced.

The new representatives are: Thomas J. Kiousis, Jr., Northeast Ohio Division, Cleveland; Mrs. Evelyn Thomas, Wolverine Division, Detroit; David Oliver, Alabama Division, Birmingham; Wallace O. Nelson, Heartland Division, Omaha, Neb., and William Wheatley, Los Angeles Chapter, Los Angeles.

Court Amendment Adopted:

Civil Rights Job Bill Weakened in Senate

The Senate reversed itself and dropped a key section of a bill giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to halt illegal job discrimination.

The 45-39 vote for a weakening amendment that the Senate twice previously rejected was a victory for the Nixon Administration and its Chamber of Commerce allies.

It also was a victory for the filibuster tactics of a conservative coalition that was willing to let the Senate vote on amendments—but not on final passage of the legislation.

And it was a setback for labor and civil rights groups that have fought for years to give the EEOC the right to issue "cease and desist" orders against job discrimination based on race, religion, sex or national origin.

The amended Senate bill is similar to the House-passed version. It would compel the EEOC to file a court suit if an employer, employment agency or union refused to abandon a discriminatory policy. The crowded dockets of federal courts virtually assure that an employer seeking to avoid compliance with the law could count on months, perhaps years, of delay.

Twice before, the Senate had rejected a similar court enforcement amendment by the same sponsor, Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.). And twice, after defeat of the Dominick amendment, a majority but not the required two-thirds had voted to limit debate.

Heavy absenteeism that has plagued the Senate this year was a factor in the eventual passage of the Dominick amendment. Most of the absentees had voted or had been announced against the earlier version of the amendment.

Also a factor was the apparent inability to get the legislation to a final vote.

In an effort to break the deadlock, the two chief sponsors of a strong EEOC bill—Senators Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.)—proposed a compromise that would have provided a court role in overseeing the enforcement activities of the fair employment agency.

But Dominick and the southerners rejected the compromise as inadequate.

In effect, Dominick told the Senate, it was his amendment or no bill.

The southern leaders of the filibuster expressed elation at the passage of the Dominick amendment. But they still refused to agree to let the bill come to a final vote. Despite the weakening of enforcement powers, the legislation still expands the ban on job discrimination to cover public employes and small establishments.

A third—and final—effort to secure a two-thirds vote for cloture is scheduled for Feb. 22.

If a substantial number of northern conservatives switch and vote to limit debate, the bill will pass and a House-Senate conference committee will seek to reconcile the two versions.

But if the cloture vote remains below two-thirds, Senate leaders have served notice that the legislation will be dropped from the agenda.

Don Ellinger Of Machinists League Dies

W. Don Ellinger, director of the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League, died Feb. 12 of a sudden heart attack at the age of 56.

Ellinger, who is survived by his wife and nine children, joined the staff of the Ladies' Garment Workers as an organizer in 1937 and during World War II served as field representative for the federal Fair Employment Practices Commission.

Later, he was a CIO organizer, served two terms as president of the Texas State CIO council, and was named area director of the CIO Political Action Committee. After the AFL-CIO merger, Ellinger was named COPE director for the five-state southwest region.

After service in the Justice Dept. during the Kennedy Administration, Ellinger served throughout the 1964 campaign as coordinator with the trade union movement for the Democratic National Committee.

He became director of the Machinists' political program in 1966.

Phone Strikers Ratify N.Y. Pact

New York—Members of 23 locals of the Communications Workers voted to ratify a three-year contract that will end a statewide strike of plant craftsmen, including installers and repairmen.

The vote, tallied by the Honest Ballot Association, was 13,769 to 9,193 in favor of ratification.

The New York locals had rejected a national agreement negotiated last July. The settlement they approved provided an additional $1 to $1.50 a week and improvement in various benefits.

NEARLY 11 MONTHS on the picket line hasn't shaken the union spirit of these members of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers who are striking the Derst Baking Co. at Savannah, Ga. Despite the hardships of the long strike, they raised $80 for COPE—nearly 50 cents per striker.

Survey Finds Women's Pay Further Behind

The gap between the average wages of women and men was greater in 1970 than it was 15 years earlier with women earning only $3 for every $5 paid men, according to a fact sheet released by the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept.

The Women's Bureau said the study shows that in 1970 women's median wages amounted to only 59.4 percent of men's wages as opposed to 60.5 percent the previous year.

But in 1955, the median wage of women workers equaled 64 percent of that for male workers.

"Although the figures in the fact sheet do not necessarily indicate that women receive unequal pay for equal work, they do show that women are employed in the lower skilled and lower paying jobs," a news release from the Women's Bureau said.

"Nevertheless, examples of inequality of pay are found when the earnings of women and men in specific occupations and in the same fields are compared."

The fact sheet cites 1970 Census Bureau figures as indicating, for example, that among men and women working as accounting and payroll clerks in the same class, the men were better paid.

"The greatest gap was between women and men chemists—$10,500 for women as compared with $15,600 for men."

A look at the earnings of full-time, year-round workers in 1970 showed that 12 percent of the women, but only 5 percent of the men earned less than $3,000.

Sugar Cane Workers 'Robbed' of Pay Raise

Thousands of suger cane workers have been cheated out of a pay raise, the Meat Cutters charged in a blistering letter of protest to Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz.

The Agriculture Dept., after hearings held last July, ordered a 10-cent hourly raise in the minimum pay for sugar plantation workers—raising the wage floor to $1.60 in Louisiana and $1.85 in Florida.

There was only one hitch. The increase wasn't made effective until Jan. 10, 1972. By then, the harvest had been completed in Louisiana and was past its peak in Florida.

Normally, it would have been put into effect in October at the start of the harvest season. The wage floor is set by the Secretary of Agriculture under a provision of the Sugar Act, which provides big subsidies for growers and requires in return that they pay their workers not less than the amount the Agriculture Dept. determines is "fair and reasonable."

But the department held back out of fear of upsetting the Nixon Administration's wage stabilization policy.

First it said the raise couldn't be put into effect because of the Phase I wage freeze. Then it spent several months pondering the relationship of the higher minimum to the 5.5 percent guideline.

And then it was too late to make any significant difference.

Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman called on Butz to rectify the "amazingly unjust action" of his department by making the increase retroactive to the start of the harvest season.

Otherwise, he said, it is simply a "fake" increase intended to leave the impression that the department had complied with its legal obligations "when it had actually robbed the workers of badly-needed earnings for the entire season."

As for the wage stabilization excuse, the union's letter noted that:

- Raw agricultural products were exempt from the freeze and, in fact, "the very large federal subsidy and aid to growers increased during the period."
- The wage freeze in any event ended on Nov. 14, 1971—not Jan. 10, 1972.
- Congress has specifically authorized retroactive payment of increases that came due during the Phase 1 freeze.
- Congress specifically exempted low-wage workers from wage stabilization controls. And even the most stringent definition of low wages would have to include the sugar plantation workers.

Labor Dept. data for the previous year show about 11,000 workers employed in Florida sugar cane fields during December—the peak month of the harvest—and 2,250 in Louisiana in November, the high month there.

Supervisors Ruled Subject To Safety Law

Coverage of the occupational safety act extends beyond other federal labor laws, it was determined by a hearing examiner for the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission.

Examiner Joseph L. Chalk ruled that even employes exercising supervisory functions are covered by the act. The case involved a suit brought against the American Bridge Division of U.S. Steel Corp.

The company attempted to vacate a safety citation following the death of a foreman, claiming that he was not an employe within the meaning to the act.

Chalk held that no such exemptions were made by Congress as was the case in the National Labor Relations Act or the federal Wage-Hour law. He said the occupational safety law applies to "every working man and woman without exception."

Council Asks Shift To New Programs

By Saul Miller

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Nixon Administration's "dismal record" of managing the economy will pretty much continue in 1972 for most Americans, the AFL-CIO Executive Council predicted. Only business and wealthy groups will find it "a good year."

The Administration's promise of a "sharp 1971 upturn from the engineered recession of 1969-1970 collapsed," the council declared, and under present Administration policies the outlook has not improved.

The federation's analysis points out that unemployment "will not go down appreciably," consumer purchasing power "will not increase enough" to take up the slack and neither will business investment in plants and equipment.

Industrial output "limps along at 75 percent of capacity with no evidence of early improvement" and the sharp expansion of the economy that is necessary to make 1972 "a good year" cannot be achieved "by the Administration's present fiscal policies," the council emphasized.

The council's statement on the economy highlighted the windup of the mid-winter sessions dominated by a call for "total mobilization" of the trade union movement for the 1972 elections.

More than a score of statements dealing with various aspects of national and international affairs were sharply critical of the Nixon Administration programs and policies, pointing out numerous failures as well as moves contrary to the best interests of the nation and the trade union movement.

At a final press conference ending the six-day meeting, Federation Pres. George Meany told reporters that the state of the national economy would be the major issue in the November elections and that it was fairly obvious that neither the unemployment rate nor the cost of living were going to come down very much, if at all.

The peace issue posed by the President's visit to China as well as the use of school busing will also play a role in the election, Meany said, but will not have the impact of the economic issues affecting the well-being of all Americans.

On internal AFL-CIO matters, Meany noted the importance of the federation's maritime unions getting together on critical questions of relationships with employers. He noted that they were not always together in the past and that the new approach is a "good program."

He announced also that a national union charter would be issued to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, which was created by the AFL-CIO in 1966 and now has a membership of about 30,000.

The council sessions also issued a new guideline on cases involving independent unions under Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution, the internal disputes plan, and acted on a number of resolutions referred to it by the recent ninth convention.

In its statement on the economy, the council said there is no reason to believe that the Administration's forecast for 1972 "will be much more accurate than last year's prediction," in view of its failure "to present positive measures to achieve its promises."

The council spelled out a seven-point program of "immediate, selective government measures" to create jobs, boost industry's operating rate and productivity to reduce pressures on costs and prices, and meet the nation's need for expanded public facilities and services.

'Price Bulge' Shows Up In January Tally

The "price bulge" that Nixon Administration economists had predicted continued during January with the Consumer Price Index jumping three-tenths of one percent, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The increase came on the heels of a December increase of four-tenths of 1 percent—the largest hike in consumer prices in six months.

The January rise brought the index to 123.2, meaning that the same goods and services that cost the consumer $10 in 1967—the base period for the CPI—now cost $12.32.

In terms of 1957-59 dollars,

Job Loss 'Disastrous':

Trade Crisis Spurs Demand for Action

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The year 1971 was the nation's "most disastrous year in world trade," and the erosion of America's well-being by the export of jobs, technology and capital "is not abating," the AFL-CIO declared.

The Executive Council charged that the Nixon Administration has refused to offer "realistic remedies" for dealing with trade problems of the Seventies and is using "gimmickry and patchwork methods" having a limited short-range effect.

The Administration's range of proposals, the council added, will have a minimum impact on imports and on the outflow of jobs, capital and technology. "In today's world of multinational corporations, managed foreign economies, nontariff barriers and high speed communications and transportation" Administration proposals are "hopelessly unworkable."

A realistic and workable approach is contained in the Burke-Hartke Foreign Trade & Investment Act, the council said, calling for early hearings and congressional attention.

The legislation contains remedies that include:

- Taxation of U.S. corporations' overseas operations so that they more closely relate to the tax rules domestically.
- Regulation of the torrent of imports that have smothered U.S. production and cost hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs.
- Regulation of the outflow of capital from the U.S.
- Procedures for the collection of more pertinent data on foreign trade and labeling procedures.
- Repeal of sections of the tariff Code ending an abuse whereby U.S. companies assemble products in foreign countries and ship them into the United States as "made in U.S.," paying only a minimum duty on so-called "value added."
- A new foreign trade and investment commission to administer the new legislation and bring modern concepts and methods to its operations.

The council statement said that the "warmness" with which the Administration embraces the multinational corporations as being good for America is "ominous" for the

Meany Assails Signing Of Dock Arbitration Bill

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany denounced as a "gratuitous insult to all American workers" Pres. Nixon's signing of a compulsory arbitration bill aimed at West Coast dock workers—after the dockers had ratified a new contract and returned to work.

"The President, through his House leader, had promised not to sign the measure if the strikers returned to work," Meany said, but "like so many of his other promises, this pledge was broken without apology or explanation."

The 15,000 dock workers, members of the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen, ratified an 18-month contract with the Pacific Maritime Association Feb. 18 and began returning to their jobs at West Coast ports from San Diego to Seattle.

A few days later, Nixon signed the controversial legislation that would have forced the dockers back to work had they not ratified.

He signed it while in Peking as a "symbolic gesture," according to Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson.

Noting that "the Secretary of Labor called the signing 'symbolic,'" Meany described the

Stronger Ties Urged To Asia's Democracies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The realities of world peace and freedom demand that the United States cement and improve its relations with Japan and India, the major democratic nations of Asia, rather than rely on an accommodation with Communist China, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

"Spectacular deals with persistently hostile dictatorships" are not in the country's best interests, the council said in a statement, and will not advance the cause of peace and freedom in Asia.

The federation specifically called on the Nixon Administration to seek Japan's permanent membership on the United Nations Security Council and urged Pres. Nixon on his scheduled visit to Moscow to seek the earliest return of the Kurilles to Japan by the Soviet Union.

The statement urged that every effort be made "to have Japan ex-

New Formulas Urged to Widen Aid for Jobless

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to revise the "trigger formulas" on various unemployment compensation programs "so that payments will be available as long as there is widespread unemployment."

The federation's Executive Council warned that extended benefits under national, state or so-called "emergency" programs may be wiped out for most of the nation's long-term jobless workers while unemployment continues unabated at about 6 percent.

According to government figures, 1.2 million workers have been unemployed for 15 weeks or more, yet less than 400,000 workers were getting extended unemployment insurance benefits. Regular benefits have long since run out for many.

The failure of the Nixon Administration to require the states to inform workers of their benefit rights plus inadequate trigger formulas, the council said, "could result in hundreds of thousands of long-run jobless workers being denied extended benefits."

It is likely, the council statement emphasized, that by Apr. 1, 1972 extended benefits will be wiped out in all but 13 states and additional workers will have their benefits cancelled when emergency aid expires later in the year.

The council called on the Dept. of Labor to require all states to notify every jobless worker who has exhausted his regular benefits "of any potential entitlement to extended benefits," and on Congress to revise the trigger formulas and continue the emergency programs as long as joblessness persists.

'One More for the Road!'

Space Shuttle Funds Endorsed by Labor

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Terming the development of a space shuttle "the next logical step for the United States space program," the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged Congress to vote funds for the Skylab project.

"It will make space as accessible as the airplane has made the other continents," the council said of the space shuttle. "It will assist us in exploration, in science and technology and, if necessary, in defense and provide 50,000 jobs in the United States.

"Without the shuttle we cannot develop our scientific and technological investments that already have given us space communications, weather satellites and geodetic programs," the statement said.

The council described the Skylab project, which would put nine astronauts into orbit for periods of four to eight weeks, as essential for future generations.

"Space applications in such fields as the management of our natural resources, monitoring of pollution, weather modification and climate control, television distribution, earthquake prediction and public health and safety will not be fully realized if we cannot reduce costs, raise efficiency and acquire a flexibility of action not yet possible," the council declared.

"That is what the space shuttle is for," the statement said. "Without it, we lose many valuable programs."

It was also noted that the proposed space shuttle comes as the U.S. space program is reaching another milestone.

"At the peak of the Apollo project, the space program employed 400,000 Americans—about half of whom have since been laid off," the council said, adding that this year will see the end of Apollo.

Citing the importance of space exploration to international relations, the council declared: "We cannot envision a secure, advanced western world without technologies that allow us the freedom of space as well."

Spurred by Deficits, Unemployment:

Call for Tax Justice Given High Priority

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor's call for tax justice takes on new urgency amid huge federal deficits and continued high unemployment, the AFL-CIO Executive Council stressed.

Tax loopholes were widened by Congress last year at the urging of the Nixon Administration, enabling additional billions of dollars of corporation and investment profit to escape the tax collector.

Even more will be lost in the future if the Administration has its way, the council warned.

"Unfortunately," it said, "this Administration continues in its relentless pursuit of policies geared to rewarding those who need it least at the expense of those who need it most."

It cited the Administration's obvious buildup for a "value-added" national sales tax and the President's proposals to allow high-income professionals to make tax-exempt pension investments up to $7,500 a year.

Strongly endorsing congressional demands that the Administration propose tax reform legislation before the national debt ceiling is again raised, the Executive Council declared:

"The federal tax structure is full of loopholes of special privilege for wealthy people and corporations. In 1970, the most recent date for available information, there were still 112 individuals with incomes of $200,000 and more—including three with annual incomes of more than a million dollars—who paid no federal income taxes whatsoever.

"The tax structure is rigged against wages and salaries, which are taxed in full, while only half of capital gains are subject to taxation and some other forms of income are not taxed at all."

The council statement noted that the Administration is using dissatisfaction with the state and local property tax to promote its national sales tax concept.

Much of the dissatisfaction with the property tax is valid, the council said. Reforms are needed to alleviate hardships to people with modest incomes, the retired and disabled. And too often industrial and commercial establishments are underassessed and pay too small a share of the tax burden.

"The states should be encouraged to rely more heavily on equitable taxes based on income and ability to pay and there should be a sharp increase in federal grants-in-aid to state and local governments," the AFL-CIO said.

The council statement termed the revenue-sharing approach of the bill introduced by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) "a sound step in this direction." The statement referred to the original version of the bill, which is currently being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee.

The 1969 Tax Reform Act moved the nation in the direction of tax justice, the council said. But the 1971 law had the opposite effect.

It is time to remedy the damage, the statement concluded. "The unfinished business of tax reform must be completed."

Convention Resolutions Considered by Council

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council approved eight resolutions referred to it by the Ninth Constitutional Convention covering maritime problems, the metric system and rehabilitation programs.

It voted to non-concur in six other referred resolutions and deferred action until a later meeting on a number of others.

Although non-concurring on a resolution calling on federation affiliates to insert in their constitutions policy statements on affiliation with state and central local bodies, the council recommended that a letter be sent all national and international unions calling their attention to the section of the AFL-CIO Constitution which states:

"It shall be the duty of all national and international unions and organizing committees affiliated with the federation to instruct their local unions to join affiliated central labor bodies in their vicinity where such exist. Similar instructions shall be given by the federation to all local unions affiliated directly to it."

The resolutions approved by the council covered the following areas:

- A call to Congress for creation of a new study committee to conduct an inquiry into all phases of the conversion of weights and measures to the metric system, with labor fully represented and with the committee to conduct its study and make its report before action is taken on a pending conversion bill.
- An appeal to affiliates to support and work with legitimate organizations involved in rehabilitation and employment of the handicapped.
- Achievement and maintenance of an adequate U.S.-flag merchant marine through a 22-point program covering a wide range of problems affecting the maritime industry. The program reaffirms previously adopted federation positions and current policy approaches.
- Support for a strike by the Meat Cutters against Holly Farms Poultry Industries Inc., with all federation affiliates urged to place the products of the company on the unfair list.
- Opposition to foreign shipbuilding and a call for the rebirth of an American-built merchant marine and prohibitions of the use of defense funds by the Navy to subcontract in foreign shipyards.
- Aid for the Great Lakes fleet by providing adequate federal funds for construction, conversion, reconditioning and modernizing to stem the throttling of domestic trade.

Resolutions in which the council non-concurred included those dealing with labor policies at Coors Beer, farm worker jurisdiction, use of underground equipment, registry of foreign ships, and printing trades labels.

A resolution on a universal union label was referred to the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., to help develop a concerted approach to this problem, and a statement urging stronger enforcement of the McNamara-Ohio Service Contract Act was proposed in lieu of a resolution in this area.

AFL-CIO Set to Battle Compulsory Arbitration

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Organized labor will determinedly fight compulsory arbitration no matter what "novel new phrase" is contrived to disguise its meaning, the AFL-CIO declared.

There are solutions other than "government repression" for the temporary inconveniences sometimes caused by railroad or longshore strikes, the federation's Executive Council said in a statement.

Noting that free collective bargaining has long been a cornerstone of American democracy, the council hit out at the "short-sighted alarmists" in the Administration and Congress and their "radical new measures" that would "substantially undercut collective bargaining."

These proposals, the council said, "rely principally upon a new and untried form of compulsory arbitration designated as 'final offer solution.'" The net result would be to "put into operation by force of law" an offer selected by an arbitration board without the consent of the parties.

While the Administration plan and other similar proposals are currently limited to transportation, "we have little doubt that if these governmental restrictions and controls are enacted for these industries they will be extended to others as the opportunity affords," the council said.

The statement warned the employers who have embraced "repressive proposals" that fixing of the terms and conditions of employment will inevitably lead to "price fixing, profit fixing and complete government control. We do not want to see this nation set its foot on that road."

The AFL-CIO supports legislation that will provide effective incentives for bargaining in the railroad industry, the council said. As for the West Coast dock strike, it said "certainly that rather localized dispute should not be made the excuse for broad, repressive and permanent legislation which would gravely curtail the right to strike and to bargain collectively."

Value-Added Tax Called 'Fancy Name' for Trouble

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The "value-added tax" being touted by the Nixon Administration was described by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as merely a fancy name for a national sales tax.

"By any name," the council said, "it spells trouble for the average worker and consumer, who will be forced to shoulder even more of the tax burden, lightening the load for big business and the wealthy."

Under the value-added gimmick, taxes paid at each step of the manufacture and distribution of a product are passed on to the next buyer until the final amount is added to the price paid by the consumer.

The council statement reaffirmed labor's opposition to "regressive" taxes that depart from the principle of ability to pay.

"We are unalterably opposed to a national retail sales tax, no matter how fancy a name it is given," the statement concluded.

Council Blasts 'Dismal' Nixon Record

Demands Action on New Programs To Provide Jobs, Revive Economy

On national economic, consumer and labor matters, the council took the following positions:

- Rejected as inadequate the "patchwork" proposals of the Nixon Administration on foreign trade and reaffirmed labor's support for the Burke-Hartke bill to deal both with job-curtailing imports and "the outflow of jobs, capital and technology." (Story, Page 1.)
- Pressed for National Health Security legislation that would use the "tried, proven and accepted" system of social insurance to overcome the health care crisis. (Story, Page 7.)
- Urged the Senate to transform the House-passed social security and welfare reform bill into a major weapon against poverty in America. (Story this page.)
- Praised the efforts of Congress and the labor members of the Pay Board to bring more economic justice into the Administration's wage stabilization program, and protested the "inequities and continuing confusion" of the controls machinery. (Story this page.)
- Demanded a consumer-oriented price control program and described the existing structure as a facade to conceal the fact that there are virtually no enforceable curbs on retail prices. (Story, Page 6.)
- Warned that new tax loopholes are allowing billions of dollars of corporation and investment profits to escape taxation and stressed the urgent need for tax reform. (Story, Page 2.)
- Termed the "value-added" tax proposal a fancy name for a national sales tax that "spells trouble" for workers and consumers. (Story, Page 2.)
- Reaffirmed support for "no-fault" auto insurance despite the "selfish" opposition of special interest groups. (Story, Page 6.)
- Criticized the "foot-dragging, flabby enforcement" of the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the exclusion of unions from meaningful participation. (Story, Page 7.)
- Supported appropriation of funds for a space shuttle as "the next logical step" for the nation's space program. (Story, Page 2.)
- Called on Congress to revise the "trigger formulas" that permit states to pay extended unemployment benefits "so that payments will be available as long as there is widespread unemployment." (Story, Page 2.)
- Strongly rejected all forms of compulsory arbitration and "government repression" as a solution to the temporary inconvenience of strikes. (Story, Page 2.)
- Adopted the report of AFL-CIO maritime unions aimed at bringing stability to the industry and job security for its workers. (Story, Page 6.)

On international matters, the council took the following actions:

- Proposed that the United States work to improve its relations with Japan and India, the major democratic nations of Asia, rather than rely on the dubious cooperation of Communist China. (Story, Page 1.)
- Termed respect for the human rights of all a key prerequisite to solution of the crisis in Northern Ireland. (Story, Page 6.)
- Asked the Administration to resume financial aid to the Assembly of Captive European Nations which has helped keep alive hope for self-determination and freedom. (Story, Page 6.)
- Urged Congress to provide funds for Radio Free Europe broadcasts to Eastern Europe and Radio Liberty broadcasts to the Soviet Union. (Story, Page 6.)

Reviewing the develpments of 1971, the council statement on the economy pointed out that unemployment was the highest in 10 years, there was a 4.3 percent rise in living costs and "a widespread lack of confidence." The real volume of total national output rose only 2.7 percent, essentially in services and residential construction, and there was no increase in industrial production at all.

The tax bonanzas to business included in the 1971 tax law, the council stressed, "are adding to the government's financial troubles, created by the general economic mess." The statement pointed out that "the federal debt will rise nearly $92 billion in the four fiscal years from 1969 to 1973—more than twice the debt increase in all the previous 24 years after the end of World War II."

The council strongly urged the following action:

1. An expanded and strengthened public service employment program—federal grants to states, local governments and federal agencies for the creation of jobs to provide needed public services.

2. Elimination of major loopholes of special tax privileges for corporations and wealthy families to bring justice to the tax structure and provide additional revenues for the government.

3. Allocation of a significant portion of available bank credit at reasonable interest rates by the Federal Reserve System to effectuate construction of housing and community facilities.

4. An increase in the federal minimum wage and extension of coverage to millions of low-wage workers outside of the law's protection.

5. Increases in buying power of workers' wages as a basic prerequisite for economic growth.

6. Elimination of inequities that abound in the stabilization controls program which "are undermining public confidence in the government's ability to manage the national economy on a fair and equitable basis."

7. Enactment by Congress of the Burke-Hartke bill to stop the export of American jobs and to repatriate profits of U.S. subsidiaries abroad.

At his press conference, Meany reiterated his feeling that Nixon's primary purpose in visiting China and later in the year, the Soviet Union, was to solidify his position at home in terms of his re-election campaign. Meany stressed that he would have opposed a visit to Communist China "no matter who the President was" and that from his own point of view, the matter was much more important than the outcome of the 1972 elections.

In reply to a reporter's query, Meany assailed a White House charge that a memorandum demonstrating the Administration's intent to create an anti-AFL-CIO feeling at the November 1971 convention at which Pres. Nixon spoke was a hoax. Meany asserted that "the memo was authentic."

He aired the contents of the memorandum on the national CBS program "60 Minutes" in an interview with Mike Wallace. Two days later, Meany noted, the White House claimed the memo was a hoax although the text had been printed in the AFL-CIO News in its Jan. 8, 1972, edition. "They didn't deny it in January," Meany said, nor early in December when it appeared in a John Roche column or immediately after the Wallace broadcast.

The council approved contributions to a number of organizations including the National Council of Senior Citizens, Consumer Federation of America, CARE, National Housing Conference, Clergy Economic Foundation, New Leader, Conference for Economic Progress, Committee for National Health Insurance, Institute for Collective Bargaining, and the National Park Foundation.

The next meeting of the council was set for May 2-3 in Washington.

Mills Asks 20% Hike In Social Security

Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee, has introduced a bill to raise social security benefits 20 percent—four times the amount provided in a bill Mills steered through the House last year.

Mills urged the Senate to insert the higher amount in the House-passed bill, which is currently before the Senate Finance Committee.

A new study of the social security system shows the program is over-financed, Mills said, and can pay out substantially higher benefits. He proposed also to trim back part of the higher social security taxes called for in the House-passed bill.

Pay Board Setup Hit On 'Confusion, Chaos'

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The American worker has Congress and the labor members of the Pay Board to thank for whatever measure of economic justice he has been able to obtain under the Nixon Administration's wage control policies, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

"Whatever justice has been achieved for workers in the stabilization program—such as the granting of deferred increases that were due during the freeze period under previously negotiated agreements—has been largely the work of the Congress, backed by the Pay Board's labor members," the council said.

It reiterated the AFL-CIO's wholehearted support of the efforts of the labor members to achieve equity for workers.

"We will continue to support the use of every legal means at our disposal—collective bargaining, legislation, litigation and direct strike action—to obtain justice and an improved standard of life for all workers," the council pledged.

But as to the total wage-control setup, the Executive Council found that "the Administration and business-dominated Pay Board continues to extend a web of confusion and chaos in labor-management relations across the country."

"Instead of simple and clear policies and procedures, with a great degree of self-administration, the Pay Board has painfully developed complicated regulations and reporting requirements sometimes followed by official interpretations and re-interpretations that add to confusion.

"Such developments," the council said, "have frequently left unions and managements in the dark as to allowable increases in wages and fringe benefits and required procedures. As a result, smaller unions and newly organized groups of workers, in particular, have been vulnerable to the tactics of unscrupulous employers who attempt to stall and confuse negotiations."

While major elements in the cost of living are exempt from price and rent controls—and further exemptions are added almost weekly—"the Pay Board attempts to apply stringent controls on pay increases of the overwhelming majority of workers."

The Executive Council denounced the Pay Board's disapproval of aerospace contracts as "a flagrant rejection of responsible collective bargaining, with a loss of about $350 for each aerospace worker."

"In addition to hampering collective bargaining relationships," the council statement continued, "the inequities and continuing confusion in the control set up are contributing to the lack of confidence among consumers that pervades the national economy."

Senate Urged to Pass Old-Age, Welfare Bill

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A long-stalled social security and welfare reform bill can become the vehicle to "move the nation a long way down the road" to elimination of poverty, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

A council resolution urged the Senate to improve on the House-passed bill by:

- Providing social security benefit increases totaling 25 percent over a two-year period. The 5 percent increase in the House bill was described as "woefully inadequate."
- Enacting a gradually-increasing federal contribution to the Social Security Trust Funds until it amounts to one-third of the total cost of the program. At the same time, the wage base on which workers and employers paid social security taxes should be raised in steps to $15,000 "to provide additional revenue for improvements and to keep benefit levels more closely in line with rising earnings."
- Eliminating the monthly premium Medicare beneficiaries must now pay for the optional physician services insurance as provided in the House bill, but without adding the cost to the payroll tax.
- Including prescription drugs under Medicare and coverage of disabled persons under 65—but without the two-year waiting period in the House version.
- Maintaining the existing Medicaid program without the "regressive" curtailment of benefits in the House bill.
- Improving the welfare reform section of the House bill by adopting the omnibus amendment introduced by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) and 21 co-sponsors.

This would raise the guaranteed income level for a family of four with no wage earner from the $2,400 in the House-passed bill to $3,000 a year. It would provide income supplements for the working poor in gradually reduced amounts until total income reaches about $5,600 a year.

Noting that extensive hearings were held in both the 91st Congress and in the current Congress and that legislation was twice passed by the House and is still being considered by the Senate Finance Committee, the council concluded:

"We believe the time for debate is over. We believe the time for action has come."

To Turn the Economy

BY EARLY 1972, after three years of a growing economic mess, the size of the task of turning the economy around toward prosperity is great.

The required measures must be decisive and selective, to create jobs and provide the greatest impact for each dollar of government outlay:

1. We urge the Congress to adopt an expanded and strengthened public service employment program—federal grants to the states, local governments and federal agencies for the creation of jobs to provide needed public services.

A special program of federal financial aid is required to step-up job-creating, short-term public works construction and repairs in areas of high unemployment.

We urge the President to release immediately a major portion of the billions of dollars of congressionally appropriated funds, which he has frozen—to create jobs in a variety of federal programs, ranging from Appalachia to highway safety.

Such actions are essential to lift sales, production, employment and public confidence. They would also boost government revenues as employment and incomes rise—the soundest way to reduce federal deficits that have resulted from the Administration's engineered recession and continuing economic sluggishness.

2. Justice in the federal tax structure and additional tax revenues are required—by eliminating the major loopholes of special tax privilege for corporations and wealthy families.

3. Congress should direct the Federal Reserve system to allocate a significant portion of available bank credit, at reasonable interest rates, to effectuate the construction of housing and community facilities.

4. We call on the Congress to immediately increase the federal minimum wage and to extend the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to the millions of low-wage workers who are still outside of the law's protection. Early action along these lines would improve the living standards of the working poor and provide the economy with high-velocity buying power that will be quickly spent.

5. Increases in the buying power of workers' wages and salaries are a basic prerequisite for economic growth—to provide workers with a share in the benefits of economic progress and to establish the foundation for the needed expansion of consumer markets.

Rapid economic growth will not be possible without a substantial boost of consumer sales, which account for almost two-thirds of national output. The needed rise of consumer expenditures cannot possibly be achieved, unless increases in the real incomes of workers are attained.

6. We urge the Administration to quickly eliminate the inequities that abound in the stabilization controls program and are undermining public confidence in the government's ability to manage the national economy on a fair and equitable basis.

7. We urge the Congress to adopt the Burke-Hartke bill to stop the export of American jobs and to repatriate the profits of American subsidiaries abroad.

A Word Edgewise:

Year in China Should Satisfy America's Maoist Students

By John P. Roche

UNLESS AN OLD FRIEND who is accompanying Pres. Nixon to China lets me down, the Ministry of Education in Peking will shortly have in hand my proposal for massive educational interchange.

Every year—with, I hope, foundation support—I propose to recruit 50,000 American college students for a junior year in Sinkiang, modeled on the common junior-year-abroad programs. There is one major difference: these volunteers will be selected on the basis of their ideological commitment to Maoism.

My last effort in this direction aborted because, underneath all his rhetoric, Fidel Castro nurses petty bourgeois instincts. Thus when a group of young Americans went to Cuba to help cut sugar—and rapidly discovered that cutting cane was not their thing—instead of treating them like Cubans, Castro let them sit around campfires and play guitars.

However, I am assured that the Chinese Communists have long since purged themselves of such sentimentalism, that they will in fact treat Americans just like Chinese.

Indeed, a Chinese Communist diplomat with whom I discussed the project offered a guarantee of equal treatment: "We will put your first contingent to work (he said) getting anti-American slogans and posters off the walls."

In further conversation, he noted that although the Americans might have some initial difficulties adapting—"that long hair and whiskers effect will have to go; it's most unsanitary. And the narcotics regulations are quite severe"—they would come to love the discipline. He quoted some "Thoughts of Mao" which reminded me a bit of the infantry manual.

What these dedicated, virtuous young Americans will have to appreciate is that the discipline is not authoritarian. Everyone wants to be like everyone else; to differ from the revolutionary masses is to demonstrate decadent egotism.

To the outsider, unfamiliar with the reasoning, this may seem extremely rigid, even puritanical, but our young American Maoists will surely accept it without qualms.

The Junior Year in Sinkiang, out in Central Asia, will see the American visitors totally integrated into the life pattern of their Chinese peers. A variation of the work-study programs of many American universities, the Chinese version has the students out working in the fields and factories.

Again it should be emphasized this is not a bourgeois game. The students are not voyeurs out peeping at the life of the masses; they are put to work fulltime with total revolutionary discipline. In Sinkiang they live in communes (which resemble military camps) and every morning the gong rings at 5:30.

FIRST VIGOROUS CALISTHENICS, then a common reading of "Thoughts of Mao," then breakfast. A hard day perhaps out road-building; dinner, and then to wind up the day, a vigorous session of self-criticism.

Maybe it will be called to the attention of Comrade George that he seemed to be slacking off a bit in his ditch digging. Why? Can it be that down inside he has no respect for common labor, that secretly he nurses the parasitical dreams of the corrupt, bourgeois intelligentsia? How about the pass he made at a female comrade? Did he think he was still in a degenerate capitalist environment of sexual exploitation?

Comrade George could learn a lot about himself this way—and save his parents the cost of a psychiatrist.

Well, this is the outline of my Junior Year in Sinkiang proposal. If the Chinese are interested, we will set to work recruiting. There is one hooker that should perhaps be mentioned; anyone who signs up must stay the course—the Revolution will permit no dropouts.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Council Prods Congress:

'The Time for Debate Is Over' On Needed Social Legislation

Excerpted from a statement on social security and welfare adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at Bal Harbour, Fla., Feb. 17:

THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE now has under consideration a bill, H.R. 1, which could be the most momentous social security and welfare legislation since the New Deal social legislation in the 1930s. We urge the Congress to grasp this opportunity by promptly enacting H.R. 1 with the changes the AFL-CIO is recommending. This bill, if sufficiently improved, could move the nation a long way down the road toward resolution of the nation's most serious social problem, the persistence of poverty.

The social security system is a tremendously successful program which has been a major force in improving the quality of life in America. Social security has provided regular income and medical care as a matter of right to millions of the nation's most economically vulnerable. But it has yet to fulfill its potential for providing economic security with dignity for the victims of death, disability and old age.

Poverty is more prevalent among the old than in any other age group. And for the majority of the aged who barely manage to stay above the poverty line, destitution is an ever-present threat. The current average benefit for an individual is $128 a month—$1,536 a year and for a couple $221 a month—$2,652 a year.

The AFL-CIO urges the Senate Finance Committee and the Congress to strengthen H.R. 1 to insure adequate income and health care to millions of Americans who rely on social security. Among the improvements needed the most important are:

1. A 15 percent increase effective Jan. 1, 1972, followed by a minimum 10 percent increase next year instead of the woefully inadequate 5 percent in H.R. 1.

2. An occupational definition of disability for older workers so that disabled workers unable to work at their usual occupation would be entitled to disability benefits.

3. An increase in the number of drop-out years in the benefit formula over that provided in H.R. 1 as a first step toward a formula based on the high 5 or 10 years of earnings.

4. An increase in the minimum benefit to at least $100 a month.

5. To raise the wage base in steps to $15,000 to provide additional revenue for improvements and to keep benefit levels more closely in line with rising earnings.

6. To gradually increase general revenue contributions to the Social Security Trust Funds to an eventual one-third of the program cost.

7. To cover the disabled by Medicare but eliminate or drastically reduce the two-year waiting period for eligibility in H.R. 1.

8. To include prescription drugs under Medicare.

9. To eliminate the monthly premium beneficiaries must pay for Part B (physician services) of Medicare but without adding to payroll taxes.

The Administration has recently recommended combining Part A (hospital care) and Part B (physician services) of Medicare into a single program and elimination of the monthly premium the elderly must now pay, soon to be $5.80. This is what the AFL-CIO has advocated since 1965. But the Administration proposal would eliminate the general revenue contribution which pays for one-half the cost of the Part B program and would place the cost totally on the payroll tax.

The AFL-CIO rejects this proposal and urges that at least half of the cost of the combined program be paid for by general revenue. This would make unnecessary any increase in payroll taxes to cover this cost.

We also urge rejection of another Administration-inspired proposal, now in H.R. 1 in modified form, to increase the period when co-insurance must be paid for inpatient hospital care.

We condemn the regressive changes in the Medicaid program in H.R. 1 which would deprive millions of the poor and the medically indigent of needed medical care.

The ninth convention of the AFL-CIO unanimously reiterated support for enactment of genuine welfare reform with federal financing and administration and support of the thrust of Pres. Nixon's Family Assistance Payment Program.

The convention called for a federal minimum basic family assistance payment of $3,000 for a family of four with automatic increases to no less than the Social Security Administration's poverty level within a few years. The convention insisted that no payments should be reduced below current levels; no welfare recipient should be referred to a job paying less than the applicable minimum wage; no mother should be referred to work in the absence of adequate child care for the children; and the job rights and employment conditions of state and local employes who presently administer welfare must be protected when the federal government takes over the program.

Sen. Ribicoff and 21 co-sponsors have introduced . . . an omnibus amendment including the changes called for by the ninth convention of the AFL-CIO as a first step toward genuine reform of the welfare system.

We urge the Congress and the Administration to support the Ribicoff amendment.

Two and one-half years have passed since Pres. Nixon, in a nationwide telecast, called for welfare reform. The welfare mess has grown worse, not better. High, long-term unemployment has aggravated this situation.

We believe the time for debate is over. We believe the time for action has come.

Over Nixon's Piecemeal Approach:

Burke-Hartke Trade Measure Pressed for Ailing Economy

DESPITE EXCESSIVE unemployment and mounting deficits in U.S. trade and balance of payments, the Nixon Administration wants only "band-aid approaches" for the worsening job-export crisis, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison charged.

The Administration "has aligned itself with the very forces that we feel have created these problems . . . the multinational corporations," declared Denison. Instead of attacking all facets of the problem—taxes, outflow of U.S. capital and the "torrent of imports that is smothering U.S. domestic production"—the Administration seeks only "the authority to negotiate reductions of trade barriers," he stressed.

Denison called on Congress to pass the Burke-Hartke trade bill, which he said is "the first complete legislative program to bring together, in one bill, a reshaping of taxes, trade and other federal laws that affect international trade."

He made the statements on the Mutual radio network interview Labor News Conference.

Denison stressed the need for comprehensive legislation along the lines of the Burke-Hartke bill, rather than a "piecemeal approach," because the problems "do inter-relate, and all of these areas affect American workers' jobs and the economic future of the United States."

He said that present trade, investment and tax policies are creating problems that are "rippling throughout America" and causing deep concern not only among hard-hit industries, unemployed workers and their unions, but among "Main Street merchants who are concerned that the people who are now laid off are not coming into their stores."

DENISON WARNED, however, that stiff opposition to the Burke-Hartke approach can be expected from "the very organizations that benefit from the present laws and policies—the international banking organizations, the multinational corporations and, unfortunately, many parts of the U.S. economy that find it to their advantage to go abroad—to abandon American workers."

THE "ENCOURAGING" and "optimistic" reports emanating from the White House notwithstanding, Phase 2 of Pres. Nixon's New Economic Program is having its troubles.

If the number one target of the program is to counter the so-called "psychology of inflation" and instill confidence in the nation's economic future, then Phase 2 is falling embarrassingly short of the mark.

A headline in Business Week magazine says simply, "The Phase 2 Honeymoon is Over."

"A chasm of distrust," the article says, "is opening between Washington's economic policymakers and the nation's consumers over the fairness and effectiveness of Phase 2.

"It is partly the result of misunderstanding outside of Washington about how wage and price controls are supposed to work. But it also reflects what consumers see every time they go shopping. Many prices are still rising."

A recent Gallup Poll provides some supporting evidence of what the consumers are thinking.

The poll shows that nationally, 55 percent of persons interviewed expressed dissatisfaction with the way wage-price controls are currently working while only 33 percent indicated they were satisfied.

Four prime reasons were given for the dissatisfaction:

- Controls are not fairly applied—not all groups are treated the same; they hurt the workingman—21 percent.
- Prices are going up—15 percent.
- Wages are not keeping up with prices—12 percent.
- Price-wage controls should be more stringent—11 percent.

It is generally agreed that it is not only the increases in prices at the marketplace on many items which create this mistrust of price controls but reports of increases permitted by the Price Commission.

Daily releases from the commission list industry after industry receiving the price increase requested. Refusals are rare.

The council said it was exempting utilities because state public utility commissions would be able to control utility and transportation rates. It didn't happen. In fact, they increased to such a point that the council had to backtrack and declare a 30-day moratorium on utility rate increases while deciding what to do.

PROBABLY THE HEAVIEST BLOW against the campaign to counter the "psychology of inflation" took place when the Dept. of Agriculture predicted that retail prices of food would rise "close to 4 percent" this year. Retail food prices rose 2.4 percent in 1971.

In this instance, the consumer is being used to help dig the Administration out of a deep abyss of discontent in the farm belt.

Sec. of Agriculture Earl L. Butz has welcomed this increase in food prices. His department has been piling subsidies into the farm belt in the hopes of swinging the disgruntled farmers over to the Republican column by the November election.

Add to this picture the fact that unemployment continues in the 6 percent bracket and you have a further discouraging picture.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that unemployment had increased by 752,000 in January but that on a seasonally adjusted basis had declined from 6 percent in December to 5.9 percent. BLS said this was no significant change.

The Administration refused to accept the fact that this decline of one-tenth of 1 percent was insignificant. It was called hopeful and indicative of further improvement to come.

At the same time, Herbert Stein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said a 5 percent jobless rate should now be considered full employment, due to changes in the labor force.

What he did not answer was how the composition of the labor force had changed so dramatically in the three years Nixon has been in office. When Nixon moved into the White House unemployment was about 3.5 percent.

"BAND-AID" REMEDIES are all the Nixon Administration offers to meet the worsening job-export crisis, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, charged on Labor News Conference, broadcast by Mutual radio. Questioning him on the AFL-CIO public affairs production were Charles Culhane, left, of the National Journal and Lee Cohn of the Washington Evening Star.

Drive Pressed For 'No-Fault' Car Insurance

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Labor reaffirmed its support of "no-fault" auto insurance and called on Congress to reject the "selfish cries" of special interest groups and pass needed legislation.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution charged that the nation's 108 million motorists have been victimized by soaring insurance premiums, arbitrary cancellation of policies, inadequate compensation and delays averaging 16 months in an overburdened court system.

Under the present requirements for determining the party at fault, the statement noted, "more of the premium dollar was used to pay attorney fees, court costs and insurance company overhead than for the compensation of accident victims."

Labor-supported bills in Congress would establish a nationwide system of no-fault automobile insurance.

It would mean, the council said, that "a policyholder would be compensated—immediately and fairly—by his insurance company without lengthy and expensive court proceedings to determine who was at fault. Reduced legal fees mean reduced insurance costs."

The legislation would also bar cancellation of a policy unless the policyholder lost his license or failed to pay his premium.

"No-fault insurance is the consumer's best buy," the statement concluded.

Captive Nation Aid Cut Called Self-Defeating

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Nixon Administration was urged to "resume immediately" material assistance to the Assembly of Captive European Nations in line with longstanding American traditions of supporting fighters against totalitarianism.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council termed the Administration's action in ending $250,000 a year to aid ACEN activities "false economy and self-defeating policy," and strongly urged that the budget order be rescinded.

The ACEN was established as a coordinating body of nine national committees of countries taken over by the USSR and through its activities has helped keep alive the hope for self-determination and freedom.

The council noted that "our country led the free world in supporting the democratic refugees from Nazi terror" and that "it would be morally unpardonable and politically suicidal for the U.S. to treat the fighters against Communist totalitarianism less generously than we treated those who fought Nazi despotism."

Funds Urged to Aid Radio Free Europe

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to vote full funding for Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty to keep open the vital communication links with the captive peoples of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

The Executive Council adopted a statement pointing out that the USSR has spent more than $300 million annually to try and stop the effective RFE broadcasts and "has until now failed."

There should be no capitulation, the council said, "in the war to bring truth and courage to countless millions behind the Iron Curtain."

LABOR'S ROLE is discussed by Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito and Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan at AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting. At right is A. Philip Randolph, president-emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters and dean of the nation's civil rights leaders.

Public Service Jobs Seen Permanent Need

Public service employment should be a permanent and important part of the government's manpower program, the AFL-CIO testified at House hearings.

The federation's assistant legislative director, Kenneth Young, termed the comprehensive manpower bill introduced by Rep. Dominick V. Daniels (D-N.J.) the most desirable of an assortment of bills being considered by a House Labor subcommittee.

It would establish the temporary public service jobs program, now due to expire next year, on a permanent basis. It would also increase the funding ceiling, authorize additional grants for vocational education tied to training programs, and earmark funds to assure continuation of major national manpower programs such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

Young, who was accompanied by AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts, told the subcommittee:

"It's time we all stopped pretending that the private economy can find enough jobs for everyone, including the hard-core unemployed. It just can't."

Citing a decline in the private industry payroll between 1970 and 1971, Young stressed that the private sector is unable "to provide jobs for all the unemployed workers and for those people entering and re-entering the labor force."

While endorsing the need for skill training, covered in various sections of the bill, the AFL-CIO stressed that the key need "is a national economy that is growing fast enough to provide job opportunities for all persons who are able to work and who are seeking employment."

Because America does not have a full employment economy, "manpower legislation that does not include job creation is not manpower legislation at all. It serves no real purpose other than to fool the public and to frustrate the unemployed," Young testified.

The AFL-CIO testimony endorsed efforts to provide flexibility for local jurisdictions in operating manpower programs but stressed the need to continue "national programs which have proved effective and which serve special groups lacking political influence at the state and local level."

Labor has a particular interest in continuation of the Jobs Corps and Apprenticeship Outreach, Young noted.

He sharply criticized the Administration's proposal for "no-strings" manpower revenue sharing which, he noted, Congress properly turned down last year.

He said a third proposal introduced by two Republican members of the House Labor Committee—Rep. Marvin L. Esch (Mich.) and Rep. William A. Steiger (Wis.)—is considerably superior to the White House bill, even though labor disagrees with some of its provisions. It moves in the direction of "the kind of large-scale, job-creation program this country needs."

Back Use of U.S. Ships:

Maritime Unions Join on Job Plans

Bal Harbour, Fla.—AFL-CIO maritime unions have agreed to coordinate their efforts to insure job security and employment opportunity for their members and work in close cooperation to generate increased cargoes for U.S. flag ships.

The unions' program was reported to the federation's Executive Council which adopted the report of Thomas W. Gleason, president of the Longshoremen, who served as chairman at the meeting of the maritime units.

The report stressed that industry stability is a key factor to employment and necessary to encourage U.S. shippers to move cargoes in U.S. flag ships.

Priorities for continued discussions were given to:

- No strikes during the period of contract negotiations.
- Three to five-year contracts to provide assurance with respect to continuity of operations.
- Uniform contract expiration dates.
- Provision for automatic wage adjustments annually.
- Establishment of a mechanism or procedure for the resolution of disputes without stoppages.

The unions, in announcing agreement to have further regular meetings, said they would work for a joint federal legislative program that would oppose compulsory arbitration "or any form of government interference in any manner in collective bargaining," support legislation to require that at least 50 percent of all U.S. oil and natural gas imports be carried in U.S. flag ships, preserve the merger of El Paso Natural Gas and Pacific Northwest Pipeline Co. to assure maximum U.S. flag participation in the transportation of liquid natural gas.

They urged support also of a bill to require that government-financed cargo be carried 100 percent in American flag ships provided freight rates are equal to those charged by foreign flags and of legislation to modernize and preserve existing U.S. Public Health Service hospitals.

The report also called on the AFL-CIO to include key issues affecting maritime workers among the issues COPE uses to measure performance in Congress.

Participating in the meeting and approving the report, besides Gleason for the ILA, were Thomas O'Callaghan, president of the Masters, Mates & Pilots Division of ILA; Jesse M. Calhoon, president of the Marine Engineers; Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union; Paul Hall, president of the Seafarers; Stephen Nowalski, president of Local 5000, Great Lakes Division. Steelworkers, and William R. Steinberg, president of the American Radio Association.

Ulster Urged To End Policy Of Internment

Bal Harbour, Fla.—No solution to the crisis in Northern Ireland is possible until the basic human rights of all are respected under law, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council called for the "immediate abolition of the inhuman system of internment" of citizens and said the problems of northern Ireland have been "further aggravated by the imposition of prolonged and severe martial rule."

The north of Ireland has been under martial law for some time now and the "preventive detention" practiced by British troops was also protested by the AFL-CIO convention in November 1971.

Calling due process "the vital link of freedom and democracy between people and government," the council said the restoration of due process is essential to any hopes of peace in the region.

Price Policies Scored as 'Facade,' Effective Control Measures Pushed

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The government's "so-called retail price controls are a facade created by the Administration in an attempt to manipulate the people into accepting its one-sided program of wage controls," the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared as it outlined a program for effective price stabilization.

The council said organized labor would continue to press for the following measures which would mean effective and realistic control of consumer prices:

- Consumer representation on the Price Commission.
- Application of price controls over items not covered and the closing of all price loopholes.
- Mandatory labeling of base and current prices on all retail items.
- Establishment of adequate compliance and enforcement machinery.
- Prompt processing of consumer complaints, including reports to consumers on the disposition of their complaints.
- Elimination of secrecy from Price Commission proceedings and provision for open hearings.
- Government action to assist consumers in the recovery of overcharges.

The AFL-CIO renewed its call on affiliates and other labor and community organizations "to join in the continued development of effective price watchdog units for the purpose of preventing price gouging in the marketplace, protecting the consumer and keeping the cost of living down."

The council noted that despite the Nixon Administration's plea for help in making the price program work, "the consumer is rapidly being phased out of any direct participation in aiding enforcement procedures."

"Consumer organizations, as such, have no representation on the Price Commission," the council said, adding that "retail shoppers have no way of knowing whether any particular price increase is legally permissible or not."

"In effect, the consumer is on his own, just as he would be without any official price program at all."

And there are, in fact, no direct controls or restraints on retail prices, the council said.

Price controls, in the rare and sporadic instances in which they are applied, are based on individual company costs, profit margins and mark-up percentages "concealed in documents available only to the Price Commission and the Internal Revenue Service," which the Executive Council noted, has only 3,000 agents available to enforce price regulations.

"The Cost of Living Council has exempted all fresh fruits, vegetables and other unprocessed foods, all new and used houses, all second-hand goods, including used cars, more than 40 percent of all rental housing units and 75 percent of the nation's retail stores," it said.

"Regulatory agencies, with the approval of the Price Commission, continue to grant price increases, in gas, electric, telephone and insurance rates; the only federal government action has been a 30-day freeze. Interest rates remain without mandatory controls, despite clear legislative authority to impose them.

"Enforcement of remaining controls has been sporadic, and for all practical purposes, nonexistent."

'Foot-Dragging' Scored:

More Funds Asked For Job Safety Law

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Nixon Administration's poor record on the implementation of the Occupational Safety & Health Act prompted the AFL-CIO Executive Council to urge Congress to step in.

"The record is one of foot-dragging, flabby enforcement and adulteration of the special provision of the act," the council charged. It called on Congress to drastically overhaul the Administration's fiscal 1973 budget for job safety and health programs.

Organized labor had pledged full cooperation in making the act work, the council noted, but unions have been shut out from participation.

"The Administration regards implementation of the act as a matter to be worked out among the federal government, business management and the governments of various states. Organized labor is regarded as an interloper," the council said.

The council protested that major policy decisions are discussed with organized labor "only at our insistence or after decisions have already been reached."

"Thus the goals of this law have been debased and their achievement needlessly delayed," the council said. It also noted a similar lack of enforcement and implementation of the Railroad Safety Act.

The council took particular issue with the Administration's fiscal 1973 budget of $67.5 million for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, pointing out that $30 million is earmarked for state job safety programs which fall short of federal standards.

"Up to now, few states show inclination to submit plans that will provide programs affording protections to workers equal to those provided by the federal program," the council statement said.

The expenditure for the state programs would be one-third more than what the budget authorizes for federal enforcement.

Yet the importance of federal enforcement is borne out in OSHA's own report covering the first several months of operations, the council noted.

That report showed that 77.4 percent of the workplaces inspected were in violation of federal standards, which the council called "a commentary on the abject failure of the states to protect the lives and health of workers during the years when there was no federal law."

During the period of the report, there were only 300 OSHA compliance officers who inspected 9,800 establishments. The council pointed out that it would take an enforcement staff of that size 170 years to inspect all the 4.1 million workplaces covered by the law.

It urged Congress to double the amount of funds the Administration requested for enforcement to enable OSHA to hire 2,500 compliance officers and occupational hygienists.

In other recommendations, the council called on Congress to:

- Transfer $20 million of the funds earmarked for state programs to federal enforcement operations.
- Double the budget authorizations for developing job safety and health standards, training and education, and statistical reporting of injuries and illnesses.
- Double the $28.3 million authorized for the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health.
- Substantially increase the $1.3 million requested for the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission.

Trade Crisis Spurs Demand For New Law

nation. These companies have "abandoned U.S. factories and U.S. communities where they made their profits. These companies have abandoned tens of thousands of American men and women who once worked in their plants here, leaving their care to the community and to state and federal governments."

The council emphasized that "toothless remedies" that fail to deal with the role of multinational corporations "only deceive hard-pressed Americans and accelerate the crisis."

Current reports from the Common Market, the council added, indicate that the Administration's "chief concern is for the export of America's highly subsidized agriculture products, not manufactured goods where America is suffering its greatest losses."

pand her domestic market by increasing the purchasing power of her workers and farmers," and that Tokyo be encouraged to step up trade and investment in the developing countries of Asia.

The Administration should spare no efforts to overcome the irritation that has arisen between the United States and India and "should lose no further time in extending recognition and, upon request, aid to the Bangla Desh government. . ."

The council's statement declared that "America's new course" towards Peking has enabled the Mao Tse-tung regime "to break out of its international isolation" and has improved its chances of securing technological aid and long-term credits from the West. This has been of considerable help to Mao "in the bitter power struggle within the Communist ruling clique," the council said, but so far there has been no reciprocation from the Mao regime for "this enormous American assistance."

The council assailed "our government's failure to condemn the Pakistan rulers for their savage repression of their political opponents in what is now Bangla Desh." This failure impaired U.S. prestige in Asia and served to further chill relations between the United States and India. The statement chided India on ending its non-aligned position by signing a mutual assistance pact with the Soviet Union and forgetting the $10 billion of U.S. economic and technological aid.

Despite concessions made by the United States to Moscow and Peking, the council said, "they continue to support Hanoi's refusal to negotiate a just and honorable settlement" of the war.

NEW MEMBERS of the AFL-CIO Executive Council confer with Federation Pres. George Meany between sessions of the council in Bal Harbour, Fla. From left are Al H. Health Security's Cost Controls Tied to Social Insurance System

Bal Harbour, Fla.—An effective national health program requires a proven social insurance financing system and not the inefficient methods of private insurance, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The labor-backed National Health Security program would use the "tried, proven and accepted" system of social insurance, the council noted, while other proposals "would continue the costly, inefficient system of private insurance supplemented with public funds."

The council called on the House Ways & Means Committee to review the poor performance of private insurance in the Medicare program that is revealed in a number of audits released by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and the Social Security Administration.

These audits clearly show the "blatant malfeasance" of the companies in administering the Medicare program and in their failure to control costs, the council stressed. It cited several examples revealed by the audits:

- Aetna Life Insurance Co. made duplicate payments estimated at $3.2 million and paid an additional $1.3 million in excess of reasonable claims.
- Connecticut General Life Insurance Co. made overpayments estimated at $1.2 million.
- Blue Shield of Florida paid approximately $320 million to physicians without proper assurance that the charges were reasonable.
- Michigan Medical Service, another Blue Cross organization, cannot justify the reasonableness of $6.4 million in claims payments.

While the audits appear to be "only the tip of the iceberg," the council said, "they clearly demonstrate the utter failure of insurance companies to efficiently administer a federal medical insurance program."

Noting that only a portion of the audits were made public, the council urged HEW Sec. Elliot L. Richardson to release all audits of insurance carriers involved in Medicare and Medicaid.

"This information is essential to the Congress in its study of the best means for financing and administering a national health insurance program," the council said.

It also charged the Nixon Administration with ignoring the Medicare experience when minimum standards were proposed for state regulations of insurance companies.

"Individual states are incapable of effectively regulating huge interstate conglomerate insurance companies," the council said, declaring that national minimum standards without federal enforcement "are little more than a hoax on the health consumer."

"The proposed regulations would do nothing to correct the health care crisis of high costs and an archaic delivery system badly in need of reform.

"What America needs is a single source of financing and effective national administration to meet these critical problems," the council stressed.

It said the solution to the health care crisis is National Health Security based on the social insurance financing system.

With the entire labor movement committed to Health Security, "we will press for its enactment by the Congress this year."

Should Congress fail to act on the legislation, the council warned that "we intend to make this a major issue in the 1972 campaign so that the people can render their judgment."

Article XX Interpreted On Independent Units

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted an interpretation of collective bargaining relationships established by independent unions prior to affiliation with AFL-CIO unions that will be applicable to cases arising under Section 2 of Article XX—the federation's internal dispute plan.

The text of the council statement:

"In recent years a great number of independent associations have determined it to be in the best interest of their memberships to seek affiliation with a national or international union affiliated with the AFL-CIO. These independent associations have recognized that they must strengthen their structures and improve and enlarge their ability to serve the members they represent. This trend continues today and, indeed, is growing.

"The desire on the part of the independent associations to transform themselves into viable effective trade unions, affiliated with like-minded labor organizations, is accompanied by the desire to insure that a degree of stability is established over their collective bargaining relationships. Recent decisions reached under Article XX, however, have held that while these new affiliates are bound by Article XX in their conduct, they do not receive the full protection of Article XX.

"In order to correct this, the Executive Council concluded that for the purposes of Article XX, an established collective bargaining relationship should be interpreted to mean any situation in which an affiliate or any local or any other subordinate body thereof, prior to or after its affiliation, has either (a) been recognized by the employer (including any governmental agency) as the collective bargaining representative for the employes involved for a period of one year or more, or (b) been certified by the National Labor Relations Board or other federal or state agency as the collective bargaining representative for the employes.

AFTRA Backed on Anti-Bias Stand

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The AFL-CIO Executive Council has voiced its support for a drive by the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists to require broadcasters to show that nondiscrimination in employment exists in all job categories.

It is important that the efforts of the Federal Communications Commission to achieve equal opportunity in the broadcast industry succeed, the council said, and that viewers and listeners are aware of the employment practices of broadcasters.

EEOC Coverage Extended:

Limited Job Bias Bill Cleared by Senate

The Senate voted 73-16 approval of a compromise bill to strengthen the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and expand its jurisdiction.

In the key area of enforcement powers, the Senate bill falls short of the procedure urged by the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups which would have enabled the EEOC to issue "cease and desist" orders to remedy illegal job discrimination based on race, religion, sex and national origin.

Instead, the EEOC will have to bring a federal court suit if it is unable to obtain voluntary compliance with the law. In cases that the agency's general counsel certify are of "general public importance," the court action would be initiated at a higher level—a three judge federal court, with direct appeal to the Supreme Court.

In this latter respect, and especially in the area of extension of coverage, the Senate bill is superior to the version passed by the House last year.

It brings under coverage of the federal anti-discrimination law some 10 million state and local government employes, including teachers. It also will cover private firms with 15 or more workers as compared with the present floor of 25 or more.

A southern-led filibuster, initially supported by most conservative Republicans, forced the weakening of the Senate bill.

Twice, a majority had voted to retain the direct enforcement authority and to reject the more cumbersome court procedure of the House bill.

But twice, the Senate was unable to muster the two-thirds majority necessary to limit debate and halt the filibuster. The closest it came was a 53-35 vote for cloture, six short of the needed margin.

With no solution in sight, and with absenteeism a continuing problem, the Senate voted 45-39 for a modified version of the court enforcement amendment it had twice rejected.

This paved the way for a decisive 73-21 vote to cut off debate and end the filibuster which had prevented final action on the bill for more than a month. Senate leaders had served notice that if the cloture effort had failed, the bill would be put aside and in effect killed.

The Senate legislation consolidates a number of government anti-discrimination programs in the EEOC. But the Senate voted to leave the federal contract compliance machinery in the Labor Dept. rather than shift it to the EEOC as both union and civil right groups had urged.

Machinists Ask for Pay Lost in Aerospace Case

The Machinists have asked a federal court to force the Pay Board to restore 17 cents in hourly wages to the first year of a three-year aerospace agreement which the Pay Board cut back—taking an average of $353 from each aerospace worker this year.

The suit for an injunction blocking the Pay Board action was filed at U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C.

It is similar, but not identical, to one filed earlier by the Auto Workers. Together, the two suits involve more than 200,000 aerospace workers.

The Machinists suit is filed on behalf of workers at Lockheed, McDonnell-Douglas and Boeing Co. plants

The IAM points out in its suit that the 17 cents represented a cost-of-living, catch-up increase agreed to in its 1968 agreements with the aerospace industry.

The union said the companies had approved the catch-up increase, either in writing or by word of mouth, and that the agreements were reached either before the freeze or under Pay Board regulations during the freeze.

"Subsequently, the Pay Board changed its rules and arbitrarily denied the catch-up increase in new contracts negotiated in good faith between the IAM and the three companies," the Machinists said in a statement.

The union maintains that the wage increases also were approvable under the tandem relationship that exists between aerospace settlements and those in the auto industry.

It charged the Pay Board with discriminating against aerospace workers because similar increases had been given approval for rail workers and miners.

The miners had been threatening to strike, the IAM noted, but aerospace workers obviously could not make such a threat realistically because of the depressed state of the industry.

Butz Blames Housewives For Hikes in Meat Prices

When the price of meat goes up, the American housewife is to blame.

That's the reasoning of Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz in testimony before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

In a newspaper account inserted in the Congressional Record, Butz is quoted as saying:

"Mrs. Housewife has so much income—supplemented with food stamps and everything else—she has created tremendous demands for meat" and forced up prices.

Butz said he would "fight like a wounded steer" against meat price controls. Consumers who think prices are too high, the Secretary of Agriculture suggested, should either shift to less expensive meats "or not eat quite so much."

WORKERS CAN'T WIN by voting for Alabama Gov. George Wallace in Florida's Democratic presidential primary. That's the message the Committee for a Vote That Counts is carrying throughout the state. Committee Chairman Chris Carnes, at the podium, is a union member who says he threw away his vote in 1968 by casting a ballot for Wallace and thus helping to elect Nixon. He doesn't want it to happen again.

Poverty Bill Approved Despite Veto Threat

The House ignored a new veto threat and passed an anti-poverty bill that included a major expansion of the Head Start program for pre-school children and an independent legal services program for the poor.

Pres. Nixon last December vetoed an earlier version of the bill, aiming his principal criticism at a new program of comprehensive day care centers for children of working parents with fees based on ability to pay.

The new bill drafted by the House Labor Committee dropped the child care program. But it authorized a big boost in funds for Head Start and opened the program to children of the near-poor as well as families in actual poverty.

House Republican leaders warned that this was inviting a new veto and they protested also the bill's procedures for appointing the directors of the non-profit, non-political Legal Services Corp.

Under the House bill, the President would be required to make most of the appointments from lists submitted by various professional bar associations, the Judicial Conference of the United States and other involved groups.

Even though the President would be free to reject all nominees and demand as many additional names as he wished, the White House contended this would be an infringement of presidential prerogatives.

But a Republican move to extend the existing anti-poverty law an additional two years, with no expansion of Head Start and without the Legal Services Corp., was beaten on a 206-159 vote. The legislation was then passed and sent to the Senate by a 234-127 vote.

Among its new features is establishment of an environmental action program to provide jobs on projects to combat pollution and improve the environment.

The Senate, meanwhile, plunged into the controversial and politically volatile issue of school busing as it took up a two-part school aid bill.

One section of the bill authorizes funds through 1975 for federal aid to higher education—including both aid to colleges and to students. The other section authorizes $1.5 billion over two years to help school districts meet the costs of desegregation and quality integration.

The House had attached to the legislation a flat prohibition on the use of federal funds for busing to achieve school desegregation and language forbidding federal agencies from "urging" or "requiring" school districts to use local or state funds for that purpose.

The Senate's Democratic and Republican leaders—Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and Hugh Scott (R-Pa.)—have proposed substitute language intended to bar busing purely to achieve "racial balance" in schools but would allow the use of federal funds when requested by a school district to carry out the constitutional mandate for desegregation.

Their expressed intent is to defuse a political issue that threatens to divide the nation and to head off pressure for a drastic constitutional amendment.

The Mansfield-Scott compromise was adopted by the Senate. But other key amendments were still to be acted on.

R. A. Plumb Elected To Head Barbers

Indianapolis—Richard A. Plumb of Fort Wayne has been installed as president of the Barbers & Beauticians after a one-sided victory in a special referendum election.

Plumb, who had been the union's eighth vice president, polled 15,053 votes to a combined total of 11,667 for three opponents.

The special election was held to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Joseph W. DePaola.

move as one designed "to compel American citizens to work against their will. . . ."

"The symbolism of the President stripping American workers of their rights as free men while he was enjoying the hospitality of the overseers of a slave state," Meany declared, "will not be lost on Americans who still believe in the basic dignity and freedom of all humans."

The federation president termed the action "further evidence, if any is needed, of the pronounced tilt of this Administration toward entrenched wealth and greed."

The legislation was aimed solely at the West Coast dock strike and would not prevent the dock workers from renewing the walkout if, for example, the Pay Board disapproves the settlement.

The agreement ending the 135-day dock strike, longest in American history, provides an hourly increase of 72 cents, retroactive to last Christmas Day, raising base pay to $5 an hour, and another 40-cent increase next July 1.

The contract also provides fringe benefits, including guaranteed pay for 36 hours of work a week for full-time longshoremen, and 18 hours a week for part-time workers averaged over a 26-week period.

The shippers also agreed to pay a $1 per ton tax on all cargo loaded or unloaded by workers other than ILWU members within a 50-mile radius of the docks.

A basic pension of $350 monthly also is provided.

it would take $14.33 to buy what cost $10 then.

Real spendable earnings for the average worker with three dependents stood at $93.84, an increase of 43 cents over the previous month.

The BLS said the prices of some nonfood commodities such as clothing, gasoline, automobiles and some luxuries declined by three-tenths of 1 percent during January.

But shoppers were paying more for meats, new cars and some services.

Meat prices jumped 1.5 percent while the prices of fresh fruits and vegetables, which have been exempt from controls, dropped 2.8 percent.

Overall, the price of food remained unchanged, although the price of restaurant meals and snacks increased by two-tenths of 1 percent during the month.

Apparel prices were off 1.3 percent, but the price of new cars increased by 1.6 percent while used car prices went down 1.8 percent.

The cost of public transportation jumped by 2.6 percent over the month.

The BLS said that items exempt from economic controls under the government's Phase 2 program increased only one-tenth of 1 percent during the month.

"Substantial increases in the nonexempt grocery store food and services components were only partially offset by a decrease in the apparel component," BLS said.

"Higher meat prices were largely responsible for the increase in nonexempt food. The rise in services resulted from increases in local transit fares and higher charges for gas, electricity and telephone services."

Senate's Moderate Stand Bars Rigid Busing Curbs

Inner City Jobless Rate Double '69

The unemployment rate in the nation's ghettos has nearly doubled during the past three years of the Nixon Administration, according to figures released by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The report, covering both the fourth quarter and all of 1971 will be the last of the urban poverty series issued by the BLS until "some time in 1973"—a decision that Administration spokesmen have denied was politically motivated.

The report shows that while joblessness has skyrocketed in general since 1969, the poverty neighborhoods of the nation's 100 largest metropolitan areas have been even harder hit.

The chief victims of high joblessness in the slums are Negroes and members of other minorities.

Since 1969, joblessness among nonwhites in poor city neighborhoods has jumped from 7.2 percent to 12.4 percent.

The unemployment rate for whites in the poverty areas last year amounted to 8 percent.

The overall jobless rate for the poverty areas climbed from 5.5 percent in 1969 to 9.7 percent during 1971. For the nation as a whole, unemployment increased from an average annual rate of 3.5 percent in 1969 to 5.9 percent last year.

The jobless rates for adult men in the urban poverty areas went from 6.2 percent to 8.2 percent during the year, with black adult men bearing the brunt of increased joblessness.

Adult women experienced an increase in unemployment, with the rate jumping from 5.7 to 8.0 percent. For teenagers in the ghetto neighborhoods, those in the 16-19 age bracket, unemployment increased from 24.0 percent to 27.1 percent.

The rate for black teenagers was nearly double that for whites the same age, according to the BLS report.

The population of poverty areas continued to decline in 1971, but at a slower pace than in the two preceding years. The civilian labor force dropped by about 150,000 from 1970 to 6 million.

Employment averaged 5.5 million, down 270,000 from 1970 while unemployment rose by 120,000 to 587,000.

During the fourth quarter of 1971, unemployment in urban poverty areas declined slightly from 10.4 percent to 9.8 percent.

The BLS said the series on urban

Major Boost Voted in Aid To Education

By David L. Perlman

The Senate took a moderate stand in the hotly controversial school busing dispute after rejecting a drastic challenge to the power of federal courts to remedy unconstitutional racial discrimination.

The politically-fueled battle over busing amendments overshadowed the almost unanimous passage of legislation substantially increasing federal aid to colleges and students and inaugurating a new program of subsidies to school districts to cover desegregation expenses.

For a time, with absenteeism high, it appeared that the Senate would follow the example of the House and impose what amounted to a flat ban on all forms of court-ordered or government-required busing.

At an early stage in the debate, that's what the Senate did on a 43-40 vote giving tentative approval to the amendment sponsored by Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) and backed by a coalition of southerners and a number of conservative Republicans.

Had it stayed in the bill, it would have symbolized a headlong retreat from the concept of quality, integrated schooling and set the stage for a divisive constitutional clash between the judicial and legislative branches of government.

But after absent senators were hastily summoned back to Washington, the Griffin amendment was rejected by a key 50-47 vote. (Roll-call on Page 7.)

The Senate then wrote into the bill by substantial majorities ranging around 63-34 the provisions of a labor-supported compromise

Votes to Kill Nixon Bill:

House Panel Rejects Forced Arbitration

A House Commerce subcommittee voted to kill the Administration's compulsory arbitration bill.

The 6-5 vote was a sharp setback to an employer-supported effort to give the President permanent authority to halt major strikes in transportation-linked industries—railroads, airlines, trucking, longshore and maritime.

But the threat remains in the Senate, where the Administration bill and an assortment of alternative proposals will be considered at a Mar. 17 meeting of the Labor Committee. The Senate earlier this year rejected by only a slim two-vote margin an effort to attach the permanent strike ban to the temporary legislation aimed at halting the West Coast dock strike.

The effort to steer the labor-opposed legislation through the House Commerce Committee was led by Rep. James Harvey (R-Mich.), who described his proposal as a "compromise."

It retained the key compulsory arbitration feature of the Administration bill, however, empowering the President to name an arbitrator to choose between the "final" contract proposals of union and management.

Harvey's bill was supported by four Republican members and Subcommittee Chairman John Jarman (D-Okla.). All six votes against it came from subcommittee Democrats.

The chairman of the full House Commerce Committee, Rep. Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.), reiterated his opposition to the strike curb legislation—and to compulsory arbitration.

Pres. Nixon sought to prod Congress into action on the Administration bill in his dock strike message last month. He used the occasion to change the title of his bill from the cumbersome "Emergency Public Interest Protection Act" to the zippier "Crippling Strikes Prevention Act."

And Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) announced that he now has 28 co-sponsors for a toughened version of the Administration bill. It would apply the compulsory arbitration feature to strikes of regional as well as national impact. He said the White House has no objection to this broader approach.

Meanwhile, a story distributed by Press Associates, Inc., the labor-oriented news service, reported that 10 giant corporations have banded

Court Affirms Right to Aid NLRB Process

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled unanimously that the Taft-Hartley Act prohibits the firing of an employe for making statements to a trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board—whether or not those statements are made during a formal hearing.

The decision, written by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, reversed a ruling of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at St. Louis in favor of a Springfield, Mo., electrical contractor who fired four employes for making statements to a trial examiner.

At the time, the examiner was investigating an unfair labor practice charge filed by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers against the AA Electric Co.

The employes were fired Apr. 18, 1968, the same day they gave statements to the trial examiner at the IBEW Local 453 union hall, and eventually the appellate

Three Major Cities Added To High Jobless Category

Three more of the nation's 150 major labor areas were added to the Labor Dept.'s "substantial" unemployment list bringing the total to 57—only eight less than the 10-year high of 65 reached last October.

Pittsburgh and Wheeling, W.Va., were added to the list, the Labor Dept. said, because of sluggishness in the steel industry there which is still affected by last year's stockpiling for a possible strike. Altoona, Pa., was added because of "recent declines in non-electrical machinery, primary metals and railroads. . . ."

Addition of the three major areas reversed a downward trend of the past three months. Fourteen smaller areas were added to the substantial list and five others were removed, leaving a total of 818 in that category.

The Labor Dept. defines "substantial" unemployment as 6 percent or more with the rate expected to continue at that level for at least two more months.

Board Issues Formula On Fringe Benefit Hikes

The Pay Board laid down a formula for increases in fringe benefits by a vote of 8-0 with the five labor members of the board abstaining.

In another action, the board unanimously exempted from controls pay increases granted under incentive programs designed to promote higher productivity.

Both resolutions implemented congressional amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act, but the labor representatives on the board argued that the fringe benefit ruling does not fully meet the intent of Congress.

The Pay Board said in a news release that it had interpreted the congressional action on fringes as meaning it could set guidelines because Congress had "stipulated that employer contributions for pension, profit-sharing, annuity and savings, group insurance, or disability and health plans shall not count against the wage and salary guidelines unless 'unreasonably inconsistent' with the guidelines."

The incentive pay rule applies to

Juvenile Crime Project Aided By HEW Grant

The AFL-CIO and the National Council on Crime & Delinquency have received a federal grant for the training of community volunteers in the prevention and control of juvenile delinquency.

The $55,000 grant from the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare will be used to expand the AFL-CIO/NCCD Education to Action program to eight more cities designated as "high impact" areas by the Justice Dept.

The year-old program has been highly praised by HEW officials for its pilot projects in Kansas City and Akron.

The projects were set up to train union members in the causes and prevention of juvenile delinquency and to develop action programs for existing community groups. A spokesman for HEW referred to the Akron program report as "one of the most professional I have ever seen" in this area.

The grant was presented by Robert Foster of HEW's Youth Development & Delinquency Prevention Administration to Director Leo Perlis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Service Activities and Milton Rector, executive director of the NCCD.

CSA Field Rep. B. G. Culver is the director of the project.

JUVENILE DELINQUENCY, its causes and prevention, will be studied by union members acting as community volunteers in an eight-city program financed by a government grant to the AFL-CIO and the National Council on Crime & Delinquency. SEIU Creates Division For Police Officers

Establishment of a separate and autonomous National Union of Police Officers—as a division of the 500,000-member Service Employes—was announced by SEIU Pres. George Hardy.

Hardy said John Cassese, a police union leader for more than 20 years, will head the new union. Cassese served as president of the 30,000-member New York City Patrolmen's Benevolent Association for 11 years and is a past president of the International Conference of Police Associations.

The new division of SEIU was formed, a union statement said, "to provide the vehicle for grouping of police locals which SEIU represents, and other newly affiliated locals, into a cohesive police unit devoted exclusively to the special problems of law enforcement officers."

"There are 450,000 policemen in the country and NUPO's aim is to bring into the labor movement as many of them as we can," Hardy said.

The police group will have its own constitution, elect its own officers and hold its own conventions.

Disclosure Policy Set On Controls Violations

The Cost of Living Council has ruled that persons who complain to the Internal Revenue Service of possible violations of wage or price controls must be informed as to the disposition of the complaint.

"Under the plan for disclosure," said the council statement, local and district offices of the IRS will "provide information to a complainant or third parties with knowledge of the complaint regarding current investigations."

The statement also added that "the public disclosure policy will go into effect . . . in the 302 IRS offices across the Nation."

Newsmen calling district IRS offices following the announcement continued to encounter confusion, however. Several offices denied the existence of the new disclosure policy, and others said that they had no data yet on compliance checks of local merchants.

The Cost of Living Council said the disclosure policy will work like this: When an investigation results in court action, the identity and substance of the alleged violation become public. Matters under investigation and investigations that find no violation will be reported to the complainant or a representative. The IRS will also provide details to anyone inquiring about rollbacks in prices or other adjustments.

In other price control action, the Price Commission held its first set of public hearings since it came into existence last October. Congress made public hearings a requirement when it extended the Administration's authority under the Economic Stabilization Act.

The subject of the hearings was public utility rate increases, which the commission froze for 30 days, starting Feb. 10.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis commented that these actions do little to dispute the growing consumer feeling that "nobody in the Administration cares" how the consumer is affected by Phase 2 rules.

Phase 2 is still "neither firm nor fair," he said, and the proof of that is in the growing list of exemptions to price controls.

Perlis, who heads labor's price monitoring operation, made his charges in a speech at a meeting of government, labor and management representatives sponsored by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

He charged that the sudden burst of public appearances by Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson was an Administration attempt to turn Phase 2 into a traveling road show with Grayson selling Nixon economic policies.

But, he concluded, "Grayson has a shoddy product to sell" and a sales pitch that "lacks credibility."

Board Sets Guide On Fringe Benefits

plantwide productivity sharing programs as well as pay increases given individuals or crews to reflect productivity gains.

Pay Board staff members estimated that 20 percent of all industrial workers in the country are covered by some form of incentive program, but had no idea of how much money is involved.

On fringe benefits, the board adopted a policy after weeks of debate that allows increases in the exempt non-wage benefits up to seven-tenths of 1 percent of total compensation.

But the board made a number of exceptions to that general rule.

Here is an example of how the seven-tenths of 1 percent formula would be applied to a wage-fringe settlement brought before the board:

An employe earns $100 a week in total compensation for wages and fringe benefits. Under the board's avowed guidelines for new, first-year wage increases, he would be allowed to receive an increase of 5.5 percent, bringing his wages to $105.50 per week. But he could receive an additional 70 cents in fringe benefits such as pension, profit-sharing and annuity plans or group-insurance policies.

The total package increase would then be $6.20 weekly.

And under a special "catch-up" provision, the board said it would allow an increase of 1.5 percent in fringe benefits in cases where employes had received no improvements in such benefits during the past three years. The 1.5 percent "catch-up" would be in addition to the seven-tenths of 1 percent.

If employers have boosted fringe benefits by less than 1.5 percent during the past three years, the employes can be given the difference.

And if employers are spending less than 10 percent of their total compensation costs on fringe benefits, the difference is allowable up to an additional 5 percent in fringes beyond the seven-tenths.

If higher employer payments are required to maintain benefits that workers already are receiving, these payments are exempt from control.

The Pay Board ruled that fringe benefits also could be increased above the seven-tenths rule to reflect "tandem" relationships where contract terms in an industry or company historically follow a pattern settlement in another industry or firm.

The board stipulated that it must be demonstrated that the tandem relationship has existed at least five years.

House Adopts Bill to Limit Noise Levels

The House voted 356-32 approval of a bill giving the federal Environmental Protection Agency authority to curb at least some of the nation's noise pollution.

Within 18 months, the EPA would be required to set maximum noise levels for new construction equipment, transportation equipment, motors, engines and electrical devices—including, it was brought out in debate, electronic amplifiers for musical instruments.

Existing equipment would not be covered, except by whatever local or state ordinances might be enacted. An attempt to amend the bill to shift control over airport noise from the Federal Aviation Agency to the Environmental Protection Agency was rejected by voice vote.

Rural South Dakota Strikers Battle Union-Busting Firm, Sub-Zero Cold

Clark, S.D.—Forty members of the Allied Industrial Workers are battling a vicious anti-union firm and bitter cold on the picket line in an effort to negotiate their first labor contract.

AIW Local 586 has been on strike against Fairfield Products, Inc.'s French fried potato processing plant here since Jan. 24. The firm is typical of the anti-union atmosphere faced by many other employes who work for the burgeoning agribusiness industry in the nation's rural areas, the AIW said.

The workers selected the AIW as their bargaining agent last May. Nine meetings were held with the Fairfield management, but all proved fruitless.

About 90 percent of the workers receive only the bare federal minimum wage of $1.60 an hour, Local Pres. Richard Neal pointed out. Because the workweek is generally less than 40 hours, most workers have an average take-home pay of $30 a week.

In the negotiations for an initial three-year contract, Fairfield refused to increase wages in the first year and offered raises of only 5 cents an hour in each of the two subsequent years. Even that offer was conditional on the "job performance" of the employes.

The AIW is also attempting to improve working conditions at the plant, which the local describes as deplorable.

Despite the bitter South Dakota winter with temperatures plumeting to 20 and 30 degrees below zero, the local has maintained around-the-clock picket lines outside the plant.

Only a few workers have crossed the picket lines, Neal reported. He estimated that plant production is down 65 to 70 percent. The curtailed operations are being maintained by the Fairfield management and several teenagers that are occasionally brought to the plant.

The union reports difficulty in receiving fair press coverage of the strike in area newspapers.

Stories in the weekly Clark County Courier gave the impression that the strike was ineffective. This prompted the local to purchase an advertisement in the newspaper to tell its side of the dispute.

"California had its grape workers—South Dakota has its potato workers," the ad said in an appeal for public support of the strikers.

During the third week of the walkout, the daily Watertown Public Opinion featured the Fairfield plant in a full-page picture layout without any mention of the strike. The newspaper refused to take a paid ad from the union to present the full facts of the dispute, the AIW reported.

Neal said the only fair newspaper coverage has come from the Huron Daily Plainsman.

The striking AIW members have maintained high morale, and unions throughout South Dakota have been sending contributions channelled through AIW Region 9 Director Robert Schaefer.

The AIW reported that Fairfield recently signed a federal government contract for 4 million pounds of its products for the Child Nutrition Program, most of which will go into the school lunch programs throughout the nation.

For A&P Local:

Meat Cutters Assail Suit on Pay Rollback

The Meat Cutters denounced a Justice Dept. suit aimed at rolling back negotiated wage increases for 77 of its Baltimore area members as "legalized, economic vengeance against working people."

By contrast, the company which employs the Meat Cutters, the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., praised the government's action as "gratifying." The A&P declared that "the Justice Dept. has begun to put teeth in the inflationary control program in respect to wages."

The A&P admitted in a statement that it had directed the government's attention to the 16-month contract it signed with Meat Cutters Local 117 last November. The workers won wage increases of 22 percent over the contractual period after an eight-day strike at a meat distributing plant serving 167 Baltimore area A&P stores.

Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman declared that "our Baltimore local was not setting any inflationary pattern when it negoiated for these hard-working 77 employes. Instead, the union negotiated a catch-up pay adjustment for the last group of workers involved in our collective bargaining pattern in that area."

Gorman said the settlement "had become standard in our industry in the Baltimore-Washington area."

"These working people are not getting rich on their wages and they are not causing any disturbance of economic stability in their community.

"So far as halting inflation is concerned," Gorman said, the government rollback requested by the Justice Dept. "would be about as effective as spraying 77 drops of rain on the Sahara Desert."

The government suit, filed in U.S. District Court at Baltimore, asks the court to order A&P to cease immediate payment of wages in excess of the Pay Board's standards. The board's avowed guideline on new wage increases is 5.5 percent a year.

The suit also asks that the union be directed to refrain from "inducing or coercing" payment in excess of the board standards and, in addition, seeks a fine of $2,500 each against the Meat Cutters and A&P as civil penalities for violating guidelines.

Gorman, meanwhile, called a Mar. 3 meeting in Chicago of key officers in locals holding contracts with the A&P. The union's legal counsel was summoned for the meeting, too.

"We shall carefully review the situation and plan future steps to protect our people from harassment and liability under an ill-advised government policy," he vowed.

"Our international union, with a membership of over half a million men and women, stands firmly behind our Local 117 in Baltimore, and its officers and its members."

The supermarket chain said it wouldn't comment on specific parts of the suit, but part of an A&P statement told how the company lobbied to get the government to cast its eyes on the Meat Cutters settlement.

When Local 117 demanded what A&P called "excessive payments" during negotiations, "we resisted by hard bargaining and by attempting to interest the government in prompt enforcement of its guidelines."

Although the A&P also is subject to a $2,500 fine in the Justice Dept.'s suit, a Wall Street Journal article noted that even if the company is fined, "it'll be a small price for the largest supermarket chain in the country to pay to keep this and future wage settlements down."

Local 117 represents a total of 6,000 meat cutters.

IT'S NOW the United Farm Workers National Union. That's the title on the charter of the AFL-CIO's newest affiliate. Federation Pres. George Meany presents the charter to Cesar Chavez, director of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, which the AFL-CIO established in 1966 as an interim step to full union status. Witnessing the landmark in American labor history is Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Division of Urban Affairs of the U.S. Catholic Conference, which was instrumental in mediating a number of Farm Worker disputes with growers.

High Court Bars Firings For Statements to Board

court reversed an NLRB order that the employes be reinstated.

In writing the high court's opinion, Justice Blackmun noted that the court granted review of the appellate decision because it appeared to have an important bearing on the administration of the National Labor Relations Act.

"It would make less than complete sense to protect the employe because he participates in the formal inception of the process (by filing the charge) or in the final, formal presentation, but not to protect his participation in the important developmental stages that fall between these two points in time," Blackmun said.

"This would be unequal and inconsistent protection and is not the protection needed to preserve the integrity of the board processes in its entirety."

The decision said the Supreme Court's interpretation "also squares with the practicalities of the appropriate agency action," namely, that of the NLRB.

The court remanded the case for further action back to the 8th Circuit Court which it said was wrong in its interpretation that the federal labor law protects workers from employers' reprisals only for filing an unfair labor practice charge or giving testimony at a formal hearing.

Under the appellate court's decision an employe would be without protection for otherwise participating in the investigative stages, such as giving an affidavit or sworn statement to an investigating NLRB field examiner.

The original unfair labor practice which the examiner was investigating involved the discriminatory discharge of five employes who signed authorization cards for IBEW Local 453 representation.

In other action, the Supreme Court agreed to review a lower court's refusal to enforce an NLRB order for reinstatement of unfair practice strikers.

The case grew out of a strike at a Santa Maria, Calif., trucking firm for recognition of a Teamsters local as bargaining agent.

The NLRB said the decision of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at San Francisco in refusing to enforce the order is "directly contrary to precedents."

If allowed to stand, the Labor Board said, the decision would increase the job risks of a striker and undermine the right to strike.

Farm Workers Win First Pact In Southeast

Miami—The Farm Workers, chartered this week as a union by the AFL-CIO, announced the signing of its first agreement in the southeast covering 1,200 agricultural employes of Coca-Cola's Foods Division.

The three-year contract provides wage increases of 25 cents an hour for 300 full-time workers in the first year and 5 cents a box on most fruit picked by 800 piece rate harvest workers. Additional increases are due in the second and third years of the agreement the union said, but details were not released.

Full-time workers for Coca-Cola were receiving $1.85 to $2 an hour and the orange harvest workers had been paid 35 cents a box.

The Coca-Cola agreement is a signficant breakthrough in the Farm Workers' eight-month organizing effort to gain recognition for thousands of seasonal and migrant workers in Florida.

Farm Workers Pres. Cesar Chavez praised company officials as "enlightened and fair." He said, "We hope other companies will follow the lead of Coca-Cola."

The company's Foods Division markets Minute Maid orange juice and other citrus products.

The Minute Maid workers had selected the Farm Workers as their bargaining agent in December and negotiations for the landmark agreement began a short time later with the support of AFL-CIO organizations and religous groups.

The contract, which is retroactive to Jan. 3, also provides for nine paid holidays, 10 paid sick days and paid vacations ranging from two to four weeks for full-time workers.

Mell A. Farrell Dies, Led Sheet Metal Local

New York—Mell A. Farrell, president of Sheet Metal Workers Local 28 and a vice president of the New York State AFL-CIO, died Feb. 10. He was 75.

Farrell also served as an executive member of the New York City Building & Construction Trades Council.

COPE Dollars Drive Rolls Despite IRS Rule

Contributions to COPE and other union-sponsored political committees will help elect public officials who support labor's program, but they can't be claimed as a tax credit or tax deduction.

An Internal Revenue Service regulation and a Treasury Dept. news conference gave the government's interpretation of a tax law change that became effective this year.

Certain types of political contributions are eligible for a 50 percent tax credit. On contributions that qualify, half of all donations up to $25 for an individual or $50 for a couple filing a joint return may be subtracted from the amount of federal income tax owed. An alternative, useful only to persons in higher income brackets, is a deduction from taxable income of up to $50 for an individual or $100 for a couple.

But to qualify, the donation must be made to an announced candidate for public office or to a committee which uses the money collected exclusively to pass on to announced candidates, and does not carry on any other activities.

Thus, a person who gives $25 to a candidate or his campaign committee would be able to subtract $12.50 from the federal income tax that becomes due next year—based on his 1972 income. He would have to attach an official receipt in order to claim the tax credit.

The IRS said, however, that tax credits cannot be claimed for contributions to "political action committees which engage in general political, educational or legislative activities."

At the news conference, a Treasury Dept. spokesman specifically cited both COPE—the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education—and AMPAC—the American Medical Association's Political Action Committee—as examples of organizations that cannot presently qualify for tax credits.

For groups such as unions and doctors to qualify, the government official said, they would "have to form a committee that is directed solely to funding candidacies, as distinguished from carrying on other legislative activities." The candidate committee, he indicated, could have the same leadership and sponsorship as a more general committee, but its funds would have to be kept separate and earmarked for qualified candidates.

COPE Director Al Barkan said that any slackening of the voluntary fund-raising effort because of the IRS ruling would do damage to the campaign for a progressive Congress and President that would far outweigh the the token tax benefits to individuals contributing the modest amounts that make up the bulk of COPE collections.

He indicated, though, that COPE will actively explore a mechanism for future campaigns that would allow union members to benefit fully from tax credit provisions of the law.

John A. Penello Takes Seat on Labor Board

John A. Penello was sworn in as a member of the National Labor Relations Board after Senate confirmation of his appointment by Pres. Nixon. Penello was named to a five-year term on the board, succeeding Gerald A. Brown.

The oath of office was administered by Judge Gerard D. Reilly of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Addition of Penello to the NLRB means that the board will continue to be composed of three Republicans and two Democrats. He is a Democrat and the other Nixon appointees—Chairman Edward B. Miller and Ralph E. Kennedy—are both Republicans. Other NLRB members are John H. Fanning, a Democrat, and Howard Jenkins, Jr., a Republican.

Penello began his 32-year career with the NLRB as a trial examiner in Baltimore and worked his way up through the ranks of the agency. He was regional NLRB director in Baltimore at the time of his appointment as a board member.

Updating the Wage Floor

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT, more than any other piece of social legislation, is in desperate need of updating. Its benefits and protections, absolutely essential to millions of America's working poor, have been seriously eroded by the economic policies of the Administration.

The buying power of the $1.60 minimum wage adopted in 1966 has been all but destroyed. Since that time, living costs have risen more than 25 percent. The minimum wage, which was an acceptable floor in 1966, no longer even approaches the federally defined poverty level for a family of four.

There must be immediate, affirmative congressional action to keep American families from being destroyed.

The house congressional hearings, which demonstrated the truth of these contentions, produced H.R. 7130. The Senate committee has not completed executive action on its bill—S.1861. We urge the Senate to promptly report a bill.

The House Rules Committee is stalling on reporting H.R. 7130. We commend the Speaker of the House for his efforts to get the bill reported and urge the Rules Committee to act immediately.

The House bill would immediately raise the minimum wage for most covered employes to $2 and would extend coverage to about five million more workers. Its immediate adoption would be a valuable forward step.

However, as the Ninth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO stated, labor's goals for the Fair Labor Standards Act continue to be:

1. A minimum wage of at least $2.50 an hour.
2. Full minimum wage and maximum hours coverage for all workers engaged in interstate commerce, the production of goods for commerce or affecting commerce.
3. Equal minimum wage, maximum hours and child labor protection for farm workers, as for other workers.
4. The same minimum wage protection for workers in Puerto Rico as on the mainland.
5. A single minimum wage and maximum hours standard for all workers, regardless of age, sex, color or creed.

WHILE THE CONGRESS is considering modest improvements, the Administration is recommending a measure that would undermine the minimum wage, by establishing a special subminimum rate for youth. In his economic report to the Congress on Jan. 27, 1972, the President proposed "revision of the minimum wage system to remove obstacles to the employment of young and inexperienced workers." What the President failed to report is that a subminimum rate for youth would not create any new jobs for young people.

Obviously, some employers would fire older workers, including heads of families, and substitute for them the cheapest labor available—the youths the President would condemn to subminimum wages. That would not increase employment; it would merely rearrange the statistics of unemployment.

The AFL-CIO categorically rejects a subminimum wage for young workers or any other class of workers. In the name of simple dignity and common sense, we demand the Congress update the Fair Labor Standards Act without further delay and send to the President a measure that meets the test of the times.

Fulbright's Stall Jams Funding Of Free World Radio Stations

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE MOST BIZARRE—and terrifying—scenes in Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn's masterpiece, The First Circle, describes a visit to a Soviet prison by a distinguished American, a woman with high political connections.

A group of prisoners are put through a special drill for her benefit, dressed decently, put in a clean cell with an ikon, and told by the police that if they don't perform, zap! They did go through with the charade and the American visitor left with a high opinion of Soviet justice.

What made this sort of thing possible, of course, was the total isolation from the world outside. Once caught up in the toils of Joseph Stalin's terror apparatus, it was every man for himself with no hope of succor, no hope that outsiders would even learn of the situation.

Part of Solzhenitsyn's power comes from his description of how some human beings resisted atomization and persisted in acts of decency.

The prerequisite for running an efficient tyranny—as Aristotle pointed out more than 2,000 years ago—is to destroy this human sense of solidarity, and to convince each victim that he is alone in the face of overwhelming power, that no one cares.

This has become more difficult with modern techniques of communication. It is hard to jam all incoming radio messages, and the spread of the transistor radio and of tape recorders has launched a whole new era in underground communications.

Through Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe, the United States has for almost a generation brought to the peoples of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe the message that they are not alone.

To take but one example, a Soviet Jew signed a petition attacking the appalling Leningrad trials. Thirty years ago he would have dropped this pebble down a bottomless well, but now, the next morning at 2:30, Radio Liberty was on the air with the text of the petition and the names of the signatories.

This man, now in Israel, recalls the sense of triumph as he heard the broadcast: "They (the KGB) can take us now, but our testimony will stand in history."

Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe have reunited these peoples with history. And in view of Sen. J. W. Fulbright that is a capital offense. These radio stations—formerly subsidized by the CIA—will go broke unless emergency action is taken.

BOTH HOUSES of Congress have approved their continuation with overt funding, and there is overpowering consensus that they have done a splendid and non-provocative job in a very delicate area, but Fulbright singlehandedly has been blocking a compromise between House and Senate versions of their appropriation.

Fulbright refused to call a meeting of the House and Senate conferees, obviously hoping that in this backhanded fashion he can quietly destroy what he has called these "cold war relics."

It is a clever move: if he can stall, key personnel will have to find other jobs and the expertise built up over a generation will dribble away. He must not be permitted to get away with it.

No one who reads this column will suffer from this illusion that I believe the United States is perfect, but we Americans have been fortunate.

We have never had to rise at 2:30 a.m. and turn on a radio to learn that we are still members of the human race, that we are still a part of history. We can not allow Fulbright to deprive our brothers of this priceless link with humanity.

Nixon Vulnerable:

Outcome of '72 Election Hangs On Numerous Imponderables

The following is excerpted from "The Presidency: A Critical Choice," by Rex Hardesty in the February 1972 AFL-CIO American Federationist.

ELECTION YEAR 1972 will mark only the second time in this century that a President elected with less than a majority of the popular vote will seek re-election. Harry Truman didn't run and John Kennedy wasn't alive, but ironically, the other one who did run, Woodrow Wilson, did win a second term in 1916—again with less than 50 percent of the popular vote.

When Pres. Nixon was elected in 1968, he barely withstood the late October rush of Hubert Humphrey, giving rise to the remark that Nixon's strength was 3,000 miles wide and one inch deep. And Americans' evaluation of the job he is doing in the White House has steadily dropped, the Gallup Poll says, from an average monthly rating of 62 percent positive in 1969 to 57 percent in 1970 and 50 percent in 1971, indicating Nixon's support is still not deep.

So small was the margin, barely one-half million votes, that elected Nixon that he actually received 2.3 million fewer popular votes in 1968 than in his losing bid in 1960. And while his electoral vote of 302 was a margin of 111 over Humphrey, the switch of just one state, California would have denied him victory and the switch of just 250,000 votes from him to Humphrey in four strategic states would have elected Humphrey.

Since his highwater mark in popularity of November 1969, when he announced the first Vietnam troop withdrawal and before the economy began its disastrous tailspin, Nixon has slumped 19 percent in the public's evaluation of his performance in office. He gets as little as 39 percent of the vote in various hypothetical races against Democratic opponents.

To a degree, the willingness of candidates of every stripe to dive into the 1972 presidential picture indicates the great uncertainty of the race, which nurtures the hope that lightning can strike anywhere on the political spectrum.

The imponderables are indeed numerous:

- The addition of 25 million new voters aged 18-25, the largest expansion of the electorate since women were enfranchised in 1920. While this is not a monolithic group that will vote as a bloc, the sheer force of numbers makes the slightest tilt in preference distinctive.
- The rapid rise and fall among issues judged to turn on the electorate.
- The addition of new 1972 presidential primary states, which offer new opportunities to reach voters.
- The status of the 9.9 million voters who in 1968 supported the specialized candidacy of George Wallace, who is running as a Democrat in 1972 and hinting that he may or may not resurrect his third-party movement later.

Concurrently, the Republican party, already at a disadvantage in 1968, has become more and more of a minority party, with recent registrations swelling the Democrats' nationwide advantage to nearly 2-1.

But while this may be part of the evidence which has drawn droves of Democrats and a pair of Republicans into the political waters against Nixon in 1972, it would be a fatal political mistake to judge 1972's prospects on 1968's standards or on last month's sampling of popularity.

And what has happened to Richard Nixon since 1968 cannot be discounted in considering his electability—even if it is not so easy to evaluate. "No more plastic President, none more open to suggestion and ideas, none more willing to admit mistakes or learn from error, has sat in the White House in recent times," Theodore White said of the newly-elected Nixon in The Making of the President of 1968. "It is only as he learns in the White House, as he reacts to the influences that press and sway him, that he will learn what his vision of America is."

White's prediction proved prophetic, for the first three years of Richard Nixon's presidency has been a sample of government by expediency.

IT HAS BEEN AN ADMINISTRATION in which refusal to "interfere" with the economy during the collapse of 1970 gave way in 1971 to the nation's first peace-time wage-price controls; in which a man who once sought the title of the worlds' No. 1 anti-Communist became a President whose attempts at reaching an understanding with the Communist world will carry him to Peking and Moscow this year; in which the "New American Revolution," including an innovative reform of welfare which would have built an income floor under the working poor gave way in favor of a tax giveaway to big business.

Then in the final year of his first term, this reformed tight-money man requested the biggest peacetime budget deficit in U.S. history.

So by the early days of election year 1972, there was still no clear indication of "what his vision of America is."

Nixon's astute, carefully conceived and dramatically announced combination of contradictions poses for prospective Democratic rivals the problem of entering the boxing ring against a shadow.

But if the Democrats emerge in the coming months with a platform, strategy and campaign which has a real vision of America, they might yet take advantage of what the polls say is a vulnerable incumbent.

In Coming Negotiations:

Unions to Stress Fringe Gains Because of Phase 2 Limitations

SEVERE LIMITATIONS imposed on collective bargaining by Phase 2 controls, will force union negotiators to press hard for contract improvements in non-wage areas to offset the continuing recession and tight job market, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald predicted.

Stronger job security and the right to transfer pensions and other earned benefits from one employer to another are items likely to get increased emphasis "in light of the existing restrictions," Oswald stressed.

He said that "the continually changing regulations of the Pay Board" also pose special problems for unions "trying to do the best possible for their members."

Appearing on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Oswald said the outcome of court challenges of Pay Board and Cost of Living Council rulings hold major implications for future contract bargaining.

"The Pay Board, in its actions, is sitting very heavily on some contracts," he stressed, with the effect that many workers are denied the right to "catch up with the inflation of the last three years . . . and make adjustments in their wages and conditions, just because of the accident of when their contracts expire."

Oswald was especially critical of the Cost of Living Council's definition of "low-wage workers" to be exempted from controls. He pointed out that although Congress had made it clear that "workers whose earnings are below the low-income figures reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics," the Cost of Living Council has attempted to set a much lower figure.

He noted that two years ago, the BLS said that nearly $7,000 a year was needed to support an urban family of four, but "by some crazy arithmetic, the Cost of Living Council attempted to . . . reduce it to $1.90 an hour."

THE $1.90 AN HOUR ceiling, he declared, "isn't even enough to meet the poverty level, and provides nothing at all for payments of social security and other taxes." He said the attempt to set the lower figure seems to be "running in the face of Congress."

By Press Associates, Inc.

MONEY DOMINATION of our election process continues to be a prime obstacle to free and fair elections.

The pressures to limit the money factor in elections have had their impact upon Congress. The 92nd Congress passed the first campaign spending legislation since the 1925 Corrupt Practices Act and it was signed into law by Pres. Nixon.

For all practical purposes, the Corrupt Practices Act had become a dead letter since it contained so many loopholes it was rarely obeyed and never enforced.

In signing the new bill on the last possible day before it would have become law anyway short of a veto, Nixon said the measure was "realistic and enforceable."

If the law is not enforced it is useless and the day that Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler announced the signing, that question was still plaguing reporters. Ziegler was asked whether the Administration intends to enforce the law and he replied, "yes," but nothing more.

Now, the Washington Star has disclosed that "the Justice Dept. has quietly disbanded the only legal unit in the federal government which has experience in enforcing statutes relating to campaign financing."

On top of this, the Justice Dept. says it has no intention of abandoning an 18-year-old policy of not initiating action on violations of the law's reporting requirements. It will act only if requested to do so by the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate.

Says the Star: "The lack of those three crucial elements—expertise, organization and mandate—makes it likely that there will be as little, and possibly less, aggressive monitoring and enforcement of the new law as there has been of the old statute."

In a number of quarters on Capitol Hill there are suspicions that the Administration planned it that way.

The separate Federal Elections Unit within the Justice Dept.'s Criminal Division has been abolished and the entire task of enforcing the law will be in the hands of two lawyers working in the Fraud Division of the Criminal Division.

The law, if enforced, is a major step forward in controlling the dominance of money in the electoral process although by no means the answer. Under the law the total expenditure by a candidate for all forms of advertising—radio, television, newspapers, magazines, billboards and telephone messages—is limited to 10 cents for each eligible voter. Spending on broadcast advertising—TV and radio—cannot exceed 6 cents per voter.

A CANDIDATE can spend the full amount in pre-convention primary campaigns and the full amount, also, in the general election.

Each presidential candidate will be allowed to spend $8.4 million for radio and television advertising after the national conventions. This is well below the $12.1 million spent on radio and TV for the Nixon-Agnew campaign in 1968 and more than the $6.1 million spent for Humphrey and Muskie.

Late in 1970, Nixon vetoed a stronger bill that covered only TV and radio on the grounds that it did not cover all forms of advertising. At that time there were strong charges that the real reason for the veto was that it would undercut the Republicans' monetary advantage in the elections.

This year, in signing the bill, Nixon said in a statement:

"By giving the American public full access to the facts of political financing, this legislation will guard against campaign abuses and will work to build public confidence in the integrity of the electoral process."

Without adequate enforcement, however, the true expenditures will not be reported, the public won't know the facts and money will continue to dominate our elections.

FACING SEVERE LIMITATIONS on bargaining in Phase 2, workers and their unions will press hard in non-wage areas to offset the continuing recession and tight job market, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, predicted on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates Inc., and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

How to Buy:

Exemption of Farm Products Stymies Anti-Inflation Battle

By Sidney Margolius

NOW THAT LIVING COSTS and especially food prices have embarked on a new spiral, the Nixon Administration has retreated to that last fallback of would-be price controllers who rely on wishful gimmicks. Director Donald Rumsfeld of the Cost of Living Council is advising housewives, on the air and in the papers, to "be cost conscious and look for the best buys."

Apparently Rumsfeld was picked for the job of head inflation fighter because he comes with an open mind — uncluttered by any real knowledge of the problem. If he visited the nearest supermarket he would see the women pouring over the meat cuts and prices, shaking their heads and walking away. He's giving advice to the real experts on cost consciousness.

The anti-inflation attempt was lost that day last August when the government announced the price-control program but said it would not include unprocessed farm products.

Meanwhile, livestock producers have reduced supplies by cutting back on pork production and holding back beef cattle for feeding to heavier weights. From mid-January to mid-February alone, the Dun & Bradstreet Wholesale Food Price Index jumped 3.5 percent.

Those discouraged housewives whom Rumsfeld urged to be cost conscious were shaking their heads over such prices as $1.15 a pound for boneless stew beef; $1.69 for round; 99 cents for chuck; 89 cents for pork loin; even $1 a pound for frozen fish.

While one branch of the government has been trying to restrain prices, another branch—the Agriculture Dept.—has been trying to increase them. Agriculture Sec. Earl Butz, the greatest fight promoter of them all, has been urging higher prices and warning farmers that "Eastern consumer interests" are trying to get lower prices.

With Sec. Butz promising farmers he will fight "like a wounded steer" against pressures to reduce food prices, the only control effort the Administration is considering is to allow more imported meat into the country. Most of this is meat from Australia and New Zealand used for hamburger.

At least businessmen and stock market speculators are happy about the Administration's brand of price control. A survey by the First National City Bank shows that the after-tax profits of 932 corporations jumped 24 percent in the fourth quarter of 1971 over a year earlier, and 14 percent over the third quarter.

The fourth quarter, of course, was the first three months of the price control programs.

Here are other buying trends and tips:

Don't get involved in a high rate mortgage of over 7 percent at this time. Mortgage rates are beginning to slide as home-seekers are priced out of the housing market by steep price tags on homes combined with exaggerated mortgage rates.

Some commercial banks also have reduced the interest rate on savings accounts to 4 percent. Higher rates on your savings are available at credit unions and savings and loan associations. Government E bonds, still paying 5.5 percent if held to maturity, also begin to look more attractive in a time of falling rates on bank savings accounts.

BUT IF MORTGAGE VALUES are tip-toeing downward, the prices of the houses themselves are rushing upward. By the beginning of the year the average sales price was $25,900. This is a jump of $2,000 in just 12 months despite a decrease in the equipment and extras provided in new houses this year.

When you shop for new clothes for Easter you will find many garments made from bonded or laminated fabrics. In "bonded" fabrics, the outer fabric is joined by an adhesive to a backing fabric. In "laminated" fabrics (usually used for coats), also popularly called bonded, the outer fabric is joined to a sheet material such as polyurethane foam and then to a backing fabric.

The advantage of bonded fabrics is that they provide their own lining, and also have better crease resistance and shape retention.

But there are problems, too, in that bonded fabrics sometimes separate after a number of cleanings or launderings.

You know the meat price problem. Eggs are still the standout value, with relatively good buys also available in broilers and turkeys, both in heavier supply this spring.

The USDA Food and Home Notes points out that the whole turkey or parts with dark meat are usually a better buy than turkey breasts bought separately. In pork, edible yield from smoked shoulder usually costs about 20-25 percent less than from hams or loins.

Soup to Nonsense:

Good Reasons to Buy Anything And Rest Easy (in Poorhouse)

By Jane Goodsell

DEPENDING ON HOW you look at it, anything is an economy in the long run:

Renting a house: It's a lot cheaper than owning property because you don't have to worry about upkeep and taxes and depreciation and all that.

Buying a house: It makes good financial sense because, at the end of 20 years, you've got something. It's an investment in the future.

A new car: The savings in repair bills and gas will pay for it in no time.

A second car: It's cheaper than taking taxis.

Taking taxis: It's much less expensive than maintaining two cars.

Expensive perfume: When you consider that you only have to use a couple of drops, it's no more expensive than cheap cologne.

An alligator handbag: They last practically forever.

Writing airmail special delivery: It's cheaper than calling long-distance.

Calling long distance: It's less expensive than going there.

A color TV: You'll save money by staying home and watching it instead of going to the movies.

Going to the movies: It's cheaper than going out to dinner.

A new washing machine: It's more economical in the long run than having the old machine repaired.

Sending the laundry out: Actually, when you consider the cost of a washing machine plus soap, water and electricity, it's no more expensive.

Putting in a swimming pool: We'll have so much fun in our own backyard that we won't need to spend a lot of money going away for vacations.

A mink coat: It's a long-term investment because it'll never go out of style.

New Airline Safety Rules Praised as 'Giant Step'

The Air Line Pilots are hailing new safety regulations issued by the Federal Aviation Administration as a "giant step forward" in the protection of passengers and flight attendants.

The new rules update standards on airliners covering the structural design of aircraft, the storage of fuel, cargo and baggage and the design of cabin furnishings and lighting.

Although the regulations will mainly affect the design of future aircraft, the ALPA noted that a number of the rules will apply to airlines now in service.

ALPA Pres. John J. O'Donnell pointed out that beginning May 1 all carry-on baggage must be stowed under the seats or in other authorized locations before takeoff and landing. The new rules also strengthen procedures for the use of seat belts, and the securing of food trays and serving carts.

$27.7 Billion in '71:

Safety Council Cites High Accident Costs

ACCIDENTS COST Americans about $27.7 billion last year, according to preliminary figures released by the National Safety Council.

The council's estimates for 1971 reveal that 114,000 were killed and 10.8 million people suffered disabling injuries as a result of accidents in the United States. Of those injured, 400,000 suffered some degree of permanent impairment ranging from partial loss of use of a finger to blindness or complete crippling.

The total price tag on accidents, the NSC said, includes wage loss of $7.5 billion; medical expense of $3.1 billion; administrative and claim settlement costs of insurance, $6 billion; property damage in motor vehicle accidents of $4.9 billion; property loss in fires of about $2.29 billion; and the indirect costs of work accidents of approximately $3.9 billion.

In the four principal classes of accidents, motor vehicle deaths (55,000) increased by less than one-half of 1 percent; public deaths (21,500) decreased 2 percent; and deaths in the home (26,500) and work (14,200) showed no change from 1970.

A breakdown of statistics in the four accident classes reveals the following:

Motor Vehicle

The death rate per 1 million miles was 4.7, the lowest on record, and a 4 percent decrease over 1970, despite a 4 percent increase in the number of motor-vehicle miles traveled.

Despite the death rate decrease, however, the cost of automobile accidents to Americans was $14.3 billion compared with $13.6 billion in 1970. The 1971 figure includes wage loss, medical expense, administrative and claim settlement costs of insurance and property damage.

There were approximately 2 million disabling injuries last year, about the same as in 1970.

Work Accidents

The death toll as a result of occupational accidents was estimated at 14,200, unchanged over the past two years, the number of disabling injuries, 2.2 million, was comparable to 1970.

The fatality total, excluding agriculture, was approximately 11,900, of which 1,800 occurred in manufacturing industries. Including the loss from business fires, the total cost of occupational accidents was estimated at $8.9 billion.

In addition to the 14,200 workers killed, 41,500 died as a result of off-the-job accidents—bringing the death total to 55,700. Workers injured in both types of accidents numbered 5.3 million.

Home Accidents

In the home last year, accidents were fatal to 26,500 persons, injured 4 million, and cost Americans about $1.9 billion. Falls were responsible for more than one-third of deaths; fires, burns, more than one-fifth; and other types, two-fifths.

Almost one-third of those killed in the home, the council said, were persons 75-years-old or older. Children under five and persons 45 to 64 years each accounted for about one-sixth of the fatalities. The remaining third were between five and 44, and 65 and 74.

Public Accidents

Approximately 21,500 persons were killed in public non-motor vehicle accidents and some 2.7 million suffered disabling injuries, including 60,000 permanent impairments, during 1971. Wage loss, medical expenses and administrative and claim settlement costs of insurance were $1.6 billion, unchanged from 1970.

Falls, again, were a major contributor to fatalities causing about one-fourth the deaths while non-transport drownings accounted for another one-fifth.

Viewing all the accident information, the Safety Council reported that present indications are that in 1971, as in earlier years, accidents were the fourth most important cause of death, exceeded only by heart disease, cancer and stroke, and were the leading cause of death for both males and females 1 to 38 years old.

1-Man, 1-Vote Ruling Undermined:

Gerrymandering Thwarts Fair Representation Battle

The battle for truly fair political representation will not be won until the courts, Congress or the state legislatures act to curb the practice of gerrymandering, according to a trade unionist who has participated in several key redistricting actions in recent years.

David I. Wells, assistant director of the Political Dept. of the Ladies' Garment Workers, writes in the February issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine, that the gerrymandering which already has taken place during the past year "is ample indication that the underlying objective of the one-man, one-vote reform can be largely nullified by boundary line manipulation. . . ."

"The real objective of that reform was not numerical, but political equality. And numerical equality becomes merely a means of achieving political equality," Wells says.

The author notes that during 1971, more than half the states were redistricted in light of the 1970 decennial census. All the rest must do so before the middle of 1972.

"The political air in state after state has been filled with charges of gerrymandering," the article observes. "In every section of the nation, lines have been carved out to benefit some and victimize others."

Gerrymandering means the drawing of district boundary lines in a way that gives one group an artificial, undeserved advantage. In other words, Wells says, it is a way of "stacking the cards politically: a sophisticated—and unfortunately still legal—form of political cheating."

He offers another analogy: "In sports," he writes, "gerrymandering would be equivalent to letting one team rearrange the dimensions of the playing field every few plays. But of course in sports—unlike politics—that isn't allowed."

And gerrymandering, Wells points out, is by no means a partisan vice. "It is used by Democrats as well as Republicans, depending on who is in control in a particular state.

"But regardless of who practices it, gerrymandering is fundamentally wrong because it is a means of prearranging election results—a means of turning decision-making power over to political leaders who carve out the district lines to suit their own purposes."

Legal challenges and political jockeying on redistricting can be expected to continue past the fall elections this year, and this is largely because in the aftermath of the one-man, one-vote decisions, many legal and constitutional questions remain unsettled.

"But unquestionably, the most fundamental of these unresolved matters is what to do about gerrymandering," Wells notes while emphasizing that redistricting developments "to a very significant degree . . . will have a direct effect on every issue which comes before Congress or the 50 state legislatures, all the way from now to 1980."

Wells suggests that the problems of gerrymandering could be overcome both in the courts and by alternative methods of redistricting.

He maintains that the difficulties involved in enforcing court actions against gerrymandering could be circumvented "if the courts would take the same approach toward districting as they have taken toward population inequality."

"The present rule is that a plaintiff challenging an apportionment law on the grounds of unequal population must simply prove that the districts have unequal populations; then, no matter how small those inequalities are, the state must justify them or else they are considered an indication of arbitrary discrimination and the statute is ruled unconstitutional."

If this approach were applied to the problem of gerrymandering, a plaintiff would merely have to point out the existence of a peculiarly shaped district or would have to show that county, town or city boundaries were needlessly disregarded.

There are two other alternative approaches to the districting problem as outlined by Wells: Taking the matter out of the hands of legislators altogether or setting up a model series of strict rules governing the process. Wells suggests that the latter of these two methods would be most effective.

The first of the two proposals he calls the "who" approach, noting that it would minimize "partisan and individual considerations by removing the power to draw district lines from the hands of legislators —who have such an obvious and understandable stake in the way it is employed—and instead turning the power over to a nonpartisan or bipartisan commission."

This step already has been taken in some states for legislative, but not congressional redistricting. Wells views it as a step in the right direction, but says "it clearly has not solved the problem."

For one thing, it has not solved the problem of bipartisan gerrymandering whereby incumbents of both parties are accommodated.

The other method of redistricting—what Wells calls the "how" approach sets up strict rules governing how the lines are to be drawn instead of concerning itself with who draws the lines.

"A model set of such rules would provide that no district may vary in population by more than 1 percent from the state average; that all districts must consist of contiguous territory; that political subdivisions such as counties, towns and cities be kept intact except when their division is required to meet the standard of equal population; that larger subdivisions be divided in preference to smaller ones; that when a subdivision must be divided, as much of it as possible should be kept together and —to guarantee compactness—that the total length of all district lines within the state be as short as possible."

U.S. Tankers Urged for 50% Of Oil Imports

A group of maritime unions told Congress that benefits to the nation's economy would far outweigh costs if the Cargo Preference Act were amended to require that half of all oil imports be carried in tankers flying the American flag.

Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers said a 50-50 shipping requirement for oil imports into the United States would lead to the creation of a modern tanker fleet large enough "to protect our national interest."

Calhoon, testifying for the AFL-CIO Maritime Committee at House hearings, gave this summary of the benefits of the proposed legislation:

Extension of the Cargo Preference Act to oil imports "would assist the U.S. balance of payments problem by reducing the outflow of dollars to foreign tanker companies; it would provide much needed employment to American workers in shipyards and as crews on tankers; it would stimulate other sectors of the U.S. economy, and it would improve the badly deteriorated U.S. tanker fleet."

This could be accomplished, he said, through assistance provided in the 1970 Merchant Marine Act Act "without affecting the price of oil."

The legislation requiring that at least half of oil imports be brought in on American ships also was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and the federation's Executive Council at recent meetings.

Labor Urges New Study Of Metric System Impact

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to hold up legislation to convert U.S. weights and measures to the metric system until there is a better evaluation of the impact on American workers.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson sharply criticized a government study completed last year for its indifference to the costs of conversion, including loss to workers whose tools would become obsolete and the expense of retraining in many fields.

Peterson urged the Senate Commerce Committee to press for a new study by a more representative group than the National Bureau of Standards panel which reported "widespread enthusiasm" for conversion and said the resulting costs should be allowed to "lay where they fall."

Until a more realistic study is undertaken, he said, action should be deferred on a bill by Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) to phase in the metric system over a 10-year period.

Conversion might be desirable, Peterson said. But the decision should be based on full knowledge of the economic impact.

Peterson, who was accompanied by Markley Roberts, an AFL-CIO economist, said "scientists already committed to use of the metric system" should properly be represented on a study panel. But the panel should represent "a true cross-section of American society," including workers, employers and consumers.

A resolution approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting urged Congress to direct a new study by a representative group that would be independent of any government agency.

Such a report, including recommendations to offset costs to workers, "could be a valuable aid for Congress in its deliberations over conversion," the AFL-CIO witnesses testified.

U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE employes at the Washington headquarters were greeted on their way to work by members of the Office & Professional Employes passing out handbills. A number of the 325 clerical workers at the building expressed a desire to form a bargaining unit, OPEIU Local 2 reported.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Rigid Busing Curb

The Senate on Feb. 29 was faced with a choice between two amendments to an education bill dealing with court-ordered busing of children.

First, it defeated a drastic amendment by Sen. Robert P. Griffin (R-Mich.) which would have flatly prohibited courts or federal agencies from requiring busing under any conditions, even to overcome clearly unconstitutional forms of segregation. It then adopted a labor-supported compromise that would substantially limit the use of busing and make it clear that it is not to be required as a means of achieving racial balance or quotas.

On the Griffin amendment rollcall shown here, the AFL-CIO supported the position of the 50 senators who voted against it. Forty-seven senators cast "wrong" votes for the Griffin amendment.

Senate Votes Down Rigid Busing Curbs

drafted by the Senate's Democratic and Republican leaders—Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) and Hugh Scott (R-Pa.).

It would bar the federal government from requiring or funding busing over long distances or to schools where educational opportunities would be "substantially less" than at closer schools. And through the end of the next school year it would stay lower federal court orders requiring busing across school district lines or merger of two or more school districts until all court appeals have been exhausted.

Busing could not be required by federal mandate to achieve racial balance in schools, but school districts could seek and obtain federal funds for busing programs.

The thrust of the Scott-Mansfield amendment is in line with the AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution adopted last month affirming support for busing "when it will improve the educational opportunities of the children" and condemning attempts to create "a divisive political issue out of America's vital need for quality, integrated education."

Throughout the week of debate and see-saw voting, the Nixon Administration remained officially silent on the issue. But the position of Vice Pres. Spiro T. Agnew was made crystal clear when he cooperated with a last-minute maneuver by Sen. Bob Dole (R-Kan.), the GOP national chairman, to put the Griffin amendment back in the bill just before final passage.

The Dole-Griffin forces, expecting to catch several supporters of the Scott-Mansfield position absent from the Senate floor, called up for an immediate vote an amendment incorporating the Griffin language.

In the chair, prepared to cast a tie-breaking vote, was Agnew. According to a United Press International dispatch, "Agnew was rushed from his downtown office through heavy traffic" to be on hand if his vote was needed.

He didn't disclose how he would have voted, but one of the Griffin amendment supporters voiced the generally assumed expectation that "he probably would have voted with us"—a statement no one on the other side disputed.

As it turned out, all but two of the senators who had voted against the Griffin amendment were on hand for the vote and the attempted ambush failed by a hairbreadth 48-47 margin.

The congressional battle was not over, however. A House-Senate committee must somewhow resolve the differences between the strong anti-busing language in the House bill and the more permissive provisions of the Senate bill. And their solution must then be ratified by both the House and Senate.

There are differences also in the two versions of the higher education bill, but both measures extend current programs and authorize at least some expansion and new approaches. The Senate bill, for example, entitles any qualified student to a federal grant of $1,400 a year minus the amount his family is expected to contribute to meet college expenses based on the family's financial ability. The federal grant could not exceed 50 percent of the cost of college expenses.

The companion House provision would raise the present $1,000 maximum annual grant to $1,500 for students with exceptional financial need.

Both bills break new ground by awarding general purpose grants to colleges to use without restrictions. The House bill would base the awards on the total number of students; the Senate version on the number receiving federal scholarships or loans.

Both bills authorize $500 million for the current fiscal year and $1 billion in Fiscal 1973 for desegraation assistance, mostly to use to establish and maintain quality integrated schools.

The Senate measure would require each school district receiving desegregation funds to set up at least one model "stable quality, integrated school."

As in all authorizations bills, the actual amount available would depend on separate legislation appropriating funds for the approved programs. In virtually all education programs, the amount actually appropriated over the years has been substantially less than the ceiling authorized by Congress.

Carelessness on the Job

Retroactivity Ordered On Frozen Federal Pay

More than 260,000 federal employes will receive at least partial retroactive payment of pay raises that were blocked during the 90-day freeze ordered by Pres. Nixon in the first phase of his economic stabilization policy.

A decision by the U.S. comptroller general held that the revised Economic Stabilization Act passed by Congress last December required retroactive payments to these groups of federal workers:

- More than 200,000 employes, both salaried white collar and hourly-paid blue-collar workers, who were due automatic pay step-ups during the Aug. 15 to Nov. 14 freeze period. Their raises were held up until Nov. 15 and the amount of retroactivity is estimated at $7.2 million for salaried employes and $1.5 million for the blue-collar groups.
- An estimated 60,000 blue-collar workers whose pay is adjusted periodically on the basis of wage comparisons with private industry jobs in the same locality.

The workers who will benefit are those at establishments where wage surveys had been ordered before Aug. 15, 1971, but had been held up or had the effective date postponed by presidential order.

In most cases, however, the amount of the increase was trimmed back from the comparability rate to stay within the 5.5 percent Pay Board guideline. The retroactivity that will now be paid to this group is estimated at $5.2 mililon.

There will be no retroactivity, the comptroller general and the Civil Service Commission said, for some 58,000 other blue-collar workers whose pay adjustments would have come due during the freeze period. These workers were in areas where the wage surveys were not ordered until after Aug. 15.

In most cases, the Civil Service Commission said, the date they normally would have received the higher pay was within two or three weeks of the end of the freeze.

In effect, the latter group was treated under the government's interpretation as if the wage adjustment procedure were a newly-negotiated pay raise in private industry rather than a semi-automatic mechanism to keep government wages comparable with private industry rates in the locality.

ILA Achieves Pay Guarantee For Gulf Ports

Galveston, Tex.—Longshoremen and the West Gulf Maritime Association have reached tentative accord on a three-year contract that would mean an increase of $1.50 in hourly wages and the first guaranteed annual income plan for West Gulf dockers in ports from Lake Charles, La. to Brownsville, Tex.

The wage increase is the same as that won by the ILA for New York longshoremen—70 cents an hour the first year and an additional 40 cents hourly in the second and third year of the pact. Basic dock pay is currently $4.60 an hour in West Gulf Ports.

New York dockers, plus those at other East and Gulf Coast ports were scheduled to vote on their agreements March 8. In all, the pacts affect nearly 60,000 longshoremen.

A Taft-Hartley injunction against the East and Gulf Coast strikes expired Feb. 14, but the ILA agreed to work until March 14, in hopes that money and local work rule issues would be settled by that time.

The West Gulf Coast agreement covers longshoremen working on ocean-going vessels. Clerks and checkers in other ILA bargaining units had not yet reached accord.

The first guaranteed annual income provision on the Texas and Louisiana coasts would assure at least 50 weeks pay for a worker who put in full time during the past three years.

The settlement, which means a 15 percent increase in wages during the first year, is subject to Pay Board approval.

Conferees Approve Job Rights Measure

A House-Senate conference agreement on legislation to strengthen the ban on job discrimination won the praise of civil rights leaders—and the opposition of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The bill itself is a compromise. Labor and civil rights groups had to settle for a court procedure that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission can use when it can't obtain voluntary agreement to end discrimination based on race, sex, religion or national origin.

A stronger direct enforcement procedure, similar to that of the National Labor Relations Act, had been urged by the civil rights coalition. But the House had narrowly turned it down and a Senate filibuster wasn't broken until the direct enforcement provision was abandoned.

Nevertheless, civil rights leaders consider the new provision an improvement and the conference committee closely followed the stronger Senate version of the legislation.

The Chamber of Commerce aimed its attack largely at the expansion of coverage provided in the Senate bill and substantially retained in the conference report.

The EEOC's jurisdiction is extended to an estimated 10 million more workers—those employed by state and local governments and workers in firms with 15 or more employes as compared with the present 25-worker cutoff.

The employer organization said it "hoped" the House would reject the conference report and send the bill back with instructions to change the provisions the Chamber of Commerce doesn't like.

The final measure has substantial bipartisan support, however, and is expected to be approved by both the House and Senate.

George Holland Heads Federal Contract Unit

George L. Holland was named director of the Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance to succeed John L. Wilks, who had been appointed Coordinator of Minority Affairs.

Holland started a long career in the federal service in 1945, working a number of years for the Veterans Administration and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. He left the government last year to become a business consultant.

poverty areas was being suspended until 1973 in order to incorporate data gathered in the 1970 decennial census.

The bureau also announced plans to extend the new series to all poverty areas in the United States.

Shutting off the poverty statistics during a presidential election year has drawn sharp criticism from a number of congressmen and from organized labor.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called it part of a move "to politicize the BLS" when announcement of the suspension was made last year.

together to "educate" the public on the need for the legislation.

The companies, which are seeking to enlist other businesses in the effort, have set up a front group called United Transportation Consumers "to arouse Congress" to the need for legislation to "provide for mandatory settlement of management-labor disputes in the transportation industry."

The chairman of the group's steering committee, a lobbyist for a lumber conglomerate, is quoted by PAI as explaining that the phrase "mandatory settlement" is used "simply to avoid the term compulsory arbitration, which is anathema to some people."

The companies that founded the "consumer" organization, all of which report sales of more than $100 million a year, are: Georgia-Pacific Corp., Allied Chemical Corp., Continental Can Co., Dow Chemical Co., E. I. DuPont de Nemours & Co., PPG Industries, St. Regis Paper Co., Union Camp Corp., U.S. Plywood-Champion Papers and the Weyerhauser Corp.

They sent out letters inviting other firms to join at annual fees of $1,000 to $3,000, with a goal of raising a $1 million war chest. But the organization claimed that it did not plan to "lobby" for any particular bill.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting warned employers who have embraced compulsory arbitration proposals that fixing by law terms and conditions of employment will inevitably lead to "price fixing, profit fixing and complete government control."

Labor Blasts 'Repression' In Forced Arbitration Bill

Basic Shift Demanded in Trade Policy

The AFL-CIO called for "fundamental changes" in the nation's trade and foreign investment policies and tore into the Nixon Administration's attempt to make labor the scapegoat for its economic blunders.

House hearings on an Administration bill to raise the price of gold from $35 to $38 an ounce—to carry out an international agreement on devaluation of the dollar—served as a forum for an anti-labor blast by Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, Jr., and a sharp rebuttal by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller.

There was no controversy over the bill itself, only over the claims made in its behalf.

Biemiller said the AFL-CIO supports the legislation but stressed that it will take more than a "stop-gap" increase in the price of gold to revive America's "declining strength" in the world economy and halt the erosion of jobs.

Devaluation by itself, he stressed, certainly won't create 500,000 American jobs—"a figure that was tossed off blithely by the Administration in December" when the international monetary agreement was reached.

Biemiller cited Connally's earlier testimony before the House Banking Committee as an example of the Administration's attempt to shift the blame for the outflow of American jobs and dollars to the backs of workers and their unions.

The Administration's apparent contention, he noted, is that there would be no problem if the American worker "had worked harder and if he had taken home fewer dollars in his pay envelope."

The thrust of Connally's testimony, Biemiller said, was that American workers should emulate the Japanese, take a better attitude toward their jobs and, in the words of the Secretary of the Treasury, not have as their goal "a beer on Saturday night."

This "slur" on American workers "is a habit of this Administration," Biemiller said, and "is simply not true."

He quoted the report of a leading multinational corporation that labor in the United States is "just as productive" as in the most efficient of its comparable plants overseas.

"It is time to stop blaming Americans for the decisions of the Administration, the banking interests and the corporations, which may help their profit sheets

Workforce Drop Trims Jobless Rate

The unemployment rate dropped from 5.9 percent to 5.7 percent in February as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the civilian labor force showed a decline while the number of persons with jobs remained about the same as in January.

On an actual basis, 5.4 million persons were unemployed, the same as the previous month and only slightly less than the 10-year high of 5.5 million reached last July.

The BLS reported that in terms of raw figures, the jobless rate was 6.4 percent.

But even on the basis of seasonal adjustment, which showed a decrease in the ranks of the unemployed to 4.9 million, spokesmen for organized labor and some congressmen suggested that the jobless rate dipped because more workers who have been unable to find employment simply gave up the search.

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger pointed out that the seasonally adjusted figures show a drop of 172,000 in the civilian labor force while unemployment fell by 159,000 and employment was relatively unchanged.

"The truth is that there was no change, no improvement in February," Goldfinger said. He called the drop of two-tenths of 1 percent in the unemployment rate a "statistical quirk."

Sen. William O. Proxmire (D-Wis.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, noted during committee hearings that the civil-

UTU Leader Brands Plan As 'Vicious'

The head of the United Transportation Union denounced compulsory arbitration provisions of the Nixon Administration's so-called Crippling Strikes Act as repressive to collective bargaining and America's democratic system.

UTU Pres. Al H. Chesser had even harsher words for a companion bill introduced by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) which would extend compulsory arbitration to regional as well as nationwide transportation strikes.

He called it "more viciously anti-labor than the original Administration bill," and said it would put shackles on the nearly 180,000 railroad workers his union represents.

"They would have nothing left to do but go to the bargaining table with hat in hand," Chesser told members of the Senate Subcommittee on Labor.

He was accompanied at the hearings by Lester P. Schoene, counsel for the Congress of Railway Unions and an expert on rail labor problems, and James R. Snyder, the UTU's national legislative director.

The delegation voiced support for a substitute bill introduced by the subcommittee's chairman, Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.).

Schoene told the Senate panel that the Williams bill would "destroy the incentive" to call a nationwide strike simply because it would allow selective strikes and mandate partial operation of struck lines when required by the national health and safety.

And it has no provision for compulsory arbitration such as the "final offer selection" clause of the Administration and Packwood bills.

"I believe," Chesser said, " . . . that nearly all members of Congress, including the authors of bills providing for compulsory

Solid Majority Achieved:

Union Growth Soars In Federal Agencies

Unions now bargain for a solid majority of all federal employes, even excluding the postal workers who for years dominated the union statistics in the civil service.

The latest government tally, based on a survey last November, shows a new high of more than 1,038,000 federal employes—53 percent of the total non-postal workforce—represented by unions holding exclusive bargaining rights.

Nearly all of the gain, 113,500 of the 122,000 increase over the previous year, was in the white collar field where the bulk of federal employes work and where union organization has traditionally trailed far behind the postal and blue collar workforce.

The official U.S. Civil Service Commission report lists the 437,586 hourly-paid blue collar workers in units represented by unions with exclusive bargaining rights as constituting 84 percent of the blue collar workforce. The 600,700 employes in white collar bargaining units are 42 percent of the salaried workforce.

Actually, since at least 10 percent of employes are supervisors not eligible for union representation, the percentage of potential organization probably exceeds 94 percent for the blue collar group and 52 percent for the salaried employes.

Postal workers now bargain with the semi-autonomous U.S. postal service and for the first time were not included in the Civil Service Commission tally. They have long been 100 percent organized, in terms of union representation of eligible workers.

The American Federation of Government Employes, representing 606,391 employes in 1,510 units, showed a 75,841 gain over the year and continued to lead all other unions by a wide margin. It held bargaining rights for 383,652 white collar and 222,739 blue collar workers.

In terms of total organization of the non-postal workforce, the 1971 tally continued the upward curve that has marked union organization in the federal service since the Kennedy Administration, when for the first time unions achieved official recognition and the right to negotiate written contracts.

In 1964, the first year for which

R-T-W Suit Rebuffed On Union Tax Status

A federal judge told the National Right to Work Committee that it didn't have a constitutional leg to stand on in its attempt to challenge the tax-exempt status of unions.

Lawyers for the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation sought to get the courts to do what Congress on several occasions has specifically rejected—rule that a labor organization with a union shop agreement loses its tax-exempt status if it engages in any type of political activity.

The suit, brought in the name of a handful of California members of the Machinists and Auto Workers, claimed that use of union funds somehow represents an unconstitutional federal subsidy to political campaigns.

U.S. District Judge Charles R. Richey dismissed the constitutional argument as "obviously without merit." He refused to approve submission of the case to a three-judge panel, which is required when a "substantial" constitutional question has been raised.

He noted that the Supreme Court has considered union shop issues and union political activities in a number of cases and its decisions indicate an unwillingness to interfere with "expenditures by labor organizations for political activities" or to impose "restraint on expressions of political ideas."

Labor Pay Board Vote Keyed to Wage Loss

Labor members of the Pay Board declared that the need to protect more than 56,000 Ohio state employes from a substantial pay loss forced them to vote for a board ruling on an increase that is due those workers.

The five labor members termed the board's action "irrational, inconsistent and petty," but said they were forced to vote for the ruling "in order to protect Ohio state employes from a substantial loss in pay" and not because they thought the action was "fair or just."

The noted that the state employes had not had a wage increase in 15 months.

"It is irrational for the board to apply so rigidly to public employes the pay standard developed for different circumstances which

Keenan Raps Failure To Meet Housing Goal

The AFL-CIO's call for reaffirmation of the national housing goal of 2.6 million new units a year was stressed by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in an address to the 41st convention of the National Housing Conference in Washington.

Keenan, an AFL-CIO vice president and chairman of its Housing Committee, also is a vice president of the nationwide citizens group founded in 1931 to promote slum clearance and decent homes for all Americans.

"We believe," Keenan told the convention, "that a minimum of one million units a year should be constructed for low- and moderate-income families. Achievement of this goal requires many specific actions in areas of legislation—on appropriations, interest rates, land costs and fair housing."

Keenan charted the dismal record of the Nixon Administration in the housing field, stating that "I find it absolutely incredible that we persist in our failure to learn from past experiences."

In 1969 and 1970, housing starts dipped to an annual rate of 1.45 million, although they then rose to an annual rate of 2.5 million last January.

The 1969-70 lows were due to the tight-money policy fostered by the Administration, Keenan said, and he predicted that when businessmen "believe private investment will be profitable again, the pendulum will swing the other way. Credit will flow from residential construction into other forms of private investment and housing starts will swing down again."

"We in organized labor feel that a drastic restructuring of our financial institutions is essential if we are to assure that a continuous and growing supply of credit at realistic rates is available for residential construction," Keenan said.

"The AFL-CIO supports the establishment of an urban development bank. We feel it is a vital adjunct to sound housing policy. A federally funded URBANK should be able to provide long-term loans to nonprofit, quasi-government organizations receiving federal funds and pursuing the public policy in housing and related areas."

Keenan noted that labor also has urged establishment of metropolitan housing authorities which would represent a community-wide approach to a community-wide problem.

"At present," he said, "low- and moderate-income housing is dependent upon a delivery system which cannot fulfill the nation's housing needs."

Government policy—such as closing the loopholes in capital gains—would discourage land speculation, Keenan declared, while noting that "increasing land costs can contribute to a nation's failure to meet housing needs."

He denounced the Nixon Administration, too, for failure to enforce the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

The IBEW secretary was reelected a vice president of the National Housing Conference along with Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who also addressed the convention.

Abel Cites Past Failures:

Labor Voices No Confidence In Nixon Economic Policies

Labor cast a vote of no confidence in the Nixon Administration's economic policies.

An AFL-CIO analysis, prepared for the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, saw "no sign of a significant reduction of unemployment" on the basis of the Administration's latest game plan.

The trade union evaluation was submitted by Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel in his role as chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee.

It accused Nixon and his economic aides of relying on "a simplistic, push-button approach" to management of an economy that is too complex and diversified to be turned around by overall fiscal or monetary policies.

"Unemployment, idle productive capacity, prolonged sluggishness and huge, successive budget deficits" are the result of these miscalculations, Abel charged.

"There is no sound reason to believe that the Administration's forecast for 1972 will be much more accurate that last year's prediction," Abel said. "Wage and salary earners and their families are paying the price for this prolonged economic mess."

The Administration failed to deliver on its "promise of a sharp 1971 upturn from the engineered recession of 1969-1970," the AFL-CIO said. "The actual record for 1971 was the highest unemployment in 10 years; a 4.3 percent rise in living costs; a further decline in industry's operating rate, and a widespread lack of confidence."

Industrial production did not increase at all during 1971, while the real volume of total national output rose only 2.7 percent, essentially in the services and residential construction.

The AFL-CIO noted that "productivity shot up in 1971," cutting in half the increase of unit labor costs. "But the rise in the price level continued, with only little abatement, and the lion's share of the productivity gain went to profits, depreciation allowances and other business income."

The statement pointed out that corporate after-tax profits in the second half of 1971 were 18 percent greater than in the same period of 1970. "This rise in after-tax profits was almost three times faster than the 6.5 percent increase of total wage and salary payments to all employes."

Abel said that the continuing problem of high unemployment "has not been caused merely by a failure of the economy to generate enough jobs for entrants into the growing labor force. The major cause has been large-scale employment declines in 1970 and 1971—primarily in manufacturing and construction."

"Having failed to deliver on its promise of a $90 billion gain in total national output and declining unemployment in 1971, the Administration now forecasts a $100 billion gain in 1972—or 6 percent in real volume—and a drop in the unemployment rate to 'the neighborhood of 5 percent' by the end of the year," the statement continued.

"Even achievement of real economic expansion of 6 percent will make little dent, if any, in the high level of unemployment—due to the expected rapid rise of productivity and growth of the labor force."

The federation said indications are that the prolonged sluggishness of 1971 will continue in 1972. It pointed out that residential construction is probably leveling off, while consumer expenditures—which account for about two-thirds of the total national output—rose at a yearly rate of only 4 percent in the final quarter of 1971. Further, there "is no sign of a forthcoming, major extra boost from consumer spending. With so much idle industrial capacity, only a modest increase of real business outlays for plants and machines is expected."

"Moreover, the Administration's trickle-down policies assure that a major share of any economic expansion in 1972 will go to big business and wealthy families," the AFL-CIO said.

Abel's statement charged that the Administration's tax measures, rather than stimulating the economy, have added to the government's growing financial troubles. "The expected $39 billion federal deficit (for Fiscal 1972) is mainly caused by the loss of $27 billion in tax receipts . . . due to substantial slack in the economy; and high unemployment will add $3.5 billion to unemployment insurance payments." On top of "these kinds of troubles," the Administration added tax giveaways to business—more than $5 billion this year, rising to more than $10 billion annually by the end of the decade.

The AFL-CIO analysis said real unemployment may be one million or more higher than the government reports of 5.4 million jobless. This is because "several hundred thousand people have stopped looking for work, after months of fruitless job search, and are no longer included in the official unemployment count."

"In order to make a significant dent in the high level of joblessness, about 2.5 to 3 million new jobs are required in the next 12 months—a larger employment increase than in any single year of the 1960s."

This would require a 7 percent increase in the total national output for 1972, and a similar increase for 1973 "in order to approach full employment rapidly." The federation's Economic Policy Committee called for "immediate, selective government measures . . . to create jobs, boost sales and lift production—to provide the increasing number of job opportunities for the unemployed and the rapidly growing labor force."

Full Labor Law Coverage Sought For State-Local Public Employes

Three unions representing public employes testified to the need for collective bargaining machinery covering state and local workers as a House Labor subcommittee opened hearings on an assortment of bills.

Subcommittee Chairman Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.) saw "three options" deserving of consideration:

- To cover state and local employes under the existing machinery of the National Labor Relations Act. Thompson has introduced a bill to that effect, but said he was not wedded to that approach.
- To establish a separate federal agency to regulate public employment labor relations, as provided in a bill introduced by Rep. William Clay (D-Mo.).
- To leave the problem to the states, as is the case now, in the hope that the "progressive" rather than the "reactionary" state laws will become the pattern.

Jerry Wurf, president of the State, County & Municipal Employes, put his union firmly behind the Clay bill.

He termed "a uniform and naational law" essential to responsible labor-management relations in the public sector. Existing state laws, he said, are "a shameful hodgepodge."

A federal law is needed, Wurf said, because state and local employes are entitled to "the same kind of rights and protections" given to workers in the private sector through the National Labor Relations Act.

But he argued that creation of "a new and separate agency" parallel to the NLRB is essential because government workers "have no analogy in business and industry."

He proposed that federal legislation include "impasse mechanisms that can deal with most public employe disputes, allowing for the right to strike with certain restrictions where there is in the opinion of a federal court a clear and present danger to the public health and safety."

The Service Employes, representing a substantial public employe membership as well as private industry workers, told the subcommittee that state and local workers should be brought under the NLRB as provided in the Thompson bill.

Richard Liebes, research director for SEIU locals in Northern California, said the conditions that led Congress to set up federal labor relations machinery in the private sector are just as applicable to the public sector.

Where the federal labor law applies, he said, "the dramatic and often violent struggles for union recognition in private employment are things of the past." But too often public employes have "no place to go except into the streets to fight for recognition."

For both "philosophic" and "practical" reasons, he testified, the Service Employes support coverage of public workers under the same ground rules that apply to private industry.

To the extent that proposed separate machinery parallels the existing federal law, the union asserted, "it is unnecessary. To the extent that it differs, it is a potential source of confusion and friction."

Separate labor relations machinery through the Clay bill won the endorsement of the Fire Fighters, however.

Jack Weller, IAFF's research director, said the nonprofit role of public employers has created differences with the private sector that should be recognized.

In the fire service, he said, officers and men work "in close harmony because . . . our lives depend on it" and share likewise the responsibilities of union membership. Under the NLRA, he noted, officers would be excluded.

His union, he told the subcommittee, does not favor strikes because of the "special responsibilities of the fire service to the community."

But unless there are mutually accepted methods for resolving deadlocks and impasses in bargaining, "collective bargaining becomes a sham" without a right to strike.

The time has come, the union urged, "for a common sense federal law for governing the collective bargaining process throughout the states, counties, cities and towns of this nation."

Retail Clerks Post Baltimore Victory

Baltimore—The Retail Clerks made the first breakthrough in organizing department store employes in this areas as a unit of 163 employes at a Hutzler Co. warehouse chose to be represented by the RCIA.

Employes voting in the National Labor Relations Board election cast 84 votes for the RCIA and 70 votes for no union. There were nine challenged ballots.

The organizing campaign was coordinated and directed by Retail Clerks Rep. Larry Sauter. Maryland State Sen. Clarence Mitchell helped distribute union literature at the warehouse gate on the morning of the election. AFL-CIO Regional Director Walter Waddy said Mitchell's identification with the union effort was a significant element in the victory.

'Statistical Quirk':

Discouraged Jobless Cited as Rate Dips

ian labor force has increased every month since last June.

He asked BLS Commissioner Geoffrey H. Moore whether a repetition of the January increase—110,000—would have resulted in the jobless rate staying at 5.9 percent, and Moore agreed that it would.

The February job situation prompted Proxmire to remark that "what perhaps happened is that we had more discouraged workers. Instead of looking for work, they gave up."

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson hailed the February figures as good news.

"As expected," Hodgson said, "when the inflow of jobseekers eased off, the unemployment rate retreated.

"The 5.7 figure for February . . . confirms what we have been saying and strengthens our faith in Pres. Nixon's economic program," the labor secretary said.

But BLS economists have noted time and again that a change of two-tenths of 1 percent in a single month is not significant. The jobless rate has hovered near the 6 percent mark for 15 months.

The civilian labor force declined to a seasonally adjusted level of 85.5 million persons in February and employment dropped slightly from 80,636,000 to 80,623,000.

Although the decrease in the number of job holders was small, it was the first such decrease since June 1971.

The average duration of unemployment jumped sharply from 11.8 weeks to 12.5 weeks over the month—an increase of more than two weeks from February 1971.

The number of people out of work 27 weeks or more totaled 660,000, an increase of 96,000 from January, and the number of those jobless 15 weeks or more rose by 96,000 to 1.3 million.

The BLS said the unemployment rate for white workers edged down in February from 5.3 to 5.1 percent, while the rate for Negroes remained high at 10.5 percent.

Young people as a whole continued to suffer from high jobless rates.

The unemployment rate for those in the 16-19 age group jumped a full percentage point in February, rising to 18.8 percent, and matching previous highs set since World War II, the bureau said.

The rate for men in the 20-24 age group stood at 9.2 percent—although the figure did represent a decline from the rate of 10.4 percent set in the previous month.

Among adult women, joblessness declined from 5.5 percent to 5.0 percent while adult men as a whole showed a drop from 4.2 percent to 4.0 percent.

The jobless rate for married men dropped slightly from 3.0 percent to 2.8 percent, marking the third straight decline and the lowest rate for married men since the summer of 1970.

Among Vietnam-era veterans in the 20-29 age group, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate fell from 8.5 to 7.4 percent.

Most occupational and industry groups showed decreases in unemployment during the month with the exception of construction where the rate jumped from 9.8 to 10.3 percent.

Manufacturing employment edged up by 16,000 to 18.6 million, but was still 60,000 less than a year ago.

The average workweek for rank and file workers increased by two-tenths of 1 hour to 37.2 hours.

Average hourly earnings of nonsupervisory production employes remained unchanged at $3.54, but the extended workweek sent gross weekly earnings up by 35 cents to $130.27.

JOURNALISTS representing 12 countries interview AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the federation headquarters during their two-week visit to Washington sponsored by the World Press Institute. The group also met with governmental, political and social leaders.

Labor Dept. Rules for Employers On Pay During Safety Checks

Workers lost another round in the battle for effective enforcement of the federal job safety law as the Occupational Safety & Health Administration decided that employers don't have to pay wages to employes who accompany compliance officers in workplace inspections.

Assistant Labor Sec. George C. Guenther, who heads OSHA, concluded that Mobil Oil Corp. did not discriminate against workers when it refused to pay them for the time spent during regular working hours for a "walkaround" inspection.

George H. R. Taylor, the AFL-CIO job safety specialist, charged that this is another instance in which the Labor Dept. is attempting to weaken the effectiveness of the law and flout the intentions of Congress.

Although the Labor Dept. admits that a representative of the workers must be given an opportunity to accompany a federal inspector, it backed Mobil's contention that the company did not have to pay the employe because he was not performing his regular job while assisting the inspector.

The case stems from a complaint filed by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers who charged that Mobil discriminated against its workers—which is forbidden under the act—in refusing to pay workers participating in a federal inspection of the Paulsboro, N.J. refinery.

Guenther said he based his decision on an opinion by Labor Dept. Solicitor Richard F. Schubert. The opinion, the Labor Dept. said, "concluded that walkaround time is not compensable working time under the Fair Labor Standards Act."

Taylor said the ruling is a "serious blow" to all but the strongest of unions and further limits the safety law protections of unorganized workers.

It also abrogates the provisions of the federal law which Taylor said clearly specify that "employers and employes have separate but dependent responsibilities and rights with respect to achieving safe and healthful working conditions."

He further noted that the act calls on labor and management to improve working conditions and to encourage efforts to reduce injuries and diseases on the job.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron said that "when an employer can withhold wages of a workman exercising this right, and the government supports the employer, the worker is clearly inhibited against exercising his rights."

Union efforts to protect workers are adversely affected by such actions, Grospiron stressed, "and even greater handicaps are placed on unorganized workers.

He noted that the case involved two workers from a large OCAW local, which was able to reimburse the workers for the wages they lost during three weeks of intensive inspection of the plant when about 260 hazardous conditions were found.

"But in the case of a small local union, the cost would have been a serious matter," he said. "And what of the unorganized workers who have no union treasury to turn to when they are denied wages while exercising their rights under the law?" Grospiron asked.

"In view of the picayunish small fines Mr. Guenther's office is assessing employers who violate the law, we may find a situation in which it costs workers more money to complain than it costs employers to violate the law," he observed.

The Labor Dept. contended that "some cases where discrimination is alleged" on holding back wages for walkaround inspections should be handled through the grievance provisions of collective bargaining agreements.

Labor Members Vote to Protect Ohio Workers in Pay Board Case

prevail in the private sector," the labor members said in a statement.

The Pay Board staff insisted that the increase comes to 10.6 percent, but labor members disagreed, placing the increase at 9.3 percent.

The exact size of the cutback will depend on how the state implements the board's order which gives two alternatives:

The state can give the employes a 7 percent wage increase for the 12 months starting last Nov. 14, the day the wage-price freeze ended, or it can delay payment of the entire increase until mid-March. The increase was due Jan. 1.

The board said the formula was a special accommodation to the state administration and to the Ohio General Assembly which meets biennially, to allow them to go ahead with the increase structure they have developed.

The delayed effective date for the boost would yield the same dollar-value increase as the 7 percent spread over 12 months beginning last Nov. 14.

It was the first time the board had acted on a wage settlement involving public employes and the ruling was passed by an 8-5 vote.

The five business members of the board opposed the measure as "too liberal."

But the labor members of the board maintained that in the first place the increase only amounted to 9.3 percent.

"As a catch-up with the cost of living, it was clearly approvable under the board's own standards," labor members said. "The board's action is clearly inconsistent with its own standard for raises."

The statement from the labor members pointed out that state employes in Ohio have no legal right to bargain over wages and are prevented from striking by the Ferguson Act, which provides fines and jail sentences for engaging in a work stoppage.

In the past, Ohio employes have been victimized by administrations that attempted to balance the budget at their expense, the statement said.

"This year, after careful deliberation, Gov. John J. Gilligan, (D) and the Ohio legislature made amends at least to the extent that their pay would be raised to levels paid for similar work by government agencies in bordering states.

"Taxes were voted and are being collected to pay for the increase."

In other action, the board exempted from its guidelines pay increases for employes of some firms doing business with the federal government and the earnings of professional athletes from playoff games.

For employes of firms doing business with the government, the Pay Board said it would not control certain wage increases which might be required under such federal laws as the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contracts Act.

For professional athletes, the board exempted the earnings paid players who win the right to participate in the World Series, the Super Bowl and other all-star or playoff competition.

But the panel reached no decision on what kind of controls it might implement for the regular season salaries of professional athletes in team sports or for individuals such as golfers or prize fighters.

The Pay Board was asked by player representatives from the National Football League and the National Basketball Association to exempt professional athletes from the wage and salary guidelines that apply to other workers.

Arbitration Chair Goes to Schmertz

New York—Eric J. Schmertz, a labor arbitrator and impartial member of New York City's Office of Collective Bargaining, was named the first recipient of the American Arbitration Association's J. Noble Braden Chair for the Development of Labor Arbitration. Schmertz will work as a consultant to AAA in planning and executing special programs.

J. Noble Braden was a full-time officer of the AAA from its inception and was the directing head of the organization from 1952 to 1957.

Court Rejects R-T-W Suit on Tax Exemption

Furthermore, the judge said, "it is clear that the income of labor organizations is not the profit-oriented type of income which an income tax was designed to reach."

Ironically, the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund, which financed the suit attacking the tax-exempt status of unions, raises money from employers by solicitation letters declaring that contribution to the fund from business corporations "are tax deductible as charitable gifts."

The "right to work" suit was technically brought against the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. But the court granted the Machinists and the UAW permission to intervene in the case as co-defendants. Attorneys Plato E. Papps for the Machinists and Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., for the UAW presented the union arguments in the case.

The Political Season Opens

FROM NOW THROUGH the end of June there will be a presidential primary election of one kind or another nearly every week somewhere in the nation.

Each will be preceded by campaigns of various intensity and quality. Each will be followed by great gulps of punditry, analysis and curbstone wisdom.

The rules on the presidential preference polls and selection of delegates vary so wildly and widely from state to state that some critics have dismissed them as useless, misleading and an ineffective way of conducting political life in the country.

Granted the irrational maze of the primaries and the preference polls, augmented by conventions of various sizes and shapes, caucuses from the precinct to the state level and the various other devices that have brought confusion to the 1972 elections—there are some important saving graces.

The voters will be exposed to a great deal more discussion, information, arguments and candidates than in past elections. This may bring about an aversion, or perhaps cast a pall on political activity. But it falls within the basic democratic ideal of allowing a wide range of views and ideas to be presented in the political marketplace before the choice is made.

There is a sound basis for belief that a greater knowledge of the issues, the records, the candidates will result in a wiser choice of nominees for president, senator, governor, congressman and the thousands of state and local offices.

It would be more efficient perhaps, and more rational, to have a more orderly method of selecting candidates. But this is the system we must live with in 1972 with all its irrationalities and confusions, bordering on chaos in some instances.

THE TRADE UNION MOVEMENT has a simple objective in the next few months—to help select the best possible candidates for all offices and then to help elect those that meet the programs and policies of organized labor.

That means a concerted effort to help assure the maximum labor delegate strength at the national conventions and the state or congressional district conventions, where they are scheduled.

It means a sharp and positive role in bringing to the attention of trade union members, their families and friends, the records of the candidates, their stand on issues of importance to labor and the nation.

It means getting workers and their families and friends registered to vote and out to the polls on primary day, or out to the caucuses and conventions, etc.

It means raising the funds—dollars for COPE— to finance educational activity and to help with registration and vote drives.

Maybe in 1976 the primary system, the candidate selection and evaluation approach, may be less confusing, less involved and will focus more clearly on major issues and major candidates. But the problems of the 1972 election are here and now and it's time to get to work so that the November balloting will bring a new progressive era in American poltical life.

Self-Determination for Taiwan Lost in Post-China Visit Shuffle

By John P. Roche

IF ANY HARD NEWS came out of the Sino-American communique, it was that Pres. Nixon has retained his traditional "One China" policy, but shifted Chinas.

Instead of arguing the preposterous position that Taiwan is China, Mr. Nixon has come around to accepting the mainland as the locus of Chinese sovereignty. The "Two Chinas" policy that liberals advocated for a generation was literally sunk without a trace, ironically by the same man who gave us the leather back in the '50s for adopting it in the first place.

Now it is one thing for Nixon, who is quite possibly the most masterful opportunist to occupy the White House since Franklin D. Roosevelt, to shift gears on China in terms of his definition of American national interest.

It's a definition which doubtless includes his re-election as a prime component. (This is said without malice: I have known a lot of "statesmen," and I have yet to meet one who has not identified his own functions with the national interest. In short, discussions of this sort always have an autobiographical flavor.) However, it is something else when alleged men of principle follow silently in his wake.

What brought this to mind was a story in the Times which gave the views of notable American experts on Asia on the President's Taiwan position. Since—as I have pointed out here on several occasions—the status of Taiwan has not impressed me as one of Chou En-lai's major preoccupations, the story made fast reading.

Then came the last paragraph: "The scholars interviewed were unanimous in stating that the United States declaration—that it did not challenge the concept of 'One China'—is the death sentence for Taiwanese independence movements."

For the benefit of those who have not followed the debate over American policy towards China, it should be noted that an integral component of the liberal position has long been some form of "self-determination for the Taiwanese people."

The argument ran that the Taiwanese, who comprise some five-sixths of the population of the island, were the victims of the authoritarian Chinese Nationalist regime which took refuge there in 1949. I recall Sen. George McGovern delivering a strong speech to this effect at an Americans for Democratic Action meeting, and there were proposals that Taiwan should be put under United Nations authority until a plebiscite could be held to determine who should rule.

NEEDLESS TO SAY, just as Mao and Chiang Kai-shek were in full agreement in 1962 that India was stealing Chinese territory along the Himalayan frontier, Peking and Taipei shared a common distate for the Taiwanese independence movement.

This is no place to get into the merits of the historical argument except to note that the Chinese unite behind the view that the Taiwanese are an ethnic Han category, while the Taiwanese argue that they are at least as distinct as, say, the Koreans. But whatever the truth may be, the American liberals argued for "self-determination": let the people of Taiwan freely determine their future.

Nixon has been attacked by, among others, William F. Buckley, Jr., for, in effect, "selling out" Taiwan, that is, repudiating the "China" that in right-wing mythology was still the Middle Kingdom.

Curiously, up to now I have seen no complaints about what I take to be the far more serious offense, at least from the liberal perspective: that he has silently dispatched the principle of self-determination.

It is particularly odd that the high prophet of self-determination, Sen. Edward Kennedy—who has been breathing fire on Ulster, Bangladesh, and, earlier, Biafra—seems to have overlooked the Taiwanese. Similarly we have heard nothing on the subject from the once eloquent George McGovern. I await their comments with interest.

Bayard Rustin Says:

Nixon Stand Against Busing Undercuts Integration Progress

UNTIL THIS YEAR, the response of much of the South to the 1954 Supreme Court decision decreeing an end to segregated schools was typified by Jackson, Miss. For 15 years Jackson's school board and the community itself hid behind a self-erected wall of massive resistance, filing suit after suit against desegregation orders and employing every stalling technique at their disposal.

Then, last summer, the Jackson School Board designed a voluntary desegregation plan which was submitted to the federal courts and ultimately approved. Despite the fact that the formula called for extensive busing, the plan met with approval from both black and white leaders.

There was a fundamental reason for its appeal to both races, for, in addition to busing, the plan called for the construction of two new, modern, educational parks, facilities needed by the community and clearly designed to enhance the educational environment of all children.

Beyond this, Jackson officials were led to believe by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare that the federal government would finance a large share of the busing.

The Jackson plan is an ambitious attempt not only to integrate the schools but to improve the learning atmosphere for both black and white students. As with all ambitious social plans, it costs money, more money, perhaps, than the city can afford without federal assistance.

Whether the Jackson plan or similar plans in Austin, Greensboro and many other cities can ever be completely implemented is now open to question.

This past summer, at Pres. Nixon's prodding, the federal government announced that it was opposed to the allocation of federal funds for desegregation plans which involved busing.

Instead of having integration presented as an attractive social objective which can improve the educational opportunities of both races, the South is in effect being told that integration will further impinge on the already weak financial resources of its cities.

The President has gone to great lengths to exploit busing during this election year. He has repudiated the judgments of Warren Burger, his own appointee as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, who wrote the decision which affirmed the constitutionality of busing as one tool of integration.

He has overruled and embarrassed his own Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and nullified much of the effort to devise workable integration plans.

The President's actions have inspired anew those waiting in the wings to serve in the vanguard of any movement which hopes to thwart black aspirations.

And he has misled much of the public, including many who have sincere, deeply-felt reservations about busing, by denouncing "busing for busing's sake" when in fact no court has ever ordered busing except when it was the only means available to bring about integration.

The consequences of these actions are eloquently described by Jonathan Yardley, a southern journalist.

"He (Nixon) by implication, encourages the South in a disrespect for a law that had steadily waned in recent years," Yardley writes.

"The South has come, however slowly, to understand that the law must not be tampered with for political expediency, and it has committed itself to obeying it dutifully. For the President of the United States to imply that it can be evaded is unconscionable, and a disservice to every southerner who is working earnestly for racial peace."

The President and his supporters like to boast that in the realm of foreign relations Nixon rises above partisan politics and takes on the mantle of statesmanship.

THE CONSEQUENCES of presidential guidance in this area are clear: China, once looked on as an implacable Cold War enemy, is now accepted as a member of the community of nations and is currently exerting an inuflence on everything from women's fashions to eating habits.

We witnessed the consequences of the same type of presidential leadership in the area of race relations during the 1960s. Black people made significant social and economic progress during this period, progress which was accepted by the majority of whites.

We will not enjoy the same type of progress until our leaders have the political courage to once again affirm their commitment to racial progress and social justice.

Without Tax Increase:

Prospects Bright for Solid Hike In Social Security Benefits

CHANCES LOOK GOOD for a substantial increase in social security benefits this year, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said on a network radio interview.

Although Congress may not approve the full benefit boost urged by the AFL-CIO—15 percent across-the-board retroactive to Jan. 1 of this year and another 10 percent Jan. 1, 1973—Seidman predicted the raise will be much better than the "terribly inadequate" 5 percent Pres. Nixon asked for. Congress ought to be able to clear the measure well within the July 1 timetable, he added.

Appearing on Labor News Conference, Seidman said that the recent call for a 20 percent benefits increase by House Ways & Means Chairman Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.) has added considerable strength to the drive. Mills "has a reputation in the field of social security which is perhaps unmatched by anyone in the entire Congress," Seidman said, and his recommendation carries a great deal of "prestige."

Seidman rejected the contention that a sizable boost of social security benefits "would be inflationary," stressing that "by and large, social security beneficiaries are people at very low incomes."

He pointed out that "the incidence of poverty among the elderly is more than twice as great as among the rest of the population," with more than 20 percent of the elderly falling below the poverty level "as defined by government standards."

"The average social security benefit is presently so low that 26 percent of all the retired beneficiaries—47 percent of single retirees—are poor," he declared.

Seidman also chided Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, Jr., who said that it would be unwise for Congress to increase benefits 20 percent this year. Connally had claimed that benefits have been rising faster in recent years than the cost of living.

"Even if this is true," Seidman observed, "it still hasn't brought social security benefits up to an adequate level that permits the elderly to live in the comfort and dignity they deserve." He noted that retired workers have earned the right to a decent living status on the basis of the contributions they made to the nation during their working lives.

ORGANIZED LABOR is vitally concerned, he stressed, that "they're still not up to an American standard of living—and that's the thing that counts."

Seidman said that basing social security financing on "more realistic assumptions," as Mills and study commissions recommend, would make the improvement possible without increasing social security taxes.

Questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced interview were Theodor Schuchat of the North American Newspaper Alliance and Robert Barr of Fairchild publications. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN PRES. NIXON signed the compulsory arbitration bill aimed at West Coast dock workers after an agreement had been reached voluntarily, Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson called it a "symbolic" gesture. For labor leadership, it was a "gratuitous insult."

In effect, the President was unnecessarily slapping at organized workers when his gesture had no practical importance. The strike was over.

What came out of it, however, was perhaps more important. It was a long step backward in what has become a crucial struggle to maintain free collective bargaining in the United States.

What is at stake in legislation now before Congress is whether more than 4 million American workers in the transportation industry, through their unions, are to have the right to negotiate freely with their employers or whether they are to be compelled to accept contracts that have been forced upon them through government intervention.

Free collective bargaining clearly does not have the same meaning for the Administration as it does for organized labor. Despite Hodgson's claims that the Administration is all in favor of collective bargaining, the harsh fact is that its solution for ending strikes that it doesn't like is a form of "compulsory" bargaining that is the exact opposite of free bargaining.

The dictionary makes this clear. No one needs to go to it to know what "free" and what "collective" means. That leaves "bargaining." The definitions for that are equally clear. "To bargain" is "to negotiate over the terms" of an agreement or contract. "To negotiate" means "to confer with one another so as to arrive at an agreement." And "to agree" means "to settle upon by common consent." The key word, of course, is "common consent."

No matter what semantic devices are used, the words "common consent" cannot possibly be stretched to include the kind of legislation that the Administration is seeking in Congress. When Hodgson spoke before the annual seminar of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service early in January, he tried to tell us that the Administration was really trying to make "collective bargaining work better, rather than throwing it out."

But, his idea of not throwing collective bargaining "out" was to impose a "final offer selection option" upon the disputants.

The Hodgson argument that his version of "collective bargaining" is necessary is based on the ancient "national emergency" concept. Yet, time after time commissions which have studied so-called "national emergency" strikes have come to the conclusion that their impact on the national economy has been relatively small.

ONE OF THE FACTORS in the current legislative debate that has astonished labor leadership has been the willingness of powerful management groups to go for it. Yet, the "final offer selection" approach to be imposed on both labor and management can be a two-edged sword.

The President is given the power to name the three-man board of arbitration to hear the parties and "resolve the issues." The power to name the board is a highly subjective one that is bound to be influenced by a President's general philosophy in labor-management affairs.

No one needs to be told what kind of a board the Administration would name; the "loading" of the Cost of Living Council, its Pay Board and Price Commission with Administration and business spokesmen is sufficient commentary.

In any event, the proposed Nixon legislation simply would open the way to making collective bargaining in a wide area of national life a political football. It would be utterly destructive of the very concept of "free collective bargaining" no matter what fancy semantic devices are thought up.

"By common consent." Congress should mark these words. Any other consideration would be destructive of the rights of free men.

Albert Pledges Vote Soon on Minimum Pay

House Democratic leaders pledged "top priority" to minimum wage legislation and prodded the Rules Committee to clear a bill that would raise the pay floor to $2 an hour and expand coverage to millions of additional workers.

Speaker Carl Albert (Okla.) and Majority Leader Hale Boggs (La.) held a joint news conference to stress the need for the legislation as a means of expanding purchasing power among the working poor and "create the jobs which the Administration talks about but does not produce."

The bill was approved by the House Labor Committee last November but Rules Committee Chairman William M. Colmer (D-Miss.) has refused to clear the legislation for the House floor.

Albert said the Democratic leadership will exert its influence to get the bill to a vote within a month and predicted that Congress will pass it, despite the opposition of the Nixon Administration to many of its provisions.

This may be the last year House leaders will have to do public battle with a conservative Rules Committee chairman.

Colmer, 82 and a veteran of 40 years in Congress, has announced that he will retire from Congress at the end of this session. Next in line for the chairmanship, based on committee seniority, is Rep. Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.), 80, a veteran liberal.

Meanwhile, the Senate Labor Committee which has already held hearings on wage-hour improvements, is expected to move ahead with a companion bill without waiting for the House to complete action.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting pressed for quick congressional action on Fair Labor Standards Act improvements.

It said the $1.60 wage floor set in 1966 "no longer even approaches the federally defined poverty level for a family of four."

Maritime Union Opens Talks on New Contract

New York—The National Maritime Union has opened negotiations for a new contract covering unlicensed seamen aboard 350 tankers and dry cargo vessels operating from East and Gulf Coast ports.

Pres. Joseph Curran led the NMU negotiators in the initial talks with the 70 companies which are represented by two management committees. The current three-year contract expires June 15.

Because of the drastic decline in U.S. merchant ships and seamen's jobs in recent years, Curran said the union will emphasize job protection and benefits in the talks.

"The union is fully aware of the problems and pressures on U.S. flag shipping companies," he noted, but stressed that "we expect the companies to understand the problems and needs of seamen."

"We hope to be able to move these negotiations to a quick and successful agreement which will serve the interests of all concerned. We have given assurances, as have all maritime unions, that there will be no stoppages during the period of negotiations," Curran said.

Meany Presses Funding For Radio Free Europe

Continuation of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty is essential "as long as captive peoples are denied the truth," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Funds for the broadcasts to Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have been blocked by refusal of Senate conferees to consider House-approved funding for the coming fiscal year. Meanwhile, interim financing has expired.

Meany denounced Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D-Ark.) and other committee members blocking the legislation for "thwarting" the will of the American people. Fifty-three senators have introduced a resolution calling for continued funding.

Fulbright has termed the two broadcasting stations "cold war relics" and Meany retorted that "truth is not a cold war relic."

Meany said "it would be more than tragic if the last story carried by these voices of freedom and democracy was the story that democracy failed to gain an open and prompt vote on a program supported by a majority of Americans and their representatives in Congress."

Laborers Local Sets Up Legal Aid for Members

Columbus—A new legal aid program was launched by Laborers Local 423 for its 2,600 members and their families in several mid-Ohio counties.

Patterned after a similar pilot program that another Laborers local has been operating in Shreveport, La., the Columbus plan will provide legal advice and representation by lawyers without direct cost to the members. The expenses will be paid by the legal service fund established by the local.

Most of the legal problems that might confront a union member are covered by the plan, the union said. Local officials noted that members will most often seek assistance in the area of consumer, debtor-creditor, landlord-tenant and domestic relations.

Thomas J. Arconti, regional manager for the Laborers, said the program is designed to meet the needs of legal representation for moderate-income workers. He noted that the rich can easily afford to retain top lawyers and the poor generally can depend on government-supported legal programs—but these workers were without adequate legal counsel.

This factor was the prime reason for the local's venture into prepaid legal services, the union said.

Local 423 Business Manager John Scales said that in the past, "our members have not obtained legal services they have needed because they first don't know how to contact an attorney and also because they are fearful that they can't afford a lawyer."

"As a result," he observed, "they have too often allowed their problems to go by default, thus forfeiting their legal rights. Under our plan, we hope to correct that situation."

Unlike the Shreveport plan, the Columbus plan is being funded entirely by the local. The prepaid Shreveport program is sponsored by the Shreveport Bar Association and has also received financial grants from the American Bar Association and the Ford Foundation.

The Columbus-based local has set up a special office to handle the legal services program. It will retain staff attorneys and law firms, with additional assistance coming from consultants, paraprofessionals and law students.

Members and their dependents will be able to consult freely with lawyers, the union said. They are also entitled to approximately 80 hours of legal representation each year beyond the consultation stage.

The local said it will conduct seminars and meetings to familiarize members with the plan, to promote preventive law by educating members about their rights and to avoid legal pitfalls.

But when members do run into legal problems, the plan will provide a full range of services, the local stressed.

At Trade Policy Hearings:

Connally Slur Seen Bid for Scapegoat

but do not benefit Americans," Biemiller declared.

And it is time, he urged, for Congress to tackle the root causes of the outflow of jobs, capital and technology by passing the Burke-Hartke bill.

"The promises of the past have not been kept and the hopes for a fully-employed, dynamic, healthy economy in a more prosperous world of nations have been dashed by the realities of unemployment at home and worsening problems abroad.

"It is time for the policymakers to look at the world outward from the United States, with policies and practices based on the well-being and productive base of a strong United States economy," the AFL-CIO testified.

Under the Burke-Hartke bill, Biemiller noted, the President would have the authority to supervise and control outflows of capital "in terms of the well-being of this economy and U.S. employment."

Back in 1967, he recalled, the AFL-CIO called attention to the problem of U.S. firms locating plants just across the Mexican border to assemble products to be shipped back to the U.S. market.

Government spokesmen at the time, he reminded the committee, "said that the program was tiny, with 4,000 workers in Mexico and 30 plants. They said no jobs would be lost."

Just recently, Biemiller said, the Federal Reserve Bank in San Francisco reported that the program has already grown to 40,000 jobs and 300 plants—"an export of U.S. jobs by the tens of thousands."

The same tariff law loophole, Biemiller noted, has led to the transfer of assembly operations to Taiwan, Hong Kong, Japan and other nations where wages are low. The result has been fewer jobs in the United States at a time of recession.

The technological outflow, through patent and licensing agreements, has brought money into the coffers of U.S. corporations. But, Biemiller said, the price has been paid in lost jobs. Manufactured products the United States used to export are now being imported.

While devaluation of the dollar may bring some improvement in the U.S. trading position, foreign nations are able to offset its impact by manipulating their own exchange rates and managing their economies, Biemiller cautioned.

Meanwhile "the Administration, giant U.S. banks, multinational firms and foreign governments are blindly playing a brutal money game that is hurting the U.S. economy, harming U.S. citizens and threatening the employment and standard of living of millions of Americans."

IN AN EFFORT to woo more U.S. companies to France, the French Industrial Development Agency produced this map showing a vast number of major American firms with manufacturing operations there. The AFL-CIO has charged that the growing trend of U.S. firms shifting their operations overseas has had a severe impact on the jobs of American workers. Labor supports enactment of the Burke-Hartke Foreign Trade & Investment bill as a realistic and workable approach to the problem.

Antitrust Settlement:

ITT Hearings Bare New Influence Mess

A still-unraveling tangle of political influence exerted by one of the world's biggest corporations held up Senate confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as Attorney General and threatened the Nixon Administration with a damaging scandal.

The corporation involved is International Telephone & Telegraph—known in the business world as ITT. It is a multinational conglomerate that controls hundreds of companies throughout the world, many of them large enough to have a string of subsidiaries of their own.

Its holdings in the United States include large companies and chains that are household words in such diverse fields as insurance, homebuilding, small loans, car rentals and hotels.

It has powerful friends in high places. And it has a Washington lobbyist who wrote an indiscrete memo to her boss that found its way into Jack Anderson's syndicated column.

It clearly linked a Justice Dept. decision to settle three antitrust suits against ITT—on terms acceptable to the conglomerate—to a reported offer by the ITT-controlled Sheraton Hotels to kick in up to $400,000 to the cost of the Republican National Convention in San Diego.

It named John Mitchell, who recently resigned as Attorney General to direct Nixon's re-election campaign, and key White House aides as people who "are helping us" and it warned that publicity about the cash offer would be detrimental to negotiations for settlement of the antitrust cases.

In a series of fast-moving developments:

- Kleindienst, who had once written a letter indignantly denying any involvement in the ITT case, admitted having had a series of private meetings with a director of ITT, and arranging for him to meet further with the Justice Dept.'s antitrust chief, Richard W. McLaren, now a federal judge.

Kleindienst told the Senate Judiciary Committee he merely "set in motion a series of events by which Mr. McLaren became persuaded that he ought to come off his position" against settlement of the case on ITT's terms.

- A New York investment banker who was commissioned to prepare an independent report for the Justice Dept. on the settlement of the ITT antitrust suits admitted he was hired by White House assistant Peter Flanigan and the report was submitted to Flanigan to pass on to McLaren. Earlier, McLaren had told the Senate Judiciary Committee that he did not "recall" having spoken to Flanigan or anyone else at the White House about the case.

- The lobbyist whose memo kicked off the investigation was hospitalized in Denver for a heart condition while the Judiciary Committee was seeking to subpoena her as a witness.

Her Washington area doctor flew to her bedside and then, in an unusual appearance before the Judiciary Committee that left the senators astounded, testified that his patient "drinks excessively" at times, takes tranquilizers and sometimes is "irrational."

The doctor, whose testimony was challenged by the Denver physician attending Mrs. Dita Beard, admitted to the committee that he had conferred privately with an aide to Kleindienst both before and after his trip to Denver.

- Not until the next day was it learned that the physician and his wife had both been under investigation for Medicare fraud and the government recently dropped the charges against the husband.

Kleindienst conceded to reporters that he knew about the fraud charges before the doctor testified but had not informed the Judiciary Committee of the fact.

- The Sheraton Corp., which had not denied the report of the $400,000 subsidy to the GOP convention during the several months it was widely reported, announced that its offer was "only" $100,000 in cash with an additional $100,000 in matching funds if needed.

The Judiciary Committee found itself somewhat embarrassed by the perfunctory unanimous endorsement it had given to Kleindienst before the latest round of hearings. But it was evident that a number of senators planned to take a close second look at the nomination.

THE REAL ISSUES of the '72 election campaign are Pres. Nixon's shoddy record on economic matters and the credibility of his Administration, COPE Director Al Barkan tells the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention in Pittsburgh. To Barkan's left are State AFL-CIO Pres. Harry Boyer and Executive Vice Pres. Michael Johnson.

TV 'Advocates' To Air Issues of Multinationals

Labor's case for regulation of the foreign operations of multinational corporations will be heard over the Public Broadcasting television network on The Advocates—a program presenting both sides of controversial issues.

Broadcast days and time for the hour-long program vary from city to city. But the network and many of its stations will transmit it at 8:30 p.m. on Tuesday, Mar. 14. Local educational TV stations should be checked for dates and times in each area.

Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, will be the guest advocate for regulation of the multinationals to help check the loss of U.S. jobs, capital and technology to low-wage areas of the world. He will call as expert witnesses Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and Stanley Ruttenberg, a private economist who is a former Assistant Secretary of Labor and earlier was director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Arguing against regulation will be UCLA Prof. Howard Miller, who witnesses will include Commerce Sec. Peter G. Peterson.

Election Task Stressed By Pennsylvania Labor

Pittsburgh—Organized labor in Pennsylvania set its priorities for the year with the Nov. 7 presidential election at the top of its list.

The 2,165 delegates to the four-day convention of the state labor body took action on 140 resolutions, 25 of which dealt with consumer rights and legislation.

No-fault auto insurance received strong emphasis, along with regulation of imports, federal insurance of pension plans, improved education and a clean environment.

In other convention action, the delegates unanimously adopted a resolution calling for the legislature to pass, without further delay, a bill amending the state's anti-injunction law to restore its original safeguards patterned after the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

On the political front, the convention heard addresses by two Democratic presidential candidates—Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey who addressed the delegates in person, and Sen. Edmund S. Muskie who spoke via a special phone hook-up from Washington.

National COPE Director Al Barkan told the delegates that nothing is more important to all local unions than the November election.

Barkan warned the delegates not to be sidetracked by "phony issues" in the presidential race, such as school busing and racial hate.

The real issues, he insisted, are Pres. Nixon's record and his credibility.

While Nixon promised full employment and a cutback in inflation in 1968, unemployment has climbed from 3 million persons to almost 6 million, Barkan observed.

Inflation has cut 15 percent off workers' paychecks in real income, "and it's going up, up and up That's a real issue," he declared.

Under Nixon's wage-price controls, profits increased 25.3 percent in the fourth quarter of 1971 while wages climbed only 4 percent.

"Do we need any more proof of the fraud committed on the American people by this program?" Barkan asked.

The convention also heard Gov. Milton J. Shapp who thanked the state labor body for endorsing his administration's no-fault auto insurance proposals. The governor also told the State AFL-CIO that he is going to set up a state fund to insure pensions, "regardless of what happens to the companies."

Shapp also said he is pressing for a constitutional amendment, to be voted upon in the primary election of 1973, which would permit a graduated income tax in the state.

State Sec. of Labor & Industry Paul J. Smith brought word to the delegates of the newly passed workmen's compensation benefit bill. Under the bill, compensation for the loss of a limb is increased from 175 weeks to 335 weeks, and the weekly benefit is raised from $60 to $95. Smith pointed out that the new bill, for the first time provides coverage for agricultural workers and for the privilege of having some voice in the selection of physicians.

In other convention action, Robert T. McIntyre, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers' official from Scranton, was elected to complete the unexpired term of Earl C. Bohr who recently retired as treasurer. In addition to McIntyre, 39 vice presidents of the state labor body and six auditors were elected by the delegates.

Forced Arbitration Bill Termed 'Repression' in Senate Testimony

arbitration, would agree that any form of compulsory arbitration is, at least to some degree, repressive of our traditional free enterprise system and, specifically, repressive of freedom to contract.

"I think it follows that . . . members of Congress would prefer that solutions to disputes over rates of pay, rules, and working conditions in the railroad industry, and every other industry, be found through collective bargaining, rather than through compulsory arbitration—no matter how it may be disguised."

Organized labor historically has opposed such intrusions into the collective bargaining process by government, and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has told Congress that the federation is "unalterably opposed to any legislation which would deny freedom to workers and management by imposing compulsory arbitration."

More recently, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that compulsory arbitration of labor disputes in transportation industries can lead to "price fixing, profit fixing and complete government control."

On the House side, a Commerce subcommittee recently voted to kill the forced arbitration bill, but the legislation is still alive in the Senate. The full Senate Labor Committee will consider it Mar. 17.

Chesser emphasized to the Senate subcommittee that compulsory arbitration has not worked in those countries that have put it into effect such as Australia and New Zealand.

"In fact, strikes in those countries are at an all-time high," he pointed out. "Contrast their experience to that of this country where more than 100,000 collective bargaining contracts are negotiated every year.

"The time lost due to strikes last year was one-fourth of 1 percent, less time than is devoted to coffee breaks."

Chesser's union was one of those on strike last year. It closed down a number of carriers on a selective basis, a tactic upheld by federal courts after railroads had attempted to force the UTU into a nationwide strike, thus paving the way for congressional intervention.

He told the Senators that the bills now before them are based on the premise that whenever there is a national railroad dispute, a nationwide strike is considered an "intolerable national emergency."

But, he said, last year's selective strikes demonstrated that they are not only legal, but that they can be conducted in a fair and responsible manner.

Chesser noted that the UTU went one step further during the strikes, by making it known to the carriers, to the White House and to the Labor Dept. that it was "ready at all times on the struck railroads to perform any service necessary to protect the national safety and health."

"But we were never called upon to perform any such service since probably such a limited partial operation would not be profitable."

"But we were constantly ready to conduct such operations, and we think that the railroads as public service institutions should likewise be prepared to carry on such operations even if they are not profitable."

Pottery Workers Win Syracuse Unit

Syracuse, N.Y.—The Pottery Workers union has been recognized on the basis of a card check as the bargaining agent for a unit of 690 employes of the Syracuse China Co.

The victory for the union climaxed the fifth organizing campaign at the plant. It was under the overall supervision of Pottery Workers Rep. Harold Hackett and representated a coordinated effort on the part of the union and the AFL-CIO.

AFL-CIO Organization Director William L. Kircher wired congratulations to Pottery Workers Pres. Lester Null at union headquarters in East Liverpool, O., noting that the victory was a "great accomplishment and the culmination of a carefully programmed and effectively executed organizing campaign."

Education Bill Threatened:

House Action Clears Job Rights Measure

The House moved in opposite directions on two major civil rights issues.

It approved final passage of a bill strengthening the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission by a 303-110 margin, clearing it for the President's signature.

But it voted 272-139 to instruct its conferees to hold firm for a rigid busing ban in an education bill and to oppose the more flexible language adopted by the Senate.

The Senate version would bar the government from requiring busing solely to achieve racial balance, prohibit busing to inferior schools or over excessively long distances, and hold up court orders requiring busing beyond school district boundaries until all appeals have been exhausted. But it would permit school districts to seek and obtain federal funds for busing programs.

By contrast, the House-passed bill would flatly ban the use of federal funds to bus students for desegregation purposes even if the money were requested. And it would hold up all court-ordered busing until appeals were exhausted.

Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) of the House Education & Labor Committee warned the House that the rigid instructions to conferees threatened to kill the entire higher education bill. But the House majority heeded the political advice of Rep. Joe D. Waggoner, Jr. (D-La.) who warned that a vote against instructing the conferees would be interpreted by constituents as saying: "I like busing. I'm for it."

On the Equal Employment Opportunity bill, the House resisted a lobbying effort by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to return the legislation to conference. The employer group was unhappy at the expansion of coverage to an estimated 10 million more workers—employes of state and local governments and workers in firms with 15 or more employers as compared with the present 25-worker requirement. The compromise enforcement procedure taken from the Senate bill, although more cumbersome than the "cease and desist" authority urged by labor and civil rights groups, also was an improvement over the strictly "leave-it-to-the-courts" procedure originally adopted by the House.

On the final approval vote, however, only a hard-core group of northern conservatives voted with most southerners against passage.

The Senate, meanwhile, opened debate on a labor-supported bill to establish a national voter registration program for federal elections. The bill, sponsored by Sen. Gale W. Gee (D-Wyo.), would allow potential voters to register by mail and would establish a standard 30-day residency requirement.

In a letter to all senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller expressed labor's strong support, declaring: "The present hodge-podge of federal, state and local laws applicable to registration and voting is both unfair and undemocratic and results in arbitrarily denying far too many eligible Americans the right to register and the right to vote."

Opponents, including most Republicans, were lining up behind a motion by Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.) to sidetrack the bill by referring it to the Judiciary Committee. It was approved last year by the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, which McGee heads.

Earlier, the Senate approved with little debate legislation extending basic federal housing programs an additional three years, and consolidating a number of previously separate grant programs under an allocation formula based on population, poverty and overcrowding.

Two Republican-sponsored anti-labor amendments, which had been defeated in committee, were withdrawn before coming to a vote in the full Senate.

One would have eliminated the Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage requirement from federal housing construction. The other would have permitted the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to void portions of union contracts for all federally-financed construction.

A bill to raise the national debt limit passed the Senate by a 53-29 vote, but the House rejected a Senate amendment that would impose a spending ceiling for the fiscal year starting July 1. This sent the measure to a House-Senate conference committee.

In a somewhat related area, 11 liberal Democrats in the House announced plans to introduce a package of tax reforms if Pres. Nixon, as expected, ignores the request of Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) to submit loophole-closing tax proposals by Mar. 15.

A substantial bloc of House Democrats has served notice of opposition to the next raise in the debt limit—expected to be needed in June—unless tax loopholes are closed.

The sponsors estimated that their proposals would yield an additional $7.25 billion a year in revenue to the government.

'I Used to Look Like This!'

Longshoremen Approve Pact By 3-to-1 Vote

New York — Longshoremen at East, South Atlantic and Gulf Coast docks ratified a new three-year contract increasing wages by 15 percent the first year and 32.5 percent over the span of the agreement. An ILA spokesman said the vote ran about 3-1 in favor of ratification.

The dockers were voting on the same money package in most ports and on local issues that varied from port to port.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason said it was the toughest contract the union had ever negotiated and that he was confident the increases could be justified before the federal Pay Board on the basis of increased productivity.

In the Port of New York, including northern New Jersey port cities, a total 14,264 votes were cast—9,761 for ratification, and 4,434 against the new contract. There were 69 void ballots.

In only one major port—Baltimore—longshoremen rejected the contract outright by a vote of 1,787-158. Local leadership had recommended that members reject the pact because, they said, it is "regressive."

Gleason said Baltimore negotiators would return to the bargaining table. Local officials said the men would continue working at least until the current contract extension expires Mar. 14.

The wage increase amounts to 70 cents an hour in the first year of the contract with additional increments of 40 cents in each of the two final years. The basic dock wage currently is $4.60.

Union Growth Soars In Federal Agencies

Civil Service Commission figures are available, the 230,500 employes in exclusive bargaining units represented a mere 12 percent of the non-postal workforce.

By 1967, the number had grown to nearly 630,000 and represented 54 percent of the blue collar employes and 21 percent of white collar workers.

In 1969, white collar organizations nearly matched the number of blue collar workers represented by unions—416,700 to 426,100. But on a percentage basis, the figures represented 29 percent of salaried employes and 72 percent of hourly-paid workers.

Cutbacks in blue collar employment held down the numerical gain in organized workers but the percentage continued to rise to 81 percent in 1970 and 84 percent last year.

The white collar growth continued both numerically and as a proportion of the workforce, rising to 487,245 and 35 percent in 1970 and above the 600,000 level to 42 percent as of November.

Although full breakdowns of the union representation tallies of the dozens of unions holding bargaining rights at one or more government agencies are not yet available, the data on the larger units show that AFL-CIO affiliates continue to represent a substantial majority of the organized federal workforce.

In addition to the AFGE, the principal bargaining agent in the blue collar field was the AFL-CIO Metal Trade Councils, representing 61,046 workers. This was more than any non-affiliated union in the blue collar area of government. An additional 31,100 workers, also nearly all blue collar, were represented by the Machinists in separate agreements.

Two unaffiliated unions with mixed white collar and blue collar membership shared in the big gains in the white collar field. The government tally showed the National Federation of Federal Employes representing 106,881 employes, mostly salaried, for an over-the-year gain of close to 30,000. The National Association of Government Employes posted a 14,450 increase to 83,000, and for the first time represented more white collar than blue collar workers.

In all cases, the number of employes represented by unions is greater than the number of union members since there is no union shop in the federal service.

Part of the gap is made up by the fact that additional thousands of union members are employed at federal establishments where no union has yet won exclusive bargaining rights and some workers hold cards in unions other than the one that bargains for their unit.

Drive Urged to Notify Jobless Of Added Aid

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson to require state unemployment compensation agencies to inform jobless workers of the extended unemployment benefits enacted by Congress late last year.

"Failure by the states to inform unemployed workers about the extended benefit program is depriving thousands of jobless workers of extended unemployment compensation benefits Congress meant them to have," Meany said in a letter to Hodgson.

He cited the experience in Florida where the state individually notified workers who exhausted their benefits. He said that Florida, as a result, "has had significantly more applications from—and benefit payments to—unemployed workers than other states in the same area which failed to follow this procedure."

Meany noted that state AFL-CIO organizations have informed him "that many jobless workers have failed to apply for extended benefits because they were not informed of their potential entitlement. . . .

"Since experience clearly demonstrates the effectiveness of individual notification in implementing the extended unemployment compensation benefit program according to Congressional intent," Meany concluded, "we urge you to take immediate steps to require all state agencies to follow this procedure."

Kennedy Charges Health System Enriches Doctors for Patients' Ills

The present system of health care in America is arranged so that "the sicker you get—the richer the doctors get," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) charged in a speech to the Women's Democratic Club in Washington,

He told his audience, however, not to blame the doctors because they are "strapped into the system."

An ideal system of health care, Kennedy said, would reward doctors for keeping their patients healthy.

When asked if health care would be an issue in the presidential campaign, he answered, "only if the people get concerned" about it. "The trouble with health," Kennedy added, "is that you never think about it until you get sick."

Asserting that sickness itself is enough of a liability, he declared that quality health care is a basic human right that is recognized in every industrial nation in the world except the United States.

Kennedy and 24 other senators are sponsors of the National Health Security bill backed by the AFL-CIO.

The Massachusetts senator also lashed out at the lack of quality controls in the present health care system noting that the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, an organization that readily admits it exists solely for the benefit of doctors, accredits only 53 percent of the nation's profit making hospitals, while fully 85 percent of them are eligible for Medicare payments.

Major health insurers such as Blue Cross and Blue Shield, he added, are frequently run by boards controlled by physicians and hospital administrators.

"They are organizations clearly intended to protect the interests of doctors and hospitals," Kennedy charged, "not those of consumers."

He termed the Administration health proposals, along with the American Medical Association's closely aligned plan, "sadly deficient."

Both plans refuse to regulate the insurance industry, he said.

Kennedy also made reference to close ties the Administration has to insurance industry magnate W. Clement Stone, who contributed heavily to Nixon's 1968 election campaign.

Pay Board Dock Pact Vote Tied to Political Maneuver

Litho Union, Bookbinders Merger Set

Members of the Lithographers & Photoengravers and the Bookbinders overwhelmingly approved the merger of the two unions to clear the way for the creation of the Graphic Arts International Union.

The formation of the new union becomes effective next Labor Day, uniting 70,000 IBB members and 60,000 from the LPIU.

The merger agreement adopted by the conventions of the two unions last fall was ratified in separate mail balloting.

The IBB affirmative vote was by a margin of 79.5 percent, with 24,775 for and 6,372 against. The LPIU vote was 69.4 percent in favor of merger—27,669 for and 12,057 against.

LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown will be president of the new union and IBB Pres. John Connolly will be executive vice president under terms of the merger agreement.

The LPIU was created on Labor Day 1964 by merger of the Amalgamated Lithographers of America and the International Photo Engravers Union. That was the first merger of unions in the graphic arts in half a century.

Brown said his union since its merger in 1964 "had considered it not as unique, but as a forerunner of what all of us hoped—namely a merger among all graphic arts unions."

Connolly forecast the newest merger would be "a giant step towards one printing trades union, which should be the ultimate goal of all workers in the printing industry."

'Unholy Alliance' Charged by Labor

By Tom Castor

An "unholy alliance" between business and public members of the Pay Board conspired to cut back the West Coast dock settlement "to set the stage for permanent legislation robbing employes in all transportation industries of their right to free collective bargaining," labor members of the board charged.

"It is clearly a political maneuver," the labor members said of the board's action reducing the terms of the Longshoremen & Warehousemen's strike settlement with the Pacific Maritime Association.

"It is no coincidence that the Pay Board has engineered nullification of the longshore settlement just as the Senate Labor Committee has scheduled a hearing on the Administration's bill to impose compulsory arbitration on all transportation industries."

Labor members of the board represent not only the AFL-CIO, but the Auto Workers and the Teamsters as well, and the three groups have been united in their opposition to any cutback in the ILWU settlement.

All three joined with the ILWU in sponsoring full-page newspaper advertisements in the Washington Post, the New York Times and the Los Angeles Times urging acceptance of the West Coast dock agreement by the Pay Board. They based their argument on a 138 percent increase in productivity by West Coast longshoremen in the past 10 years.

The Pay Board's labor members refused at a news conference to comment on whether the settlement cutback would send the dock workers back on strike, pointing out that

Labor Asks Expansion in Public Jobs

An expanded public service jobs program was urged by the AFL-CIO as a key ingredient of manpower legislation being shaped by a Senate subcommittee.

"Training without job opportunities for those trained is a con game producing social dynamite," Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young testified.

With unemployment still at high levels, he warned that "it's time we all stopped pretending that the private economy can find jobs for everyone, including the hard-core unemployed. It just can't."

Young and Julius Rothman, president of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, urged the Senate panel to reject the Administration's revenue-sharing proposal to turn over manpower funds and programs to the states with little federal supervision.

'Russian Roulette':

Noted Mediator Hits Nixon Disputes Plan

Veteran labor mediator Theodore W. Kheel called the Nixon Administration's proposals for dealing with disputes in the transportation industry "compulsory arbitration at its worst."

Kheel told members of a Senate Labor subcommittee that they should ignore the so-called Crippling Strikes Act because there is no need for it.

"Our experience in the last 25 years indicates that the government is stronger than any union or employer and does have the capacity to deal with these problems," Kheel said.

"There is no generic formula you can come up with that will give us the protection we all want that will not do more harm than good," he said.

The Administration has proposed empowering the President to end strikes in the railroad, airline, longshore, maritime and trucking industries by giving him a series of permanent options.

One of these is called "final offer selection" and authorizes the President to appoint a three-man panel that would impose a settlement by picking between the final offers of labor and management without modification.

"Since a choice must be made," Kheel told the Senators, "the selection may not be the most reasonable, but the least unreasonable."

"This is compulsory arbitration at its worst," Kheel declared.

"This is not the way, in my judg-

Chavez Assails Nixon On Farm Union Case

Delano, Calif.—The United Farm Workers have launched an all-out counter-attack against what the union charges is an attempt by the Nixon Administration to destroy the fledgling organization.

The latest Administration move would subject the union to restrictions of the Taft-Hartley Act while continuing to deny farm workers any of the benefits or protection guaranteed by federal labor laws, UFW Director Cesar Chavez declared.

Chavez charged that the action against the Farm Workers is the latest in a long series of anti-union policies followed by Pres. Nixon.

Among these he listed the "packing" of the National Labor Relations Board with pro-management members, the appointment six months ago of Peter Nash as NLRB general counsel, the Administration's efforts to pass anti-labor legislation and Nixon's economic policies.

"When the Administration imposed controls on the economy," Chavez said, "the first thing it did was to freeze the wages of farm workers while exempting agri-

Federal Funds Called Vital to School Equality

The federal government must take over a major part of the financing of America's schools if equal educational opportunity is to be achieved, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany sharply criticized the report of a presidential commission on school financing which proposed to put virtually the entire burden on the states.

He termed the proposal a rationalization for continued federal inaction and said the commission had dutifully given Pres. Nixon "exactly the kind of report which it was created to produce." (Text, Page 4.)

Meany noted that "from the time he first took office, Pres. Nixon has made it clear that he does not want the federal government to play a significant role in school finance."

The argument for shifting the chief financial responsibility from cities and counties to the state government is that this would close the gap in resources and school quality between the "rich" and "poor" areas of the state.

"But it totally ignores the fact that the states themselves have unequal financial resources," Meany said.

"If it is immoral for children within a state to have unequal educational opportunity, then it is just as immoral for children of one state to have more limited educational cultural corporations from price control over the food for our tables."

Aerospace workers have had their negotiated settlements cut back substantially, Chavez observed, but there are no controls on profits and "half-hearted" policing of prices.

Since Nixon appointed three of the five members of the NLRB, Chavez said, "we have watched this board abuse our union brothers. We watched them kick Textile Workers around in the South; we watched them frustrate Steelworkers in the North; we watched them help employers duck unionism in retail stores in the West."

Chavez reported that Nash as NLRB general counsel ruled Mar. 8 that the UFW is subject to NLRB jurisdiction, and the following day the board sought a federal injunction to prohibit the union from engaging in boycotts.

Nash's unilateral decision came despite previous rulings—both on the regional and national level—that UFW is not a "labor organization" within the meaning of the Taft-Hartley Act because the union only represents agriculural workers who are specifically exempt from the act.

"As late as Mar. 15, 1971, we received an NLRB letter confirming that UFW is not covered by the act," Chavez said. "Nothing has changed since then in terms of our union membership. Only the composition of the NLRB has changed."

The UFW blamed the Republican Party at its highest levels for this sudden reversal of NLRB policy.

The union is urging all UFW supporters to write or wire Sen. Bob Dole, chairman of the Republican National Committee, protesting "the Republican Party's lawless use of the NLRB to deny Farm Workers the benefits and protections of the law while imposing upon them all of its restrictions and penalties."

The NLRB request for an injunction against UFW will be heard in U.S. District Court in Fresno, Apr. 6.

In a letter to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Chavez wrote: "We want you to know that we are not going to take this latest Nixon union-destroying action lying down. We are going to fight this Republican contrivance.

"It is strictly political and we only know one way to fight back when political contrivances are aimed at our throat.

"We are going to tell everybody we can—not just in the labor movement, but in this nation—that poor people don't get a break, that union people don't get a break, but that only the rich and the powerful such as ITT get a break under the Nixon Administration."

Federal Funds Called Key to Equal Schools

opportunity than the children of another state," Meany stressed.

Actually, he noted, half the commission signed a dissenting opinion by John Fischer, president of Columbia University's Teachers College that said federal funding is the only means to achieve genuine equality of educational opportunity. Meany found it strange that an apparent 9-9 tie vote was interpreted as adopting the report.

The commission was headed by Neil H. McElroy, chairman of Procter & Gamble and Secretary of Defense in the Eisenhower Administration. Meany noted that in preparing its report, the commission "solicited the views of the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, but made no effort to find out the views of the AFL-CIO whose 14 million members pay taxes to finance the schools and whose children are pupils in those schools."

He pledged the AFL-CIO to "continue its effort to bring about a major federal participation in financing public elementary and secondary education and in guaranteeing equal educational opportunity to children, wherever they may live and whatever the wealth of their parents and their neighbors."

Max Zimny Named Top ILG Counsel

Max Zimny has succeeded Morris P. Glushien as general counsel of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Glushien, who had been the top legal officer of the ILGWU for 25 years, retired Mar. 1.

Zimny joined the union in 1958 as a staff lawyer and in 1960 became assistant general counsel. He was named associate general counsel a few years later. Before coming to the ILGWU, Zimny had been assistant general counsel of the Textile Workers Union of America.

Senate Probe Continues:

ITT Influence Mess Reaches Inner Circles of White House

By David L. Perlman

The strong smell of political scandal spread from the Justice Dept. to the inner circles of the White House as the Senate Judiciary Committee continued to probe the influence of a multi-billion dollar conglomerate on the Nixon Administration's antitrust policies.

ITT, the business world's shorthand for the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. empire, was the target of three antitrust suits—including one that would have forced it to give up a highly profitable insurance company subsidiary.

The suits were dropped and a settlement acceptable to ITT was reached after another of its subsidiaries had agreed to pay up to $400,000 of the cost of bringing the Republican National Convention to San Diego—the city where Pres. Nixon said he wanted it held.

With a great show of indignation, the Administration and ITT deny any connection between the money offered and the antitrust case—despite a memo by an ITT lobbyist clearly linking the two. Her boss failed to follow the closing admonition of the memo to "Please destroy this, huh?"

At immediate issue is whether the Senate will confirm Richard G. Kleindienst to be Attorney General of the United States.

Kleindienst, as the second-in-command of the Justice Dept., approved the out-of-court settlement after a meeting with a top official of the corporation, which controls hundreds of companies throughout the world including a number of U.S. firms big enough to have strings of subsidiaries of their own.

John Mitchell, who recently resigned as Attorney General to direct Nixon's re-election campaign, admitted to the Judiciary Committee that he had discussed the Administration's antitrust policies on a number of occasions with the president of ITT and one of its directors. But he claimed that he had removed himself from consideration of the antitrust cases against ITT because his former law firm represented one of its subsidiaries.

Testimony before the Senate committee clearly pointed to presidential assistant Peter Flanigan as the key link in the maneuvers that led to the dropping of the antitrust cases against ITT.

It was Flanigan who picked the "consultant" who prepared a report for the Justice Dept. that warned of dire financial consequences if ITT were forced to divest itself of its insurance company holding. And by Mitchell's own account, he had "very often" discussed antitrust matters with Flanigan although, he insisted, never on specific cases.

With Flanigan emerging as the key figure, the White House faced a difficult choice. It could feed suspicion by invoking the President's "executive privilege" to avoid having Flanigan testify. Or it could subject him to the probing questions of Democratic senators sniffing an influence-peddling scandal that could seriously damage the President and his party.

ITT Pres. Harold S. Geneen, who has a home in the exclusive Key Biscayne resort where Pres. Nixon has a residence, apparently found few doors shut to him whenever he wanted to discuss antitrust matters with top Administration officials.

An ITT spokesman acknowledged that Geneen has personally met on antitrust matters with the Secretaries of Treasury and Commerce as well as the Attorney General and with a host of White House presidential advisers, including Flanigan. But any meetings with Nixon were strictly social, the company insisted.

A story in the Baltimore Sun reported, however, that "highly reliable sources disclosed that on at least one occasion Geneen urged a friend of Nixon to intervene directly with the President to seek a favorable settlement of the antitrust case. This contact never was made, it was explained, only because ITT was able to make progress through other channels."

Republicans lashed out in two directions in an effort to get the ITT political monkey off their backs.

Kansas Sen. Bob Dole, the Republican National Chairman, summoned a press conference to "demand" that the Justice Dept. investigate the extension of credit to the Democratic Party by the telephone company. (Despite the similarity of names, the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. which runs the phone system is not connected with ITT.)

His "accusation" stems from the fact that the Democrats have a $1.5 million phone bill left over as part of the debts from the 1968 campaign. Any further extension of credit, he fumed, would be an illegal corporate contribution to a political party.

As it turned out, the Democratic National Committee had already agreed to pay cash in advance for the convention telephone service. And futhermore, the Republican National Committee had not gotten around to pay its 1968 phone bill until last December, even though it certainly couldn't claim poverty.

Republican members of the Judiciary Committee then took up the cudgel, expressing indignation at press coverage of the hearings.

Sen. Marlow W. Cook (R-Ky.) charged the press generally with "total and complete irresponsibility" and complained specifically about the New York Times, Washington Post and Washington Star.

Sen. Hiram L. Fong (R-Hawaii) protested "non-objective headlines."

And Mitchell joined in by protesting that "a number of good people involved in these hearings have been slandered by the reporting in the American press."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) countered that if anyone had been slandered, it was the ITT lobbyist whose memo had touched off the investigation. He noted that witnesses brought in to discredit the memo had charged that she drank to excess and was sometimes irrational.

If there were any supporting documents in Mrs. Beard's files, the Senate committee won't get a look at them. The ITT admitted having destroyed documents in her office and other offices with a paper-shredding machine after the text of the memo appeared in Jack Anderson's newspaper column.

ILO to Explore Economic Problems Caused by Multinational Companies

Geneva—The Governing Body of the International Labor Organization has agreed to call a world conference to consider the social and economic problems raised by multinational corporations.

The conference, initiated by worker members of the ILO's metal trades committee, is scheduled for October.

It will explore the impact that runaway companies have on the level and conditions of employment in their home countries when they move their production to nations with lower labor standards.

And it will consider what "appropriate" measures the ILO can take to insure that the standards protecting trade union rights and free collective bargaining are respected in the nations where the multinational firms set up shop.

The ILO's role in promoting human rights was praised by the new secretary general of the United Nations, Kurt Waldheim, who addressed the Governing Body of the UN specialized agency during his first visit to Geneva since taking office.

The former Austrian diplomat particularly applauded the ILO for having played a "consistently positive role in the social field by its development of important standard-setting conventions."

Worker, government and employer delegates on the 48-member Governing Body, or executive council, joined in crediting George P. Delaney, former AFL-CIO international affairs representative who recently died, as having been a major driving force in securing the adoption of the ILO convention abolishing forced labor.

Rudolph Faupl, Machinists international representative who succeeded Delaney in 1958 as U.S. worker delegate to the ILO, described him as a man with a heart that "beat double when it came to giving his energy to the cause of the common man."

Joseph Morris, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, served notice on the employer delegates that the workers would press the 1973 ILO general assembly, the annual conference of member states, to adopt a convention setting out minimum standards on the granting of paid educational leave to workers so that they can improve their positions.

Also on behalf of the workers group, Cyril T. Plant of the British Trades Union Congress called on the ILO to disseminate widely without delay all information already collected on the threat of cancer to workers without awaiting the 1973 conference.

In other action, the Governing Body approved a temporary cutback of $7,750,000 in the ILO's program because income risks falling short of the $35-million in expenditures budgeted for this year.

Labor 'Advocates' Curbs:

TV Debate Focuses On Multinationals

"Multinational corporations have the power to push around nations. If we do not regulate them, they can run or ruin us."

That opening statement by Gus Tyler set the theme for a nationally televised debate over labor-backed proposals to regulate American-owned corporations that have established manufacturing and assembling operations throughout the world—but most commonly in nations where wages are lowest.

Tyler, who is assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, was the guest "advocate" on the Public Broadcasting Service's weekly program, The Advocates.

His expert witnesses were Paul Jennings, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Economist Stanley Ruttenberg, former Assistant Secretary of Labor and the first research director of the AFL-CIO.

Commerce Sec. Peter Peterson, representing the views of the Nixon Administration, was one of the witnesses arguing against the legislation. He and other government and business spokesmen contended that expanded foreign operations of U.S. companies have been helpful to both the domestic and worldwide economy.

Jennings and Ruttenberg sharply questioned the "benefits" to the American economy of the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs to overseas operations of the multinationals.

A news film shown by Tyler featured interviews with Bendix Corp. workers in New York City whose plant was being closed and its operations shifted to Mexico.

And Jennings cited example after example of similar cases—a television plant in New Jersey in an area of high unemployment that shut down and arranged to produce its sets in Taiwan, a new plant of another firm in Memphis with a mostly black workforce whose top officer told Jennings bluntly that the company had "no responsibility" to the community because "we are a world corporation."

Ruttenberg cited the loopholes in U.S. tax law which enables multinational companies to pocket a larger share of the profit from overseas operations than a company with the same profit could retain in the United States. And if the company invests its profits abroad instead of returning them to this country, its tax advantages are multiplied.

The Burke-Hartke bill would remove some of the tax and tariff advantages now enjoyed by multinational corporations and would allow the President to restrict the outflow of U.S. capital and regulate patent licensing agreements when necessary to prevent increased unemployment in the United States.

Such regulation is needed, Tyler said, because multinational firms "are creating unemployment in the United States. To open factories in lands where the wages are as low as 16 cents an hour, where there is no collective bargaining, no child labor laws, no safety or sanitary provisions—they take newly developed technology paid for by the United States taxpayer and export this advantage to other lands where it is used against American producers."

Forced Arbitration Plan Called Russian Roulette

ment, to promote industrial peace. Nor is it the cure for what the Administration identifies as our current dilemma: what to do about emergency strikes in transportation."

Administration witnesses appearing on behalf of the bill have contended that the "final offer selection" approach would aid collective bargaining by encouraging both parties to make reasonable offers for fear an unreasonable one might be rejected.

Kheel said just the opposite would happen.

"Bargaining is a creative process. It enables the parties to reach an agreement that satisfies their respective needs which they could not fashion by themselves.

"It cannot function simply as a system of bidding, and it is naive to assume that the prospect of a panel selecting an unpalatable solution will be sufficient incentive to produce bargaining in the absence of the possibility of a strike.

"It is naive to believe that procedures prescribed in advance that ban strikes and necessarily invoke compulsory arbitration will give us the security we would like to have," he said.

Kheel described Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson's theory that final offer selection would push negotiators "toward the middle ground" as "pure wish fulfillment."

Kheel also charged that the final offer selection provision is "anti-democratic to the extreme" and contrary to the intent of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The Landrum-Griffin Act was passed, Kheel noted, because of the belief that union leaders were "too autocratic and the members didn't have enough say."

"Here, the leaders would make a final offer and the rank and file would never have a chance to say anything about it."

Kheel also likened final offer selection to Russian roulette—"you take your chance on who is going to make the least unreasonable offer."

He also expressed the belief that railroad and airline unions should be made subject to the Taft-Hartley Act's 80-day injunction procedure by amending the Railway Labor Act.

Painters Conduct Training for Vets

The Painters launched a pre-apprenticeship training program for returning servicemen at several military installations across the country under a new contract with the Departments of Defense and Health, Education & Welfare.

About 560 servicemen are expected to take the six-week course while awaiting discharge this year.

Trainees in the Painters Transition Program will receive on-the-job training and related classroom instruction in basic tools, materials, and techniques in the painting and drywall taping crafts.

After their release from the military, the veterans will be referred to union locals in their home areas.

Public Jobs Seen Key to Manpower Bill

There should be maximum cooperation by federal, state and local governments to develop flexible manpower programs to meet specific community needs, Young said. But he stressed that "still other programs should be maintained at the national level, and earmarked, to provide services that would be lost in the competition for funds at the state and local levels."

Rothman cited the success of HRDI since its creation in 1968 "to mobilize and utilize the vast resources of skilled talent and experience within the labor movement to plan, develop, coordinate and operate programs for the hard-core unemployed."

Through HRDI programs and other government-financed programs operated by unions, Rothman noted, thousands of disadvantaged workers have moved into good-paying jobs with a future.

In the labor-operated programs, he stressed, "training has been directed at existing jobs; placement has in most instances been a built-in component of the programs, and the wages, even for entry-level jobs, have been higher than those of other programs."

He warned that such programs "can be destroyed" by the Administration's revenue-sharing approach.

Young termed the 1971 legislation establishing a temporary public service jobs program at a time of persistently high unemployment a step in the right direction and perhaps the best that could have been achieved last year in the face of presidential veto threats.

But he emphasized that the program has proved "inadequate in the face of the nation's need for jobs and need for public services."

It has placed fewer than 150,000 workers in jobs and "it's time to move on to a large-scale public service job-creation program," he urged.

Well-Heeled Businesses Widen Anti-Strike Drive

Eight more giant corporations have joined a big business lobby set up for the sole purpose of outlawing strikes in transportation.

The organization calls itself the United Transportation Consumers and insists it is not a lobbying group but one designed to create "through a public education program" a public climate "within which Congress can act to force modernization of the transportation system."

Although it was organized last November, its existence was not made public until this month when the group sent a letter and brochure to all senators and representatives to explain its purpose:

Membership is open to all companies that agree with UTC's goals.

Fees for membership are on a sliding scale: only $1,000 a year if a company had less than $50 million in sales in the last fiscal year, but $3,000 a year for those corporations whose total sales volume was more than $100 million.

The eight new members of the UTC are W. R. Grace & Co., Colorado Meat Dealers, N. L. Industries, Hyster Co., Federal Sign & Signal, General Telephone & Electronics, Avon Cosmetics and Standard Oil of Indiana.

They brought the number of members to 18. The original 10 forming the group were Georgia-Pacific, Allied Chemical, Continental Can, Dow Chemical, E. I. duPont, PPG Industries, St. Regis Paper, Union Camp, U.S. Plywood-Champion Papers and Weyerhaeuser.

The chairman of the group's steering committee is Thomas F. Mitchell, a lobbyist for a lumber conglomerate.

He said he has contacted 1,000 firms in an attempt to raise $1 million for the UTC's "education" program.

Mitchell said a number of companies have declared their intention to join United Transportation Consumers, but declined to identify them.

The brochure sent to congressmen claims among other things, that "work practices . . . stifle modernization" and "grip the entire transportation industry—and cost the railroads alone $500 million a year which might be utilized for improved equipment or services."

It suggests "Congress can help the industry develop the will to modernize—or force it to do so."

The UTC feels that the transportation industry's ills could be cured by legislation calling for mandatory settlement of labor disputes and a prohibition of strikes and lockouts. And the organization makes it clear that it wants compulsory settlement of not just nationwide labor disputes in transportation, but "selective," localized strikes as well.

Despite its big business membership, the UTC insists in its brochure that it "exists to pursue the interest of the consumer."

Oil Workers Add 3 More Independents

Denver—Employes of three refineries of the American Oil Co. (Standard Oil of Indiana) have voted to affiliate with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Members of previously unaffiliated unions representing 2,400 workers at the company's Whiting, Ind., refinery, 150 workers at the Mandan, N.D., refinery, and 300 workers at the Casper, Wyo., refinery voted to affiliate with OCAW.

"We now represent employes of all American Oil Co. refineries except those in Yorktown, Va.," said OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron.

"This development must be viewed in historical perspective," said Grospiron. "While OCAW long has been by far the largest union in the oil industry, a significant number of oil workers have been represented by the so-called independent or one-company unions.

"A few months ago the independent union of Mobil employes at Paulsboro, N.J., voted to affiliate with OCAW. A little later, the independent union members of Continental Oil Co., in its number one refinery in Ponca City, Okla., swung into our ranks and shortly after that Continental employes at Lake Charles, La., voted to switch from the Teamsters to OCAW.

"We are significantly expanding our bargaining strength in the oil industry and we expect this trend to continue through the affiliation of the remaining independent unions," Grospiron said.

Pilots Press Air Piracy Curbs

The Air Line Pilots Association has urged swift passage of two bills now in the Senate dealing with the crime of aerial piracy.

ALPA Pres. John J. O'Connell, in a letter to Sen. James B. Pearson (R-Kans.), urged prompt passage of a bill introduced by Pearson to encourage hijackers to surrender in return for reduced penalties and another bill introduced by Sen. Warren D. Magnuson (D-Wash.) to implement the convention for the suppression of unlawful seizure of aircraft.

O'Donnell said that "while both bills deal primarily with the crime of air piracy, I know you are well aware of the new offshoot of that crime that has reared its ugly head in the United States—the crime of extortion by bomb threat."

The Air Line Pilots president added that the result of this latest escalation of aerial piracy is that crime against safe air passage has now assumed much more ominous proportions.

O'Donnell said "we are now more firmly convinced than ever that we are now fighting a battle of survival" in the commercial aviation industry and asked for additional federal legislation that would provide deterrence in the form of stiff penalties for extortion by bomb threat and related crimes.

Inaction on the Schools

THE REPORT of the President's Commission on School Finance is less a plan to solve the financial problems of the schools than it is an elaborate rationalization for continued federal inaction to meet the problems.

The commission has recommended that the states assume the full responsibility for financing elementary and secondary education with only minimum federal participation. This may insure that any child will have available the same resources which are available to any other child within his own state, but it totally ignores the fact that the states themselves have unequal financial resources.

If it is immoral for children within a state to have unequal educational opportunity, then it is just as immoral for children of one state to have more limited educational opportunity than the children of another state. The commission's report deals with the first of these immoralities, but it totally evades the second.

From the time that he first took office, Pres. Nixon has made it clear that he does not want the federal government to play a significant role in school finance. His Commission on School Finance has given him exactly the kind of report which it was created to produce.

Commission member John Fischer, president of Columbia University Teachers College, wrote a dissenting opinion on the recommendation that the states assume full responsibility for financing the schools. His dissent was signed by eight other members of the commission, all of them educators. This means that the central finding of the commission report was adopted by a nine-to-nine vote. That is not the way we take votes in the AFL-CIO, or in the Congress of the United States, or any other democratic institution.

IT IS INCREDIBLE that a presidentially appointed commission could work for two years preparing a report on school finance without ever dealing with such fundamental questions as the equity of the various taxes, even including the Administration-proposed value-added tax, which might be used to finance the schools.

Instead of coming to grips with the real problems of financing public education, the commission has embraced a variety of already discredited panaceas including voucher plans and even performance contracting, the complete failure of which has already been admitted by its principal advocate, the Office of Economic Opportunity.

It is a measure of the President's Commission on School Finance that in preparing its report it solicited the views of the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers but made no effort to find out the views of the AFL-CIO whose 14 million members pay taxes to finance the schools and whose children are pupils in those schools.

The AFL-CIO will continue its efforts to bring about a major federal participation in financing public elementary and secondary education and in guaranteeing equal educational opportunity to children, wherever they may live and whatever the wealth of their parents and their neighbors.

Prospect of Jobless Lawyers Gives Legal Aid Plan New Look

By John P. Roche

A WHILE AGO Vice Pres. Spiro Agnew made the papers by observing that there was something odd about the U.S. government financing, through the legal services branch of the Office of Economic Opportunity, lawsuits against itself. Agnew was not particularly bitter about it; he just suggested, almost casually, that it was an odd way to run a country.

Logically he had a point, but the glorious thing about this crazy country is the extent to which it has survived and thrived without any notable dedication to logical principles. To put it another way, where else in the world is the government so secure that it will finance legal assaults upon itself?

Indeed, I have no doubt but that somewhere in the United States there is a character planning the overthrow of the government on a government grant. Certainly a number of the "community organization" programs launched by the poverty program in years past had as their covert objective the elimination of various political machines. This bothered the mayors of the cities concerned, though in a broader perspecitve it was good clean fun.

However, I would like to suggest to the Vice President and others who share his logical concern that in the long run the expansion of the legal services division of OEO would be an extremely wise move. If you have been following the statistics, you will be appalled to learn that the United States is about to suffer from an acute surfeit of lawyers.

Today's college graduates consider law to be the "In Thing" and they have been flocking to the law schools. Since the latter are among the few guaranteed money-makers on a university compus, the schools have expanded by roughly 100 percent over the last decade.

Simultaneously, there has been a decline of legal business. The old automobile liability litigation—a massive legal welfare program—is acutely threatened by the rise of "no-fault" programs. One Boston attorney, who has devoted his life to the endless finagling that formerly went into insurance negotiations, is reputedly selling apples on the Common.

True, Pres. Nixon's labyrinthine economic regulations have provided a breather, particularly for Washington lawyers. But this bonanza can't last forever and already economy-minded businessmen have discovered that it is perfectly possible to get a straight answer from the Internal Revenue Service without any legal intermediaries. (Most of the IRS personnel in this area are, of course, themselves lawyers.)

In sum, the long-term prospects for legal employment are not reassuring. And that mob of freshly minted lawyers, many of them strongly dedicated to "public interest" litigation, is pouring out of the schools.

THIS BRINGS US to Roche's Law of Legal Employment, first advanced in the early 1950s. A careful survey of the sources of revolutionary elites in the new nations led me to urge that the chief priority for any government that hoped to achieve stability was to provide full employment for lawyers.

Space prohibits any detailed discussion of the reasoning behind this. Suffice it to say that for a combination of political and psychological reasons, an unemployed lawyer is a prime potential revolutionary. In his own eyes, he is a person of great learning and status. If the society refuses to recognize his innate virtue and standing, so much the worse for the society.

Confronted as we are with the possibility of a surge of legal unemployment and the acute status deprivation that accompanies it, the wise thing is to create an institutional accommodation.

The legal services division of the OEO seems ideally suited for this purpose—and, in addition, it might be added that it plays a good and useful role in implementing our ideal of equality under law.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Basic Rights at Stake:

Forced Arbitration Measure Threatens All Union Members

The following is based on "Compulsory Arbitration," Fact Sheet No. 3 of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

FREE COLLECTIVE BARGAINING and freedom itself face a serious and direct challenge.

This challenge is not in the form of a high school debate topic, as it was in 1965-66. This time, the threat is real.

At this moment Congress is considering several bills which would deny workers the right to strike and force them to work under conditions dictated by the government.

The immediate target of the Nixon Administration and some short-sighted alarmists in Congress are workers in the transportation industry—railroads, longshore, airlines, maritime and trucking.

The general target, however, is the right of free men to join together and take economic action to improve the conditions under which they work. Sponsors of these bills don't intend to stop with transportation workers; some of them propose a study of compulsory arbitration in other industries.

Stripped of its public relations title—"The Crippling Strikes Prevention Act"—the Administration proposal is little more than an untested, unproven and untried form of compulsory arbitration, backed with the governmental clout of a denial of the right to strike.

Once this nation starts down the path of compulsion as a way of life, it will not stop with workers. The history of every dictatorship proves that once a government is allowed to compel workers to labor against their will, it inevitably uses the weapon of compulsion against employers and, ultimately, against all citizens.

Basically, the compulsory arbitration proposal would undercut collective bargaining and substitute for it a system of forced settlement with the fancy name of "final offer selection."

Strikes would be outlawed. An arbitration panel, appointed by the President or the Secretary of Labor, would be required to choose between the final offers made by management and the union. Nothing could be changed about the offer that is selected—either the whole proposal is accepted or it is rejected. The selected offer would, in effect, become the contract between the company and the union; as such, it would have the force of law.

By banning strikes, this proposal would destroy the effectiveness of collective bargaining. One party to a dispute or the other will realize that compulsory arbitration will work to its advantage. The built-in incentive, therefore, is not to bargain at all. Thus a "take-it-or-leave-it" approach rather than the collective bargaining would be rewarded.

These compulsory arbitration proposals would change the national emergency disputes provisions of the Railway Labor Act and Taft-Hartley Act.

Railroads and airlines, now covered by special legislation tailored to those industries, would be brought under the coverage of the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The considerations which led Congress to deal separately with these industries have not changed. There is no justification, either, for imposing special emergency procedures on the maritime, longshore and trucking industries.

In view of the unfortunately small percentage of shipments that are carried in American flag ships and of the further unfortunate fact that the Supreme Court has ruled that the Taft-Hartley Act does not apply to American "flag of convenience" ships, it is quite apparent that a maritime strike is not going to create a "national emergency" under the Administration proposal.

The inclusion of the longshoring industry for special treatment is likewise curious. A 1970 study sponsored by the then Sec. of Labor George Shultz, who is presently Pres. Nixon's chief economic adviser on domestic affairs, concluded that there had been "minimal" economic damage from past longshore strikes, and that their effects had been much exaggerated.

And there is no reason to subject trucking labor relations to special coercive procedures, for no Administration has ever found it necessary even to seek an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction in that industry.

THE AFL-CIO IS OPPOSED to any form of compulsory arbitration which would force an employe to work for the profit of his employer on terms dictated by the government.

On the other hand, organized labor wholeheartedly supports the concept of voluntary arbitration, where the parties jointly agree to accept an umpire's decision as final and binding.

The difference between the words "voluntary" and "compulsory" is the difference between freedom and its denial.

While the compulsory arbitration measures currently pending in the Congress are limited to transportation, there is little doubt that these restrictions on workers' rights—if they are enacted—would be extended to other industries.

All union members are threatened by the compulsory arbitration legislation now being considered by the Congress.

Union members don't like strikes. No one does.

But free workers—if they are to be free—must have the right to strike.

Write your congressmen and senators today. Tell them that under the terms of any of the compulsory arbitration legislation now being considered in Congress, that free collective bargaining will end—for all an employer has to do is say "no" and the government will set the terms of your contract and prohibit you from striking. Tell your representatives that freedom is on the line.

American workers must never surrender their rights as free men. Compulsory arbitration, in any form, is a denial of the rights of free men.

Protect your freedom. Write immediately.

Commercial Operations Hit:

National Blood Bank Proposed To Assure Quality, Cost Control

A NATIONAL BLOOD BANKING system that skirts the problems caused by commercial operations would be the best guarantee of a full supply of high quality blood throughout the country at prices patients could afford, AFL-CIO Community Service Director Leo Perlis declared.

Citing the sharp rise of both transfusion costs and the risk of disease from contaminated blood, Perlis laid major blame on the fast growth of "commercialism" in what ought to be "a service . . . not a business."

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview Labor News Conference, Perlis said the labor movement is "delighted to see some action in Congress in this area," noting that a number of proposals "relating to blood banking systems" are now before Congress.

"All these steps are in the right direction," he declared, but fail to meet head-on the "two major basic problems . . . total elimination of commercialism . . . and the establishment of one national system," both of which are longstanding goals of the AFL-CIO.

Perlis turned aside the contention that "there are not enough volunteers" to sustain a national, non-commercial blood banking system. He said that although there have been localized blood donor drives for decades, such efforts are "largely uncoordinated" and cannot produce the kind of efficiency and effectiveness this vital health-building and life-saving effort demands.

He said that most other western countries have successful, voluntary, non-commercial, national blood banking systems, and that "the American Red Cross is in a good position to undertake" such a program in the United States.

ONE OF THE MOST DAMAGING complaints about the operation of Congress is its atmosphere of secrecy and covertness.

In the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970 a serious move was undertaken to modernize the rules and procedures by which both houses of the Congress conduct business.

The act encouraged open hearings and business meetings, provided that all record votes be made public, permitted broadcasting of hearings in both houses, required committees to issue biennial reports reviewing their activities within their jurisdiction.

By far the most dramatic change was the recorded teller vote in the House.

In the past, there was no real record on important votes on amendments. Members would simply file by tellers who tallied the number voting "yea" and "nay." No record was kept on the votes of individual members, only "yea" and "nay" total votes. Members had virtual anonymity.

The Reorganization Act went into effect in January 1971, the first session of the 92nd Congress. During 1971 a total of 107 teller votes were recorded, most of them on amendments which would have allowed members to withhold their official vote from the public.

Under the new procedure, one-fifth of a quorum can call for a recorded teller vote.

Most of the major bills in the House are considered under the Committee of the Whole which requires a smaller quorum of members, enabling the House to conduct business with only 100 members present.

This means that 20 members can secure such a vote when the House is in the Committee of the Whole and 44 members in the House, itself.

Under the old system, amendments approved by the Committee of the Whole could be recorded by rollcall votes just before final passage. However, amendments rejected in that fashion could not be voted on by the full House in a record vote.

The system under the Reorganization Act is that 20 members can secure a record teller vote. This provides that members file past tellers and hand them colored pieces of paper listing their names and position on the amendment at issue.

THE LIBERAL House Democratic Study Group, which pressed for this reform, reports that it "has been an unqualified success."

The DSG said that "the record teller reform is working better than anyone thought possible and there is no justification for curbing its use."

Here are some of the advantages listed by the DSG in the recorded teller vote:

- Despite the increase in overall number of record votes (rollcall and teller) to an all-time high, the House actually spent less time voting in 1971 than in 1970.
- More members participated in record teller votes than in rollcall votes.
- There has been a dramatic increase in non-record vote participation.
- The majority of the record teller votes were on major questions such as defense policy, school busing and appropriations.
- While conservatives won twice as many record teller votes as liberals, the record teller reform represented a significant gain for liberals since they rarely won a vote when votes were not recorded.

A survey by Congressional Quarterly, based on 108 recorded teller votes, found that voting participation increased by more than 90 percent over the non-record votes on amendments the previous year.

More important than all these related reforms, though, the fact that members of the House are now recorded on almost all significant votes is a signal victory for the public's right to know.

BEST GUARANTEE of a full supply of high quality blood at prices patients can afford would be a nationally coordinated, non-commercial blood banking system, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, left, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Judith Randal of the Washington Evening Star and Jerome Brazda of the Washington Report on Medicine & Health. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Bookbinders, Lithographers Okay Merger

In a joint statement, Brown and Connolly said:

"In the graphic arts today, change is the name of the game. What we have seen technologically in the last 10 years in terms of new equipment and increased productivity is just a glimmer of what we can expect in the next 10 years.

"Unions whose structures were formed before the turn of the century to deal with the printing of 1900 just are not structured to meet the needs of 1970s and 1980s.

"Graphic arts unionists need a modern vehicle that will carry them into that period, which we feel our two unions have the tradition and strength to accomplish—a vehicle attuned to today and tomorrow, based on strength creating greater strength.

"Aside from wages and skill factors, there should be uniformity of benefits throughout the industry and it should make no difference whether you're a bookbinder, pressman, photoengraver, platemaker, typesetter or stereotyper.

"Merger makes possible the exercise of influence in the industry —on behalf of our members— which separate unions pulling in different directions cannot ever hope to have.

"We have concluded—as are more and more workers generally in the graphic arts—that merger is not the question—but the question is: Can we afford not to merge?

"The decade of the seventies could well witness the advent of one union in the graphic arts. This is clearly before us in the next 10 years if we are to meet our greatest challenge—to forge a modern-day trade union instrument to meet the needs of our membership in this period of change."

CANCER PATIENT Daniel Maciborski, a member of Papermakers & Paperworkers Local 800 in Manville, N.J., describes the effects of mesothelioma, the disease he contracted by exposure to high levels of asbestos dust. Maciborski, flanked by two other Local 800 members, was one of several experts on an AFL-CIO Industrial Dept. panel that presented a strong case urging the federal government to impose stricter standards on asbestos dust.

Guild Holds Hearings On Canadian Division

Vancouver, B.C.—A series of unique public hearings across Canada on a proposal to establish a Canadian national office and director for the Newspaper Guild brought a mixed reaction from the Guild's Canadian locals.

The Guild's Eastern Canada locals—Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal—strongly supported the idea. But the Western locals—Vancouver-New Westminster and Victoria —opposed it.

The hearings were conducted by a five-member task force headed by Guild Pres. Charles A. Perlik, Jr., to sound out Canadian opinion on the proposal. The task force will report to the international executive board, which, in turn, will make recommendations to this year's Guild convention in June.

The task force heard representatives of other international unions and journalism and industrial relations professors, as well as official spokesmen for the five Guild locals.

Sen. Keith Davey, head of Canada's Special Senate Committee on Mass Media led off the hearings, which were held over seven days in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver.

Most of the witnesses, while urging a degree of Canadian autonomy, spoke out strongly on behalf of international unionism. Davey, while supporting the establishment of a Canadian office and director, said the Canadian region should not become separate from the international.

"There is great value in such an international relationship," he said, "Canadian Guild members can enjoy the best of both worlds."

Official submissions by the Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal locals urged a national Guild office and director as essential to making the Guild more effective in Canada and to meet the growing spirit of Canadian nationalism. Ottawa and Toronto both urged a Canadian research director and a Canadian Guild newspaper, as well.

But the Vancouver-New Westminster and Victoria locals contended that a national office and director were not needed for a more effective Guild and expressed concern lest it prove divisive.

"We feel that geographical boundaries should be ignored when people with common interests, such as we have in the Guild, band together to advance the cause of the members," Vancouver said.

Richard J. Clarke, Canadian vice president of the Lithographers & Photoengravers, said his union's Canadian office had proven itself "over and over again" in enhancing both service and Canadian identity.

And Ronald J. Pambrun, vice president for Canadian affairs of the Broadcast Employes, said Canadian autonomy had proved helpful in organizing.

Other witnesses included Boris Mather, director of the Canadian Communications Workers Council of the CWA; Paul Robinson, general chairman of the Canadian Press Division of the Telegraph Workers; Jack Williams, public relations director of the Canadian Labor Congress, and Morden Lazarus, public relations director of the Ontario Federation of Labor.

Machinists, Airline Join In Food Lift for Seattle

The Machinists and United Air Lines are teaming up in a cooperative effort to airlift tons of free food to Seattle where as many as 80,000 unemployed workers are dependent on food donations.

The union estimates that every fourth breadwinner in Seattle is out of a job due to the recession's impact on the aerospace and airline industries, which in turn, has resulted in massive layoffs at the Boeing Co. complex there.

The idea for the airlift was conceived by Pres. George J. Robinson of IAM District 141 in Burlingame, Calif. The district represents 18,000 United mechanics and other ground service personnel.

Robinson got the idea after reading how Japanese people in Kobe —which has a "sister city" relationship with Seattle—were collecting food around Christmas and sending it to the beleaguered Puget Sound city.

United agreed to haul the food at no charge from 32 collection points across the nation on a one-shot basis. The airlift was to be completed Mar. 15.

The project is called "We Care" and a goal of 5 pounds of food for each of United's 50,000 employes has been set.

The food will be distributed by an organization called "Neighbors in Need" which has been collecting canned goods and other staples within the Seattle area.

The District 141 executive board authorized union support for initiating the program after hearing Rep. Brock Adams (D-Wash.) tell how sorely food is needed.

Adams lauded the efforts of the union and the airline on the floor of the House and said he hoped that "many others from more fortunate areas will realize the great need for help for the needy in the State of Washington and will assist in this effort."

Adams said the "We Care" program was especially timely because "during the winter months, when the need for donated food is the greatest, the supply from the Pacific Northwest is the least available."

He said that during February more than 103,000 persons in 15 Washington counties were assisted by 78 food banks.

Adams noted that the Seattle unemployment rate remains above 11 percent and that throughout the state joblessness is at least 10 percent.

"Traditional programs, such as the food stamp program, are totally inadequate to assist an economic and human crisis of this magnitude," Adams said.

Tens of thousands of jobless workers have exhausted unemployment benefits in the area and Adams noted that many unemployed workers were ineligible for the food stamp program.

Strict Standards Demanded:

Asbestos Dust Seen As Seeds of Death

By John R. Oravec

A drastic reduction in allowable levels of airborne asbestos dust is essential to the health of not only workers, but also their families and whole communities, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. warned.

Citing widely confirmed medical evidence that prolonged exposure to asbestos dust causes several types of cancer—all fatal—the IUD called on the Labor Dept. to adopt much stricter permanent standards on the material.

The IUD wants the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to lower the threshold limit on airborne asbestos to 2 fibers per milliliter for an eight-hour period within the next six months. And within two years, the level should be dropped to 1 fiber per milliliter of air, the the IUD said.

OSHA, which was holding hearings in Washington this week on permanent asbestos standards, issued an emergency standard last December to lower the threshold level from 12 fibers to 5 per milliliter. Even at that time, organized labor called for the stricter 2 fiber level.

In a press briefing timed to the opening of the OSHA hearings, the IUD brought together a panel of experts on the asbestos health hazard. Included were several members of the Papermakers & Paperworkers Local 800 who are employed by the Johns-Manville plant in Manville, N.J.

Among them was a Local 800 member who is suffering from mesothelioma, a rare cancer caused by asbestos dust which was not recognized by medical specialists until a few years ago. The disease, which reportedly has a gestation period of 20 to 40 years, always brings death.

Jacob Clayman, IUD administrative director, said that despite this medical evidence, millions of American workers, their families and neighbors are exposed needlessly to toxic concentrations of asbestos.

He noted that where excessive concentration of asbestos dust occur in plants where the material is handled, workers carry it on their clothes to their homes and into the community. And this exposes their wives, children and neighbors to the health hazard.

Focusing on the Manville plant that could be typical of thousands around the country, Clayman said the medical facts illustrate the need of stringent governmental controls.

He quoted Dr. William Johnson of the Public Health Service who had referred to the Manville situation: "This may be the largest epidemic of cancer recorded."

Dr. Maxwell Borow, appearing on the IUD panel, said that his study of the Manville situation shows there are now 52 cases of mesothelioma in the community. The disease attacks chest and stomach walls of the patient and is fatal in about 18 months, he noted.

Although the government may impose strict controls on asbestos immediately, Dr. Borow pointed out that mesothelioma was likely to increase for at least 20 years because of the long gestation period of the disease.

Another IUD panelist, Dr. William J. Nicholson of New York City, also cited grim statistics. He said studies since 1943 of 632 insulation workers by Dr. Irvin J. Selikoff for the Mount Sinai School of Medicine showed that "almost 40 percent of the 425 deaths in the group as of last June 30" can be "directly attributed to . . . workers occupational exposure to asbestos."

20 GE Strikers Win $200,000 in Back Pay

Augusta, Ga.—A back-pay settlement totaling $200,000 has been won by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers for 20 former strikers at a General Electric plant here growing out of the company's illegal refusal to reinstate the workers after a nationwide strike 12 years ago.

The settlement has been approved by the National Labor Relations Board which ordered it after a trial examiner ruled in 1964 that the company was guilty of unfair labor practices for its actions on reinstatement. Trial Examiner Arthur Leff also ruled that GE had been guilty of unfair labor practices during nationwide bargaining in 1960 because of its "take-it-or-leave-it," Boulwaristic negotiating tactics.

GE fought the trial examiner's decisions and the subsequent board affirmation to the U.S. Supreme Court, which twice turned the company down on appeals for review.

GE's legal maneuverings finally came to an end in April 1970. The NLRB has since been computing the amounts of back pay due the strikers—minus earnings from other employment.

The General Electric plant here, which manufactured television tubes, was forced to close in 1965 when the market became overloaded.

In the nearly 12 years that have elapsed since the strike, one of the strikers, Jerry Smith, has died. His widow said she would use his share of the back pay to help their two daughters through college.

Two of the strikers, Garney Browning and Gerald Moody have become IUE field representatives, and six others are either working for the trade union movement or deeply involved with the unions representing them on new jobs.

During the strike, employes first were threatened with discharge and replacement if they did not return to work in five days.

After IUE Local 192 complained that this was illegal, the NLRB drew the attention of company lawyers to the matter.

A plant manager subsequently sent the strikers telegrams saying they would not be fired, but that GE would replace them if they did not return to their jobs within five days.

When the strike was over, the 20 workers offered to return to work, but GE refused, stating that all had been replaced.

Only seven of the strikers were ever reinstated at the now defunct plant and those seven managed to sign up all but one member of the bargaining unit into Local 192.

Labor Charges 'Unholy Alliance':

Pay Board Dock Pact Vote Tied to 'Political Maneuver'

this decision had to be made by the union itself.

ILWU Pres. Harry Bridges had warned that any reduction of the settlement terms might lead to a renewal of the walkout. The Pay Board majority, however, brushed aside that warning.

The labor members' statement, read to newsmen by UAW Vice Pres. Pat Greathouse, charged that the board is "being used by the Nixon Administration in concert with some of the nation's largest employers to set the stage for permanent legislation" dealing with transportation disputes.

"This is a tragic day for collective bargaining, a tragic day for longshoremen and a tragic day for freedom in America," the statement said.

The board voided the ILWU contract by an 8-6 vote—with the five labor members opposing it along with one business member who voted with them only because he felt that the pared-down increase still was too high.

The Pay Board placed the value of the longshore settlement at 20.6 percent in the first year—15.7 percent in wages and another 4.9 percent in "excludable" fringe benefits such as pensions and health and medical benefits.

The board's action cut back the wages from 15.7 percent to 10 percent—or a rollback of 36 percent.

A "Majority Statement" from the board said it had concluded that under the Economic Stabilization Act, the dockers were entitled to a full "catch-up" exception "within the board's guidelines of 7 percent on wages and includable fringes."

And it determined that the workers were entitled to an additional 3 percent in wages "in recognition of the unique nature of the ongoing collective bargaining practices, the equitable position of the parties involved, and arrangements . . . designed to foster economic growth."

The board approved the entire 4.9 percent increase in "excludable" fringe benefits.

It said this was necessary "to provide the income and retirement security which has helped to foster efficient industry practices leading to significantly greater output with a continuously declining work force."

AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger estimated that the board ruling would cost the rank-and-file docker 42.5 cents an hour in the first year of the agreement.

And the labor members' statement pointed out that "it will mean an average loss of $1,150 to each of the 15,000 workers in the next 18 months."

"That will be a $17 million windfall for the employers."

"In this case," the statement said, "the Congress of the United States had encouraged the parties to find their own solution to a 134-day strike. It voted to set up machinery for an imposed settlement if the parties would not reach their own agreement.

"Heeding the will of Congress, they worked out a settlement, only now to have it nullified by this Pay Board which has superimposed its will over and above the authority of Congress."

The statement declared that the board had not only ignored Congress, but its own policy "which recognized that a raise is not inflationary if it can be compensated for by increased productivity."

"The record of rising productivity on the waterfront is recognized even by the Pay Board's own staff studies. The staff study shows labor savings of more than $900 million from increased productivity over the past 10 years."

Productivity also was the theme of a presentation by Bridges during an open hearing of the Pay Board on the settlement.

And it was the theme, too, of management. The Pacific Maritime Association, representing the stevedoring firms, also went before the Pay Board to ask that the settlement be approved with no modification.

A representative of the board's staff also appeared. Although the staff made no recommendation for approval, it presented estimates of productivity increases totaling 144 percent between 1960 and 1970.

When Bridges appeared before the board, he explained that the productivity increases were gained as a result of a union-management pact called the Mechanization & Modernization Agreement signed in 1960.

The union agreed to a complete overhaul of work rules and technological changes in return for financial compensation of workers.

"A most unusual feature of that agreement," Bridges said, "was a provision adopted at the insistence of the union that machines and labor-saving devices be used whenever possible."

He emphasized the non-inflationary nature of the current agreement in the historical context of dock pacts.

In past years, Bridges pointed out, it has been the practice to devote the bulk of economic packages to providing bonus and pension benefits to "encourage senior people to leave the workforce with economic freedom. This in turn enabled the industry to pay increased wages and fringe benefits to remaining workers that were more than paid for by increased productivity and a drastic drop in unit labor costs (about 33 percent) over the life of the contracts."

"The new agreement will continue that trend."

Bridges, in effect, predicted further increases in worker productivity and noted that workers as well as employers have a right to share the benefits of such cost savings.

A statement from the Pacific Maritime Association noted that West Coast dock productivity rose 144 percent between 1960-1970 while national productivity rose only 33 percent.

In 1970, 41 dockers were performing the work that required 100 men in 1960. And, the statement noted, unit labor costs fell by about 30 percent in that 10-year period while they rose by that much in the private nonfarm economy.

Between 1966 and 1970, tonnage handled increased 26 percent with a 26 percent reduction in hours worked.

"Although 1971 was a strike year, the pattern of tons and hours is in the same vein—a 4 percent increase in tons with a 45 percent decrease in hours," the statement noted.

"To refuse to grant an exception for the full value of wages and fringes in this case, will make it more difficult to achieve worker cooperation for technological change and the usually required work rules relaxation," the PMA said.

The unions' newspaper advertisement emphasized what the new technology has meant on the docks between 1960 and 1970:

- Cargo doubled from about 19 million to nearly 40 million tons.
- Manhours worked in the West Coast longshore industry dropped 17 percent
- The amount of cargo handled per manhour rose 138 percent.
- Labor cost per ton dropped 30 percent, from $4.94 to $3.46.

State Regulation Seen Boon to Health Insurers

The Nixon Administration's proposals for token regulation of health insurance companies were described by the AFL-CIO as "a cruel trick on the health consumers of America."

An AFL-CIO statement filed at the invitation of the House Ways & Means Committee reiterated labor's opposition to turning over any national health care program to private insurance firms. It sharply criticized the Administration's plan to leave the regulation of the health insurers to the states, subject only to inadequate federal minimum standards that would not correct the "abuses and sins" of the insurance industry.

The AFL-CIO termed the Adistration formula "insurance for the insurance companies" and the proposed regulations "a mild price to pay for a license to fleece the public of its health care dollar."

It noted that the Administration had ignored the federal government's experience with insurance companies in drafting the regulations—particularly "the vast waste of taxpayers' money by the insurance companies in administering Medicare."

"We don't buy the reasoning that because insurance companies only squandered millions in Medicare that they should be given the opportunity to squander billions under national health insurance," the AFL-CIO told the committee.

The federation demanded that the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare release to the Ways & Means Committee "all carrier performance review reports and audits. We believe that these reports will further document the waste, inefficiency and malfeasance of insurance companies."

The statement contended that the proposed state regulation of insurance companies "reflects the Administration's basic disregard for effective regulation of business. The Administration and insurance companies know that state insurance departments—no matter how good their intentions or how high their devotion—are incapable of dealing with multi-state conglomerate insurers.

"For every state inspector, the insurance companies have dozens of high-paid lawyers and accountants. For every state insurance department that is adequately funded and properly staffed, there are 10 that aren't.

"In other words," the statement concluded, "the states can't do the job. The insurance companies know that; the Administration knows it, but the health consumer is the one stuck with the bill."

U.S. Tankers Urged for Half Of Oil Imports

The AFL-CIO urged passage of legislation that would require half of all petroleum imported to the United States to be transported abroad U.S.-flag ships.

In a statement filed with the House Merchant Marine Committee, the AFL-CIO said "it is absolutely vital that our nation be prepared to guarantee an uninterrupted flow of energy fuels from overseas sources."

"The AFL-CIO is firmly convinced," the statement continued, "that our nation would be placed in a position of great jeopardy should we permit ourselves to be dependent upon foreign powers for the transportation of petroleum to our shores."

The federation noted that "most of the imported oil comes in so-called flag-of-convenience ships"—tankers owned by American oil companies which are registered in other countries and manned by foreign crews.

The statement concluded that the 50 percent requirement would benefit the U.S. economy, particularly the balance of payments problem.

Patman Raps Bungling On Economic Controls

The chairman of the House Banking Committee accused the Nixon Administration of bungling the economic stabilization program and flouting the intent of Congress.

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), whose committee has jurisdiction over the program, charged in a letter to Pres. Nixon that the stabilization agencies have acted unfairly and ignored important provisions of the law.

The Cost of Living Council, Patman said, has "perverted" the instructions of Congress to exempt the working poor from wage controls by translating this to mean only persons making less than $1.90 an hour, or about $4,000 a year.

The "intent of Congress" was a floor of $6,900 a year, Patman told Nixon.

Price controls are so complicated that it is impossible for a consumer to know whether a price increase is within the law, Patman noted. And he termed the high rent increases that have been allowed despite the controls "preposterous."

Likewise, Patman said, the Cost of Living Council "failed to comply" with the requirement in the law that it present supporting economic data to justify a refusal to exercise controls over interest rates whenever general wage and price controls are in effect.

He served notice that unless the President takes "prompt steps" to reshape the program in line with the intent of Congress, the Banking Committee will exercise its "oversight" powers to ride herd on the program.

Speedier Service Set on Arbitrations

New York—The American Arbitration Association is instituting a streamlined service for companies and unions in the New York area to arbitrate their less complicated grievances.

The new optional system, which will go into operation Apr. 7, will provide speedier action on cases at greatly reduced costs, the AAA said.

Under the expedited system, hearings will be scheduled within a week or two after cases are filed and awards will be handed down shortly after.

By Slim Margin:

Senate Votes Down Registration by Mail

A 46-42 majority of the Senate killed a labor-supported bill that would have struck down artificial barriers to voter registration and substantially increased the number of Americans voting in elections.

That last point—the anticipated increase in the voting population—was credited with bringing about defeat of the bill by a coalition of most Republicans and southern Democrats. Also a factor was the absenteeism that has plagued the Senate this election year. In addition to senators on the campaign trail, several supporters of the bill missed the vote because of personal or serious family illness.

The legislation, sponsored by Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), would have enabled persons to register to vote in federal elections by mailing a simple postal card form to local voter registration offices. And the residence requirement for eligibility would have been reduced to 30 days.

While registration procedures differ in various localities, many people must appear at inconvenient times and places in order to register. This, along with residence requirements, has held U.S. voting participation far below the level of many other democratic nations.

The initial strategy of the opponents was to seek to refer the bill to the Senate Judiciary Committee. It had come out of the Post Office & Civil Service Committee because the Census Bureau, which is in the committee's jurisdiction, would operate the registration machinery.

But this maneuver was discarded as unnecessary when opponents saw they had the votes to kill the bill by tabling it.

The Senate then moved to take up the controversial constitutional amendment aimed at eliminating all legal distinctions between men and women. The amendment, although supported by a number of women's organizations, would also have the effect of voiding all protective labor legislation enacted by states in order to safeguard the health, minimum pay and working conditions of women workers. For this reason, the AFL-CIO has opposed the amendment in the form it passed the House as "more harmful than helpful."

The House approved final passage of a $20 billion increase in the national debt limit by a 237-150 vote. But Democrats added a stern warning to the President that he will have trouble getting through an additional increase in the ceiling that will be needed in June unless he is willing to support tax reform legislation closing loopholes in the present law.

House Democrats met in caucus before the debt limit vote and adopted a resolution proposed by Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) serving notice on the Administration of stormy days ahead.

The "sense of the caucus" resolution adopted by voice vote warned that passage of a further increase in the debt limit "will be jeopardized unless the President either proposes or supports a meaningful revenue-raising tax reform proposal, or at least sets forth the tax preferences or loopholes which in his judgment Congress may attempt to rectify without confronting a presidential veto."

An emergency supplemental appropriation was adopted by the House to replenish the fund for unemployment compensation payments required by law.

With joblessness still at high levels, the House voted more than $311 million for benefits to unemployed veterans and federal civilian employes who have lost their jobs. It appropriated an additional $600 million for payments to the states for extended unemployment benefits.

This was the third emergency replenishment of unemployment compensation funds since the start of the 92nd Congress.

Meany Hits Price Control 'Sham' As Wholesale Index Shoots Up

The February increase in the Wholesale Price Index—the largest boost in 12 months—"demonstrates, once again, the utter sham of the Administration's so-called price-control program," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

The wholesale prices of food and a wide range of industrial commodities jumped by nine-tenths of 1 percent last month with the prices of livestock, meat, poultry and fish accounting for the lion's share of the rise.

Increases in the Wholesale Price Index usually signal future hikes in consumer prices. Administration spokesmen said they expected the trend to continue at least another month and implied that the Nixon Administration might take further action unless the inflationary trend slows soon.

Meany noted that increased wholesale prices "inevitably mean additional increases in living costs in the coming months—eroding the buying power of the vast majority of American families."

"Retail food prices have already gone through the roof. So have the prices of many other consumer necessities," the federation president said.

The February increase followed rises of eight-tenths of 1 percent in both January and December. On a seasonally adjusted basis, last month's increase was seven-tenths of 1 percent, or an annual rate of increase of 8.4 percent.

The prices for farm products and processed foods and feeds not subject to Phase 2 economic controls rose 1.8 percent last month as compared with two-tenths of 1 percent in January and 2.1 percent in December.

Meany said that while the Nixon Administration permits "this rising tide of price increases—in the name of controls—it persists in holding down the wages of workers."

"The Administration's policies are clearly loaded against the consumer and the workers in favor of the profits of big business."

"The American people need an end to the inequities that abound in the Administration's economic programs," Meany declared.

"They need immediate measures to create jobs and lift the economy to full employment."

Increases in retail food prices, especially meat, are expected to continue "a little longer," according to Herbert Stein, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

Stein maintained during a news conference that the rate of increase of industrial commodity prices is more significant than a rise in farm prices because it provides a long-term view of inflation to which the economic stabilization program is addressed.

He said the rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in the industrial commodities index last month "appears to be a continuation of the post-freeze bulge which had been expected."

When asked by newsmen just how long this "bulge" would continue, Stein replied that "it will be a matter of concern to us if we do not see an end of the rate of inflation fairly soon."

But he was still optimistic, he said, about attaining an inflation rate of 3 percent or 2 percent by the end of the year.

The price increases for meats, lumber, hides and metals are of special concern to White House economists, Stein said, indicating that the government might have to intervene if price performance in these areas does not improve.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said that the Wholesale Price Index had remained about the same during Pres. Nixon's 90-day wage-price freeze and then jumped sharply when controls were eased.

The wholesale index for all commodities stood at 117.3 during February, meaning that the same wholesale products that cost the retailer $10 in 1967 now cost $11.73.

Senior Citizens Question 'Savings' In Nixon's Medicare Funding Plan

No real benefits would be coming to older Americans under Pres. Nixon's proposed changes for financing the Medicare program, the National Council of Senior Citizens charged.

In a lengthy health care message to Congress, Nixon proposed eliminating the monthly premiums paid by the elderly for Part B of Medicare which are scheduled to rise to $5.80 a month in July. The president claimed the proposal would save the elderly $1.5 billion a year.

NCSC Pres. Nelson H. Cruikshank disputed Nixon's claim in a letter to Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) which was read into the Congressional Record. Cruikshank noted that his organization has long urged the elimination of the premium for physicians' services.

But, he said, "an analysis of the method by which the President proposes" to combine Parts A and B of Medicare and eliminate the premium "reveals that his plan would not in fact benefit the elderly the way he claims."

"They would still be paying the cost," Cruikshank stressed, "either through loss of important cash benefits, reduction in hospital benefits or through additional taxes borne by younger members of their family who are still working."

As for the other sections of Nixon's health care message dealing with national health insurance, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said it contained "absolutely nothing new."

Seidman charged Nixon with false statements aimed at undercutting growing public support for the labor-backed National Health Security legislation.

Without referring to the Health Security proposal by name, the President contended that it would lead to socialized medicine and increased taxes.

"To nationalize health care as some have proposed and thus federalize medical personnel, institutions and procedures," the Nixon message stated, "also would amount to a stunning new federal burden for every American."

"The average household would pay more than $1,000 a year as its share of the required new federal expenditure of more than $80 billion each and every year."

The President's claims are outright misstatements on the Health Security program, Seidman said.

The backers of Health Security, including its key sponsors in Congress—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.)—have continually pointed out that the program will not federalize doctors, nor constrict their freedom to practice medicine as they choose.

Health Security supporters have also noted that the financing program will have built-in cost and quality controls which are not provided in the Administration's proposals or any other alternatives.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting declared that "only Health Security has a health resources development fund which would expand health services."

The President admitted in his message to Congress, Seidman noted, that "the time now has come to take the final steps to reorganize, to revitalize and redirect American health care." But what Nixon proposes will not achieve these goals, Seidman stressed.

ILPA Cites Threat Of Huge Mail Costs

The proposed increase in postal rates of up to 750 percent for non-profit second class matter would be a crippling blow to all union publications, the International Labor Press Association warns in a new pamphlet.

Even though the increase would be spread out over 10 years, the hefty boost in mailing costs would wipe out a number of labor publications and curtail all others, the 20-page booklet says.

The increase would impose a severe burden on unions which are required by law to transmit certain written information to members.

PRES. GEORGE MEANY announces AFL-CIO decision to quit the Pay Board rather than serve as "window-dressing" for an inequitable wage control program to a crowded news conference at federation headquarters.

UAW Joins Attack On Nixon Policies

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO declared that there is "no hope for fairness, equity or justice" in the Nixon Administration's economic policies or the operations of the Pay Board and that its three members on the board have no alternative but to resign.

"We will not be a part of the window-dressing for this system of unfair and inequitable government control of wages, for the benefit of business profits," the federation's Executive Council asserted in a unanimously adopted statement. (Full text on Page 5.)

The statement was the sole business before a special one-day meeting of the council called to consider the federation's course of action after seven months of Pres. Nixon's "new" economic policy and a four-month experience on the 15-member Pay Board.

The AFL-CIO members of the board—President George Meany and Federation Vice Presidents I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers and Floyd E. Smith of the Machinists—resigned immediately. Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock resigned the following day after a meeting of the UAW Executive Board. The fifth labor member, Teamsters Pres. Frank Fitzsimmons, said he would remain on the board although he is dissatisfied with its makeup and its major decisions.

Pres. Nixon responded the next day with a statement calling the decision of the resigned labor members "totally selfish and irresponsible," accusing Meany of being "wrong" on the West Coast dock contract and charging that he "walked off the job" in the fight against inflation.

The President announced that the tripartite Pay Board structure will be dropped and a single public unit set up. It will consist of the present five public members, Fitzsimmons, and one of the five present business members to be chosen by Nixon. All seven will be considered to represent the "public."

After the AFL-CIO Executive Council session, the Building & Construction Trades Dept. issued a statement on behalf of the labor members of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee, which was set up prior to the overall controls program to deal with construction problems and has union, industry and public representation.

The BCTD stressed that the CISC "has vigorously maintained a consistent position that it is a separate and autonomous body" created under a separate Executive Order.

The resolution then declared that the labor members of the CISC "will continue to serve on the committee only so long as . . . [it] continues to maintain effectively its separate and autonomous position free from the supervision or the control of the Pay Board."

Meany read key portions of the Executive Council statement at a press conference stressing the wide-ranging basis on which the council condemned the Nixon Administration's economic policies and Pay Board activities.

The federation president said that the Pay Board had no relationship to a tripartite operation—"it is plain and simple government control" operating behind a facade.

He added that he expected the White House would accuse the AFL-CIO of sabotaging the controls program, that "this is par for the course as far as they are concerned. They look for a scapegoat."

The White House did the expected a few hours later, issuing a statement that "a few labor leaders . . . will not be allowed to sabotage the fight against inflation and the fight against higher prices."

The statement said that wage and price controls would continue and repeated an earlier contention from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that the AFL-CIO does not speak for the nation's workers.

UTU Warns Penn Central On Cutbacks

Cleveland—The United Transportation Union vowed to take retaliatory action against the Penn Central—including a strike—if the carrier goes ahead with plans to lay off 6,000 brakemen and conductors Apr. 1.

"We will not hesitate to retaliate swiftly if they persist," said UTU Pres. Al H. Chesser, whose union represents 18,000 workers on the Penn Central.

Meanwhile, the Sheet Metal Workers were preparing strategy after 15 months of futile negotiations with the nation's railroads.

The union represents 6,000 rail shopcraft workers. They will be free to strike as of Apr. 1 be-

School Fund Vetoes Hit:

Nixon Busing Stand Linked to Politics

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany affirmed labor's commitment to "quality, integrated education" and charged Pres. Nixon with inflaming the school bus issue for political mileage.

Nixon's call for a law to curb the power of federal courts to remedy school segregation raises both constitutional and moral questions, Meany warned.

And he termed the President's promise of more federal funds to improve the education of disadvantaged children from poor families "political chicanery" in view of Nixon's repeated vetoes of school aid bills.

Meany noted that Nixon "does not commit his Administration to the expenditure of one penny in new money to improve the educational opportunities of disadvantaged children."

The President's budget calls for only a small portion of the funds Congress has authorized for special aid to schools in poor neighborhoods—and Nixon did not ask for any increase in funding. He merely proposed guidelines governing the spending of the funds.

Meany hammered at the credibility gap between Nixon's words and deeds.

An Administration that has invoked the "law and order" slogan, he noted, "has repeatedly struck at the courts . . . the ultimate line of defense for constitutional liberty. It now proposes, in the guise of regulating the courts' jurisdiction, to deprive them of the power to enforce the 14th Amendment by busing orders designed to eradicate the last vestiges of the segregated dual school system, even where that is the only method sufficient to secure true desegregation."

Meany warned that "if the 14th Amendment can be deprived of its vitality in this way, then none of our constitutional rights is secure."

Nixon's refusal to seek additional funds for the quality education he promised in his nationwide telecast and message to Congress is quite in line with his record, Meany observed.

Meany Assails 'Sham' As Food Prices Soar

By Tom Castor

The sharp increase in the Consumer Price Index during February underscores once again that the Nixon Administration's price control policies are a "sham," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany's comments were made following a report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics that skyrocketing food costs sent the CPI up one-half of 1 percent—the biggest one-month increase since last summer.

The BLS reported that food prices accounted for nearly three-quarters of the February rise in the CPI with the increase particularly sharp for such basic commodities as fruits, vegetables and meats.

Overall, grocery store prices took their biggest jump in 14 years, led by the cost of meat which was up 11.2 percent from February 1971.

The prices of fresh fruits and vegetables are exempt from price controls.

Although the price of processed meat supposedly is controlled, the price of cattle is not and processors are allowed to pass their increased costs on to the housewife.

Government-Business Coalition in Action

Several hours before the Pay Board reached its decision to cut back the West Coast longshore contract Rep. Dan Kuykendal (R-Tenn.) inserted the following in the Mar. 16 Congressional Record:

"When I picked up this morning's Washington Post, I was gratified to see on the front page a story by Mr. Peter Milius indicating that the Administration's Pay Board has agreed in private caucus to cut back the wage settlement negotiated by West Coast longshoremen. The cutback is not official, but reportedly it will be made official when the board meets today."

U.S. Mediators Enter Philly Dock Dispute

Representatives of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service were meeting with the Philadelphia Longshoremen's union and management in an effort to renew negotiations in a dock strike that began there Mar. 14.

Philadelphia dockers walked out after rejecting a management offer in a nationwide Longshoremen ratification vote and were unable to reach accord by the time a local contract extension expired.

The dispute centered on the number of hours of guaranteed annual income, a union spokesman said. The dockers are seeking 2,000 and the shippers want a ceiling of 1,800.

It was the same situation that occurred in Baltimore where the longshoremen initially turned down the pact but later settled on a compromise of 1,900 hours.

The FCMS said the contract has been settled in Houston and New Orleans and talks are progressing in Mobile, Ala. Contracts have been extended in Boston and Providence, R.I., for further bargaining on local issues.

Meanwhile, ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason was scheduled to meet Mar. 23 with Pres. Harry Bridges of the Longshoremen & Warehousemen to discuss their positions with respect to the Pay Board's cutback of a contract won by the West Coast dockers after a 134-day strike.

There was no indication of how the Pay Board would react to the ILA settlements, which provide first-year boosts of 15 percent. But C. Jackson Grayson, chairman of the Price Commission, announced that shippers would not be allowed to pass along wage costs beyond 5.5 percent as additional charges to customers.

'Help!'

Liberals in Congress Press Tax Reform

Liberal Democrats in both the House and Senate stepped up congressional pressure for tax reform and ripped into the refusal of Pres. Nixon to propose or support loophole-closing measures to lessen a huge budget deficit and finance needed job-creating programs.

In the House, Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and 58 other Democratic congressmen introduced what they termed a "quick-yield" tax reform package.

Its goal, Reuss said, is to "provide $7.25 billion a year in new revenue by closing some of the loopholes in our tax laws which allow many wealthy Americans to avoid paying their fair share in taxes."

Its ingredients include ending the accelerated depreciation gimmick that costs the government more than $2 billion in revenue each year and taxing the income of foreign subsidiaries of U.S. corporations on a current basis. It would also tax capital gains on stocks and assets transferred by gift or at death and tighten the minimum tax provisions which still allow many wealthy persons to pay only token taxes or no tax on large incomes.

None of the proposed reforms, Reuss told the House, would reduce jobs. Some, such as the multinational tax, would increase job opportunities in the United States, and the reform would provide revenue needed for such programs as expanded public service jobs.

A similar but even broader tax reform plan was introduced in the Senate by Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) and 11 of his fellow Democrats.

It includes reduction of the oil depletion allowances and other measures designed to raise $16 billion, part of which would be used to help pay a greater share of state and local school costs.

The sponsoring senators sharply criticized the "value-added" national sales tax being touted by the Nixon Administration.

The "value-added" device was attacked also at a hearing of the House-Senate Joint Economic Committee.

Former Internal Revenue Commissioner Sheldon Cohen warned that its effect would be to "shift more of the tax burden to low and middle-income families."

By contrast, he said, "large amounts of revenue can be raised now by meaningful tax reform—and at the same time we can restore public confidence in the fairness of the system."

Commerce Dept. Scored For Distorting Report

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has charged the Dept. of Commerce with utilizing distorted data, omissions and biased analyses in an attempt to refute organized labor's charge that American multinational firms are contributing to unemployment in the United States.

Meany said that a recent Commerce Dept. report not only misrepresented AFL-CIO views on international trade and investment but its "relevant data" deliberately sought to give an impression of job gains by omitting multinational industries where employment has fallen.

Instead of employment gains "nearly equal" to all of U.S. industry, as the report contends, Meany declared that U.S. multinational corporations are lagging far behind the remainder of U.S. industry in job-creation.

"A fair analysis would show that total U.S. employment rose two and one-half times faster than employment in the 14 industries selected" in the Commerce Dept. report on multinational firms, Meany stated.

He called upon Commerce Sec. Peter G. Peterson—"in the interest of accurate public information"—to correct the report's distortions and its conclusion that "relevant data . . . does not bear out labor's contention that overseas investment operations result in declining employment."

The federation president said that organized labor has asked for legislation to modernize U.S. trade, tax and investment programs "because the world has changed and jobs of millions of Americans are now adversely affected." The Commerce report—seen as a reply to labor's legislative aims—dealt only with the activities of 14 selected U.S. industries having the largest overseas investments.

Meany said that when the report data sought to show the job relationship between the multinational firms and U.S. firms as a whole, it used only the 11 industries that showed employment gains and omitted the three industries with declining employment. The three omitted industries, Meany said, accounted for 44 percent of employment in the 14 industries in 1965. The report thus "omits half of the iceberg," Meany noted.

Further evidence of the report's bias, Meany said, was the failure of the analysis to report that the 14 selected industries have dropped in their share of U.S. employment from 6.2 percent in 1965 to 5.6 percent in 1970. "The analysis is biased and the conclusion is false," Meany concluded.

Memphis Local Back in RWDSU

Memphis, Tenn.—A former unit of the Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union representing 600 workers at the Kimco Co. here is reaffiliating with the international after a two-and-a-half-year absence.

Workers at the plant voted 288-234 to reaffiliate with the RWDSU. The other option was a combined organization of Local 19 of the Distributive Workers of America, and the Teamsters.

As They See It:

Phase Two Made 'Perfectly Clear'

The following column by Russell Baker appeared in the Mar. 16, 1972, issue of the New York Times under the title "The Phasing Chamber."

By Russell Baker

THE NIGHT they invented Phase Two some of the most theoretical economists in America were gathered around a big table at the White House with a man everybody called "Dick."

"At the risk of sounding undynamic," Dick said at a moment when the discussion had become hopelessly murky, "there is not one thing that has been made perfectly clear to me about Phase Two."

One economist said he would try again to show how Phase Two would stop inflation. To do so, he said, he would ask Dick to think in terms of his personal economic situation.

"First off, Dick," he went on, "we set up a Pay Board. Then we tell you, 'No more pay raises, old fellow, unless you get the Pay Board to okay them.' What happens?"

"I go to the Pay Board," said Dick, "and tell them I need a raise, and they come across with the okay."

"That's where you're wrong, Dick," said the economist. "They don't come across with the okay. They say, 'Sorry, Dick, but more pay for you would not be in the national interest.' "

"Oh, yeah? I'd like to see them try it," Dick said. "After I had Spiro make a few speeches about the Pay Board they'd beg me to accept a raise."

The economist said he wished Dick would not think of himself as a man who could summon a Spiro to help him but would imagine for the sake of illustration that he was just another ordinary hundred percent American who had to obey his Pay Board.

"I get the picture now," Dick said. "I can't get a raise."

"Right," said the economist.

"What happens next?"

"We set up a Price Board, Dick. Then anybody who wants to raise prices has to go to the Price Board to get an okay."

"And the Price Board says, 'Sorry, but a price rise for you would not be in the national interest,' " Dick said.

"Wrong, Dick," the economist explained. "The Price Board will study each request for a price raise, and after thorough consideration, will grant it."

"Why?"

"Because it would work hardship and injustice not to grant the price rise, Dick."

"Will it let the price go up on everything?" Dick asked.

"Not everything," the economist explained. "The price of trans-Atlantic air travel will not be allowed to go up."

"What about the price of meat?"

"The sky's the limit," the economist explained.

"And the price of newspapers?" Dick asked.

"Up."

"If everything but trans-Atlantic air travel is going to cost me more," Dick said, "and my pay is frozen, I'm getting poorer by the day."

"Exactly," said the economist. "But that isn't all. Just when you start to squirm we have your local government raise your real estate tax."

"I'm weeping," Dick said.

"Next," the economist said, "we boost the old gasoline tax ——"

"Ayyyy!"

"——and then we okay the usual $300 yearly increase in college tuition ——"

"You're bleeding me!"

"—— and sock your paycheck with another big Social Security tax."

"I won't be able to afford any of the wonderful new American products with the new miracle rising prices," Dick protested.

"We're not finished yet," the economist said. "The beauty part comes when we suddenly decide to withhold a lot more of your weekly paycheck for income taxes so you won't owe the government so much money on income tax day next year."

"Fantastic!" said Dick. "With my purchasing power whittled away, prices will have to fall, and inflation stops."

"That's where you're wrong, Dick. Prices will keep rising."

"Even if I'm destitute?"

"Even if you're destitute."

"What kind of plan is that?"

"Phase Two," the economist said. "The purpose of Phase Two is to give us breathing space to prepare Phase Three."

"What's Phase Three?" asked Dick.

"We don't know yet," the economist said. "We're going to try to think of something while Phase Two is not working."

Four Labor Members Quit Pay Board

AFL-CIO, Auto Workers Brand Nixon Controls as Unfair, Unjust

The public members of the Pay Board reject the charge that they have been part of an "unholy alliance" with business members to thwart the stabilization program, Judge George H. Boldt, board chairman declared.

In a statement on behalf of the public members, Boldt said that he regretted the action taken by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and that it "ignores the achievements of the Pay Board. . . ."

Before adoption of the statement, the Executive Council discussed the general problems presented by the Pay Board decisions and Nixon's economic policies with presidents and officials of a number of AFL-CIO unions and departments present by invitation.

Woodcock announced his resignation in a statement assailing the administration of wage-price controls as "scandalous and unfair" and an "abomination" and called for a congressional investigation. He described the "Nixon controls" as "neither equitable nor effective."

Nixon's statement did not take note of Woodcock's resignation and talked only of the three AFL-CIO members, singling out Meany. He told reporters at the White House press office that no leader representing any special interest could be allowed to "torpedo and sink" a program to protect the public interest. The President did not submit to questions.

The revised structure of the Pay Board is contained in a new Executive Order which also instructs the Price Commission to continue "on course."

The President defended the Administration's economic record on prices and unemployment, said labor had prevailed in many Pay Board actions and that the AFL-CIO spoke for relatively few workers.

The council statement stressed that the AFL-CIO had measured the record of seven months of the Administration's "new" economic policy and four months of Phase 2 controls and concluded that "it is nothing more than a device to make the average worker and consumer both the victim and the goat, while the banks and big busines pile up increasing profits."

Americans are "being gouged at the supermarket and squeezed in the paycheck" and the heaviest burden is falling on "those at the bottom of the economic ladder."

The council compared the continuing rapid rise in prices with the Pay Board rulings "holding down workers' wages" while profits are free to rise and interest rates, fresh foods and many other essential expenses of every family go uncontrolled.

There is no effective machinery to enforce what price and rent controls remain on the books, it charged.

It all adds up to a record of "flagrant favoritism" and an economic policy "heavily loaded against the worker and consumer." Neither slick rhetoric nor double-talk can hide the facts that "there is no fairness, no equity, no justice in the Administration's economic program."

Turning to the Pay Board, the council declared that it is "a direct instrument of the Administration's economic policies, motivated by the Administration's political considerations and the interests of big business."

The council said its members joined the Pay Board in good faith and gave it a fair chance "with the hope that we could bring the voice of workers into the decision-making process of an autonomous and genuinely tripartite wage stabilization effort."

Reviewing the record of decisions and the affiliations of the public members of the board, the council said the coalition of industry and public members "revealed a contempt for free collective bargaining and freely negotiated labor-management agreements."

Whatever degree of justice was achieved in the stabilization program has been the work of congressional legislation "imposed on the Pay Board," the statement declared.

Noting its review of the record, the council emphasized:

"It is our duty to report, now, to the membership of the trade union movement and the American public that we have no hope for fairness, equity or justice in the Pay Board."

It added: "We intend at the least to free representatives of the AFL-CIO from any grounds for the inference of complicity in the formulation or execution of those policies."

AFL-CIO DECISION to withdraw from the Pay Board is announced at a news conference by Federation Pres. George Meany.

Labor Battles Industry On Asbestos Standard

Organized labor's campaign to totally eliminate the asbestos cancer hazard boiled down to a struggle between union and industry representatives in four days of Labor Dept. hearings.

Unions want the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to lower the allowable level of exposure to asbestos dust well below the current emergency standard of 5 fibers per milliliter of air.

Although the AFL-CIO, its Industrial Union Dept. and several affiliates endorsed the recommendations of two federal agencies that called for a reduction to 2 fibers, the labor organizations favored a shorter timetable to achieve the limit.

The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health and the Labor Dept.'s Advisory Committee on Asbestos Dust recommend the standard be imposed in two years.

Labor is pressing for the 2 fiber limit within six months. It wants the limit lowered to 1 fiber within a year and eventually to zero.

George H. R. Taylor, secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said an adequate standard must be established for the protection of workers from the asbestos health hazard.

"We are not proposing that it be outlawed," Taylor said, "only that it be used safely and under approved controls and methods."

The industry representatives testifying at the hearings contended that lowering the exposure limit on asbestos would be too costly, some claiming "there is no evidence to warrant the lowering of the limit to 2 fibers."

But several medical experts on asbestos told the Labor Dept. that mesothelioma cancer can develop in workers even below the 2 fiber limit.

The Textile Workers Union of America said in its presentation that to maintain "a standard of 5 fibers per milliliter would be equivalent to a license to kill."

The TWUA and the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers pressed strongly for a zero exposure limit.

In a pre-hearing conference, IUD job safety specialist Sheldon W. Samuels pointed out that many asbestos plants are now operating below the 5-fiber level and that the 1-fiber limit can be achieved simply through good-housekeeping practices.

OSHA has until June 7 to promulgate a permanent standard on asbestos dust under the provisions of the federal job safety act.

In other action, OSHA reported that in the seven months ended Jan. 31, 79 percent of the workplaces inspected were found in violation of job safety standards. OSHA said that 42,942 violations of standards were "alleged" in 11,856 citations to employers during the period.

These violations resulted in proposed penalties totaling $1,006,250 OSHA reported.

Nixon's Advice on Phase 2 Comes Back to Haunt Him

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany got some real laughter and evoked memories of the recent AFL-CIO convention in Bal Harbour when he advised newsmen "if you think prices are not going up, ask your wives."

Last November Pres. Nixon told the delegates to the federation's convention that the wage-price freeze was a great success "and if you don't think so, go home and ask your wives who go to the grocery stores." The comment was greeted with laughter —the disbelieving kind.

The White House built the laughter into "jeers" and spread the story to all news media that the President had been treated rudely. Meany responded later at the convention that Nixon had been treated properly and respectfully and that the President "came here to contrive a situation under which he could claim that he had been unfairly treated."

ings—actual buying power—for the average worker with three dependents falling 24 cents to $94.06 weekly.

"The price control program is a sham," Meany said.

"While prices are going up, workers' wages are being held down. As a result of these unfair and inequitable trends, the buying power of the average worker's wages is being cut.

"The victims are workers and consumers. The beneficiaries are big business and banks," Meany said.

Meany also suggested that if the White House wanted to assess blame for the soaring cost of living, it need look no further than the Administration itself.

"Responsibility for these developments rests clearly with the Administration and its policies of blatant favoritism for big business profits," Meany said.

Responding to a remark by White House Press Sec. Ronald Ziegler, who implied that labor leaders who resigned from the Pay Board were out to sabotage Nixon's economic stabilization programs, Meany declared:

"If the President's press secretary is looking for the source of the sabtotage of the government's so-called anti-inflation program, let him examine the Administration's own policies and their record of dismal consequences for the American people."

The Consumer Price Index rose to 123.8 in February, meaning that the same consumer goods and services that cost $10 in the base year of 1967, now cost the worker $12.38.

A longer view of inflation is provided by a comparison of today's prices to the 1957-59 period. What cost $10 then, now costs $14.39.

Grocery store prices for food rose 1.9 percent during February—the biggest increase for any one month since March 1958.

More than 70 percent of that increase was attributed by the BLS to the cost of meats which rose a walloping 4.6 percent last month and were up 11.2 percent over the year.

Fresh fruits and vegetables—exempt from economic controls—rose 2.5 percent, or 10.0 percent since February 1971.

The overall price of food, including both supermarket prices and restaurant meals, rose 1.6 percent, up 5.4 percent over the year.

The Nixon Administration, in the person of Agriculture Sec. Earl L. Butz, has defended the rising price of farm products, particularly meat, in testimony before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Butz, in a newspaper account inserted in the Congressional Record, is quoted as saying that the reason meat prices are so high is that "Mrs. Housewife has so much income—supplemented with food stamps and everything else—she has created a tremendous demand for meat."

Consumers who feel meat prices are too high should either switch to less expensive meats or "not eat quite so much," Butz said.

The BLS said that about one-fifth of the increase during February was due to price boosts on items exempt from Phase 2 regulations.

In addition to food, other large increases were recorded for telephone and electric services and women's apparel, especially prices on new spring fashions.

The February increase in consumer prices followed a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent during January.

E. H. Williams, Union Leader In South, Dies

Shreveport, La.—E. H. (Lige) Williams, a veteran trade union leader in the South, died Mar. 17 after suffering an apparent stroke two days earlier.

Williams 76, has been director of AFL-CIO Region VII covering Louisiana and Mississippi since the beginnings of the AFL-CIO. He previously served as a regional director for the AFL in the area.

A member of Barbers Local 161 in Shreveport, Williams served for a number of years as the president of the Louisiana Federation of Labor. He was active throughout his trade union career in political and legislative activities and recently was instrumental in organizing hotel workers in New Orleans and shipyard workers in Pascagoula, Miss.

Burial services were held on Mar. 19 in Shreveport with a wide attendance of trade unionists from Louisiana and Mississippi.

Wallace and the Far Right

IF A LEOPARD could talk, it could change its speeches, but not its spots.

The same is true of George Wallace. He can talk. And he has changed his speeches. But he's got the same old spots.

One of them represents a long and close association with the American right wing, an intimate relationship that comes from shared experience and viewpoint, from the use of the same catch-phrases with the same unspelled-out meaning behind them.

The most recent evidence that this affair between Wallace and the right holds firm came in an article Wallace wrote for the December 1971 issue of American Opinion, publication of the John Birch Society.

The piece is loaded with the cliches of the right wing: "promotion of socialism at home," "the longhairs of the 'liberal' media," "moving the country leftward toward total government," "radical TV and newspaper journalists," "to re-establish constitutional government," "radical (court) decisions based on fuzzy sociology," "the Establishment's pointy-headed pseudo-intellectuals and Harvard half-bakes."

To the Soles of His Feet

George Wallace is "a bigot, a racist. And he is anti-labor right down to the soles of his feet." —AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, press conference, Feb. 14, 1972.

The fact is, Wallace is a darling of the right wing, and has been since 1963 when he "stood in the schoolhouse door," and started blasting away at the federal government. He has kept his fences mended with the right wing since the end of the 1968 campaign:

- August 1969—Wallace was keynote speaker at Billy James Hargis' Christian Crusade convention. Hargis is one of the right wing's best-funded leaders.
- December 1970—Wallace was featured speaker at John Birch Society annual dinner.
- May 9, 1971—In a you-pat-my-back-I'll-pat-yours gesture, Hargis returned Wallace's 1969 favor and addressed a Wallace rally.
- May 28, 1971—Wallace proclaimed this as John Birch Day in Alabama, lending the prestige of his office and his state to one of the nation's major rightist organizations.
- September 1971—At a Wallace rally in New York, the benediction was delivered by Dr. Carl McIntire, whose regular radio broadcasts over hundreds of stations form the base of the right-wing propaganda mill in this country.
- December 1971—Wallace supplied lead article in John Birch Society publication American Opinion.

In courting and keeping an alliance with the right wing, Wallace is hanging around with some awfully flakey thinkers. Robert Welch, for example. It was the JBS chief who called the late Pres. Eisenhower a "conscious, dedicated agent of the Communist conspiracy."

Symbolically, the right wing was beside Wallace when he "stood in the schoolhouse door" in 1963, and it's with him now while he stands in the school bus door—and it's been with him all the way on denial of human rights.

Phony Busing Issue Roadblocks Drive for Quality Education

By John P. Roche

LAST SEPTEMBER in this space, I concluded an examination of the busing problem by suggesting that "we somehow move the wild men at both ends of the busing fight off to an island some place while the rest of us get down to the business of education."

Emphasizing the phony quality of the debate—which was just beginning—I argued that "it is the quality of the education at the end of the bus ride that counts. There is no point in riding kids across town or country just for the trip."

I wouldn't change a word of that column today, but, alas, instead of the wild men going off to an island to scream at each other, they settled on Florida.

From the day George Wallace arrived in Florida and—unlike us "pointy heads"—parked his bicycle straight, the debate over busing lost all contact with reality. As usual, the party of sanity got caught in an enfilade and its position—that it is the quality of education that counts, not the bus-ride—got tagged as a cop-out, as a compromise with "racism." It was almost as if George Wallace and John Lindsay had conspired to transform an educational dispute into a racial confrontation, each for his own political ends.

This is perhaps the place to pay tribute to Florida Gov. Reubin Askew. He could have stood aside and let the storm blow out. He certainly was aware of the risks involved in raising the flag of sanity. But he refused to take a dive. He is the kind of man that justifies one's faith in the democratic process and I want him to know—for whatever it may be worth—that I would be proud to be known as an Askew Democrat. What separates the men from the boys among politicians is that the men know when not to compromise.

While only an idiot would deny its racial implications, busing is not fundamentally a racial issue. As in the furious debate over public housing in Forest Hills, N.Y., class and race have been hopelessly confused. Most kids going to poor schools are not black: 80 percent of the American poor are white and they have not been dedicated to zero population growth.

Every morning at 7:15, the bus picks up my daughter and takes her to public school. It is an excellent high school, well-subsidized by property taxes in a wealthy suburb. If the same bus were going to take her to school in a white section of Boston or Cambridge, a school suffering from financial malnutrition, overcrowded, and largely populated by youngsters with no educational aspirations, I would be out screaming my head off.

But before you write me off as a self-made snob, let me add that I would vigorously support a program to bring students from these marginal schools—black or white—to attend our high school. Beyond that, I agree completely with the California Supreme Court, and other state courts, that local property taxes should not be the basis of school funding.

I DON'T SEE that we have any divine right to build a wall around our town, develop a fine school system, and lay out perhaps twice as much money per student as other neighboring systems. Particularly when in fact our tax level may be lower than those in other cities or towns, where a declining tax base has led to increased charges on individual property.

In other words, the underlying sentiment in the anti-busing configuration is our old acquaintance: "Let the poor rot." Whether the poor are black or white is fundamentally irrelevant.

However, the obligation of our society is to provide quality education for all its youngsters —which may or may not require a bus trip, but will certainly require a major reorganization of the units of public education and the expenditure of a lot of money, state and federal.

For openers, why not reinstate the 10 percent federal surtax on income, and specify that the money thus obtained be used to help equalize educational opportunity? This is not a pleasant message, but unless one is ready to pay the cost, he has no right to talk about quality education.

'No Hope for Equity':

Statement by AFL-CIO Executive Council

Following is the text of a statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Mar. 22, 1972.

SEVEN MONTHS of the Administration's so-called new economic policy—including four months of Phase 2 controls—have demonstrated that it is nothing more than a device to make the average worker and consumer both the victim and the goat, while the banks and big business pile up increasing profits.

In the guise of an anti-inflation policy, the American people are being gouged at the supermarket and squeezed in the paycheck. The heaviest burden of this lopsided program is placed on the backs of those at the bottom of the economic ladder, who are least able to protect themselves. Meanwhile, millions of American workers remain unemployed, their wages frozen at zero, with no real prospect of relief.

The continuing, rapid rise of prices—such as February's 8.4 percent yearly rate of increase in wholesale prices—reveals the emptiness of the price control program.

Retail food prices have gone through the roof and are continuing up—eroding the buying power of American families.

WHILE THE ADMINISTRATION permits this rising tide of price increases, its Pay Board persists in holding down workers' wages. Yet profits are free to rise, without even the pretense of controls. Instead of a tax on excess profits, in a period of wage controls, the Administration has provided business with additional billions of dollars of tax bonanzas, reducing federal revenues and further inflating the deficit at the expense of the nation's most pressing needs.

Even the President's Council of Economic Advisers reports that 21 percent of the Consumer Price Index is not subject to any controls at all. Further exceptions are announced almost weekly and the Price Commission approves price boosts on a wholesale basis.

Interest rates were never controlled. Neither were fresh foods, which are part of the essential expenses of every family.

There are no controls on life insurance premiums, mortgage interest payments and the prices of land and homes. Neither are there controls on used cars, used furniture and other used goods which are bought primarily by the poor. Controls have been lifted from three-quarters of all retail stores and nearly half of all rental units.

Moreover, there is no effective machinery to enforce whatever price and rent controls remain on the books.

IN THE FACE of this record on the price front, the Administration has flouted the intent of the Congress to exempt the working poor and low-wage workers from wage controls. The Administration's Cost of Living Council exempted only wages below $1.90 an hour—less than the amount needed to meet the government-defined poverty line for an urban family of four.

Wage increases for workers in even the smallest establishments require approval if they exceed the Pay Board's 5.5 percent guideline, although their employers are not required to file any notification about price or rent increases and may be completely exempt from such controls.

So the worker's wages are regulated and controlled, even when his employer is exempt from controls, while prices continue to "bulge."

As a result, profits have begun to skyrocket, despite the disappointing levels of sales and production, and continued heavy unemployment. In the second half of 1971, the after-tax profits of all corporations were up 19 percent from the same period of 1970—nearly three times faster than the 6.6 percent increase of total wage and salary payments to all of the nation's employes.

THE LION'S SHARE of the gain in profits is going to the big corporations and conglomerate giants. Reports indicate that the nation's 100 largest corporations scored a sensational 76 percent rise in profits last year.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported on Mar. 3 that the average hourly earnings of some 47 million production and non-supervisory workers in the private economy remained unchanged between January and February, at $3.54, and were merely 3 cents above December. While prices are going up and profits are soaring, workers' wages have been held down.

The record of flagrant favoritism speaks for itself. The Administration's so-called new economic policy is heavily loaded against the worker and consumer, in favor of the profits of big business and the banks, and is dominated by the view that economic progress begins and ends in the stock market and the corporate financial report.

Slick rhetoric and double-talk cannot hide these self-evident facts from the American people. There is no fairness, no equity, no justice in the Administration's economic program.

THE TRADE UNION movement's direct relationship with the Administration's control program has been with the Pay Board.

It is our duty to report, after four months' experience with this Board, that it is merely a direct instrument of the Administration's economic policies, motivated by the Administration's political considerations and the interests of big business.

We joined the Pay Board in good faith, desiring—despite our misgivings—to give it a fair chance, and with the hope that we could bring the voice of workers into the decision-making process of an autonomous and genuinely tripartite wage stabilization effort.

A few weeks after the Pay Board was created, we reported to the Ninth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO on Nov. 18: "The trade union movement joined the Pay Board on the basis of a commitment from the President that it would be tripartite and independent and that the public members would be citizens of high repute, knowledgeability and neutrality. That commitment has not been kept."

The so-called public members are neither neutral nor independent. They are tools of the Administration, and imbued with its viewpoint that all of the nation's economic ills are caused by high wages.

As a result, the Pay Board has been completely dominated and run, from the very start, by a coalition of the business and so-called public members. All major board decisions have been concocted by this coalition, with its mechanical majority of the votes. The trade union movement's representatives on the board have been treated as outsiders—merely as a facade to maintain the pretense of a tripartite body.

THE BOARD'S BUSINESS and so-called public member majority has continuously revealed a contempt for free collective bargaining and freely negotiated labor-management agreements. They have shown an utter lack of understanding or sympathy for workers and the realities of industrial life.

In a supposedly free country, in time of peace, with no national emergency defined or like sacrifices required of the affluent elements of society, it is not tolerable to subject free American workers to control at such hands.

The system of wage controls, under the Administration and business-dominated Pay Board, has extended a web of confusion and chaos in labor-management relations across the country. It has been a device to undermine and wreck free collective bargaining.

IT IS BUILDING UP inequities, distortions and pressures that can only be suppressed by more and more controls and acts of repression.

Complex and sometimes contradictory regulations and reporting requirements have added confusion. Smaller unions and newly organized groups of workers, in particular, have been vulnerable to the stalling, the mix-ups and confusions.

Responsible collective bargaining agreements have been rejected and the Pay Board majority has been imposing the terms of settlements on the parties.

Equities have been ignored and workers have been denied basic rights.

Whatever small degree of justice has been achieved in the stabilization control program—such as the granting of deferred increases that were due, during the 90-day freeze, under previously negotiated agreements—has been the work of congressional legislation, imposed on the Pay Board.

ALTHOUGH ADMINISTRATION spokesmen engage in public lectures on the urgent importance of increasing productivity, and provision for the recognition and reward of greater productivity is expressly incorporated in the enabling law, the Pay Board has given this issue short shrift so as to leave the major benefits of productivity gains in the pockets of employers. The rejection of the West Coast longshore agreement, for example, will mean an average loss of about $1,150 for each of the 15,000 workers on the docks in the 18 months of the contract and a $17 million windfall profit for the employers.

The Pay Board is an integral part of the Administration's effort to place the burden of its failures on the backs of workers, while providing favors and financial gains to those who already have too much.

On Nov. 18, we reported to the AFL-CIO Convention: "There is little hope that economic justice can be achieved by this board, the majority of whom are guided by the dictates of the Administration or the interests of big business."

We have reviewed the events of the past four months. We have carefully examined the record.

IT IS OUR DUTY to report, now, to the membership of the trade union movement and the American public that we have no hope for fairness, equity or justice in the Pay Board.

The board is not tripartite. It is not independent and autonomous.

The Pay Board represents government control. It represents political and business interests.

If the wage stabilization program is to be government-controlled, let it be so, openly and clearly. Let the people who are exercising the power take the full responsibility for their decisions—without the facade of labor representation and the pretense of tripartitism.

The AFL-CIO members, therefore, are immediately resigning from the Pay Board.

WE WILL NOT BE a part of the window-dressing for this system of unfair and inequitable government control of wages, for the benefit of business profits.

It is now very clear that the Administration's "new" economic policy is nothing more nor less than a means of shifting to the average working man and his family the burden and the blame for the dismal failure of its former economic policy. It is an effort, at the expense of personal and institutional freedom in this country, to avoid the measures, resisted by big business and other selfish interests—such as constructive tax reform—most needed to correct the consequences of that failure. Having as we do a deep disbelief in and distrust of the aims and purposes of this Administration's economic and social policies, we intend at the least to free representatives of the AFL-CIO from any grounds for the inference of complicity in the formulation or execution of those policies.

UNANIMOUS DECISION to leave the Pay Board in protest against its "contempt for free collective bargaining" was made at this meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. In addition to council members, presidents of a number of other unions sat in on the session.

WORKERS WHO LOST JOBS to the flood of imports are among the first to sign a petition urging Congress to enact the Burke-Hartke bill to limit the invasion of foreign products. The jobless workers appeared at a rally sponsored by the New York Union Label & Service Trades Council in an effort to enlist 2 million trade unionists in New York State to sign the petition. Among the jobless workers at the rally were hundreds from a Long Island electronics factory that closed down after switching production to a low-wage overseas operation which is shipping products back to the United States.

Senate Approval Shifts Attention On Women's 'Rights' to States

The debate over the proposed "equal rights" for women amendment to the Constitution shifted from the Senate to the 50 state legislatures.

After rejecting a long series of proposed changes, the Senate approved the amendment in the same form it passed the House last year. The one-sided 84-8 margin was well over the required two-thirds.

If 38 states ratify it—the required three-fourths—the Constitution will include the statement that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex."

The Senate, as did the House, refused to modify the language to preserve state laws intended to protect the working conditions of women workers—as the AFL-CIO had urged—or to exempt women from the draft.

Women's organizations first launched the drive for a constitutional amendment in 1923—only a few years after women were given the right to vote. Actually, many of its original objectives were achieved in the equal pay legislation passed by Congress and in recent Supreme Court decisions that struck down sex barriers as contrary to the 14th Amendment.

But the campaign continued to pick up momentum and, despite concerns that needed protections might be discarded in the same pan as outmoded double standards, only a handful in Congress voted against the constitutional change.

In other congressional action, there was movement on two labor-supported bills—minimum wage improvements and a retroactive pay bill affecting more than 200,000 blue-collar employes of the federal government.

On the minimum wage front:

- The House Rules Committee, which has bottled up wage-hour amendments approved by the House Labor Committee last November, agreed finally to consider the legislation at an Apr. 11 meeting. With the House Democratic leadership strongly supporting the bill, it is expected to be cleared for House action a few days later.

The House bill would boost the minimum for workers covered before 1966 to $2 an hour, with an intermediate $1.80 step for those more recently covered. Farm workers, now frozen at a $1.30 level, would advance in steps to $1.70. For the first time, coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act would be extended to millions of public employes and to some 1.5 million household workers.

- A Senate Labor subcommittee meanwhile took its first series of votes on the minimum wage bill sponsored by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.). The panel approved an initial increase to $2 and $1.80 as in the House bill. But it also agreed to an additional raise to $2.20 for most workers the second year, with those covered since 1966 reaching the $2.20 level through two annual step-ups.

The Senate panel still has to act on coverage and farm worker wage scales.

With both Administration and labor support, the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee voted unanimous approval of a bill designed to remedy some of the inequities of Pres. Nixon's wage control actions affecting federal blue-collar workers whose pay is based on prevailing wages for similar jobs in their areas.

Some 60,000 workers in localities where wage surveys had been ordered before the Aug. 15, 1971 freeze have already been granted retroactivity under a comptroller-general's interpretation of the Economic Stabilization Act.

The new legislation would affect workers in areas where wage surveys had been held up by presidential order. Nixon did not cancel his six-month delay order until Jan. 11, 1972—after Congress had overridden a similar attempt to delay for six months a scheduled salary increase for white-collar employes.

To make amends, the Administration has backed a bill to make all wage adjustments retroactive to their normal effective date—regardless of whether the delay was the result of the 90-day freeze or the six-month deferment order.

Back pay raises, the Civil Service Commission said, would range from two weeks to three months and would affect 47 labor market areas.

The full House and Senate must still act on the legislation.

Unemployment Jump Pinned To Runaways

St. Louis — Increasing overseas investments by large U.S. firms are a major factor contributing to the nation's high unemployment rate, George Collins, assistant to the president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, declared here.

"Our members don't like their employers to shut the plant doors on them and open up new plants abroad," Collins said. He spoke at the annual labor-management conference sponsored by the St. Louis AFL-CIO, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, and the Industrial Relations Association of Greater St. Louis.

Collins said that the growing trade deficit—the surplus of imports over exports—was caused mainly by the international expansion of major businesses.

"Finished manufactured goods—long the bulwark of the U.S. economy—were 39 percent of our imports in 1964 and 56 percent in 1970," he pointed out.

He also said that corporations increased expenditures abroad by 22 percent between 1969 and 1970 while their domestic expenditures rose only 5.5 percent.

For these reasons, Collins said, organized labor supports enactment of the Burke-Hartke bill to regulate imports and the activities of multinational corporations.

He pointed out that most consumers are unaware that many products bearing "Made in U.S.A." labels contain parts made abroad. Most electronic parts in television or radio sets marked "Made in U.S.A." are manufactured in foreign countries, he said. And he predicted that the last manufacturer of home radios in the country would close soon.

Kirkland Hits HEW:

Cover-Up Charged On Medicare Costs

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged the Nixon Administration with pulling "a cloak of secrecy" over evidence documenting the failure of insurance companies to control costs under Medicare.

Kirkland called on Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Elliot Richardson to release "Contract Performance Review Reports" compiled by HEW on the record of the insurance companies.

He said the Administration's refusal to release the reports can only be because their contents would make it difficult for the Administration to explain why it wants to use the same companies in a national health insurance program.

The only security damage in releasing them, Kirkland asserted, would be to the "political security the insurance industry now receives from the Nixon Administration."

Speaking at a meeting of the Health Security Action Council, he reminded the group that only the Kennedy-Griffiths National Health Security bill contains an adequate commitment to health care as a right for all Americans.

Kirkland charged that plans advanced by Pres. Nixon and the insurance industry only "pay lip service to health care as a right."

"But when it comes down to the task of making the right a reality," he noted, "the ranks begin to thin.

"All of a sudden, health care becomes a right if a person has enough money to pay the deductibles. Or if he never becomes unemployed. Or if he accepts a lower standard of care."

He said the millions of Americans who have been shortchanged by the health insurance industry were now demanding a rational health care system.

"The millions who are denied health care now because they are 'poor risks'—a phrase that means they are black or old or poor or they get sick—are demanding their right to quality medical care," he declared.

Kirkland also accused the Administration and the insurance lobby of employing delaying tactics in Congress because "they know that a powerful and persuasive case is being documented against the performance of insurance companies."

He urged the Health Security Action Council to make the Kennedy-Griffiths bill a major issue in the 1972 election campaign.

Meanwhile, he urged the council to "work toward the best possible bill out of the Ways & Means Committee" and not be sidetracked by attempts to delay needed reforms through such plans as the catastrophic insurance concept. He said that catastrophic insurance alone is a "political expedient . . . a step backward . . . the worst possible solution."

Also addressing the day-long meeting were Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock and a panel of doctors who explained exactly how National Health Security would work and how it would be financed.

Woodcock hit the Administration plan for national health insurance as one that would "stifle reforms." He admonished the Administration to "quit chasing buses and worry about the real problems of this country."

The present system of health care, Woodcock said, is an "uncontrolled monopoly that is autocratically run and only semi-functional."

He noted that the United States spends more than any other country in the world on health care, yet ranks 22nd in male life expectancy, seventh in female life expectancy and 14th in infant mortality.

A Question of Credibility:

Emergence of New Memos Further Clouds ITT Case

By David L. Perlman

It was all a figment of someone's imagination.

The memo that linked the settlement of the Justice Dept.'s antitrust suit against ITT to the corporation's hefty contribution to the Republican convention fund never existed.

That's what ITT says nearly a month after the text of the memorandum carrying the name of its Washington lobbyist was printed in newspapers throughout the nation.

To Republicans who have been sweltering from the political heat of the ITT scandal, the firm's change of tactics brought a faint breath of hope.

No longer was it necessary to discredit Mrs. Dita Beard, the ITT lobbyist who fled Washington and entered a Denver hospital for treatment of a chronic heart condition. She had been described as a heavy drinker who was sometimes "irrational."

But now, Mrs. Beard was rallying to the defense of her employer and the Nixon Administration by asserting that the memo was a "forgery."

And ITT security officials, who had fed documents from her files and other corporation offices in Washington into a paper-shredding machine, had salvaged an entirely different memo written by Mrs. Beard that didn't deal with the antitrust settlement.

Not only that, but they had found in Canada a woman who worked for six weeks last summer as a temporary secretary in the ITT Washington office.

In a remarkable feat of memory, she recalls typing still a third version of the Beard memo, containing some of the paragraphs in the text reprinted by Columnist Jack Anderson. But she was certain that the memo she typed last July didn't contain the incriminating language linking the antitrust settlement to the convention contribution.

No damaging memo, no scandal, no obstacle to the confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as Attorney General, no influence-peddling issue to haunt Pres. Nixon's re-election campaign.

At least that appears to be the wishful thinking in the Administration-ITT camp.

But the giant multinational conglomerate, whose top officials admittedly found doors swinging open for them in the White House as well as in government agencies, seems to have acquired some new credibility problems.

The Wall Street Journal reports that executives and directors of ITT sold large personal holdings of stock during the weeks before the details of the antitrust settlement were made public. Although the settlement terms had been proposed by ITT, they involved divestiture of several subsidiaries and pushed down the market price of the stock by $7 a share the day the news was announced. The heavy sales by insiders began the day Kleindienst told ITT's top officials of the agreement.

Corporate officials are prohibited by law from profiting by inside information. But the corporation's senior vice president insisted to the Wall Street Journal reporter that it was merely a "coincidence" that top officials sold $8.1 million in ITT stock before the news became public and the price dropped.

There was at least a suggestion that the White House was seeking to shake off the image of a cozy relationship with ITT—at least while the odor of possible scandal hangs over the firm.

ITT Pres. Harold S. Geneen had explained the big contribution to the Republican convention fund by its Sheraton Hotels subsidiary as good business. He said it would bring "unbuyable publicity for ITT" if its new hotel in San Diego were to serve as Pres. Nixon's headquarters.

That hope was dashed when White House Press Sec. Ronald L. Ziegler told newsmen that Nixon has no plans to make the Sheraton Hotel his convention headquarters.

But then, maybe ITT will get its money back. California Sec. of State Edmund G. Brown, Jr., filed a federal court suit seeking to force the Republican National Committee to reject ITT's offer of funds for the San Diego convention. Brown argued that the contribution would violate the federal Corrupt Practices Act.

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Voter Registration

The Senate on Mar. 15 voted 46-42 to kill a bill that would have allowed potential voters to register by mail and would have established a standard 30-day residence requirement for federal elections.

The AFL-CIO supported the bill and the position of the 42 senators who voted against the tabling motion that killed the legislation.

Nixon's Stand On Bus Issue Tied to Politics

"Ever since his inauguration, the President has consistently opposed increasing the appropriation for the program designed to improve schools attended by the disadvantaged," Meany said.

"He twice vetoed congressional efforts to increase federal funding of the nation's schools—including tens of millions of dollars for aid to disadvantaged schools."

There is no need for new legislation to improve educational opportunities for the disadvantaged, the AFL-CIO president declared.

"An excellent law is already on the books. What is needed and what has been lacking, however, is presidential leadership to encourage Congress to increase the appropriations to their full authorized level."

As for the "busing moratorium" Nixon has proposed, Meany termed it "a cynical attempt to reward those who said 'never,' and to undermine the moral leadership of those citizens who endeavored to comply with the Constitution and the Supreme Court's 1954 decision."

Because "the AFL-CIO remains firm in its commitment to quality, integrated education," Meany said, "we are, therefore opposed to the President's current political maneuvers on this question."

Penn Central Warned On Proposed Layoffs

cause the National Mediation Board relinquished jurisdiction Mar. 1, allowing both sides to resort to "self-help" in 30 days.

The board stepped out of the case after negotiations broke off and a proffer of arbitration was rejected.

J. W. O'Brien, the union's vice president in charge of rail negotiations, said that in 15 months little more than token negotiations occurred.

The Sheet Mettal Workers are the only rail shopcraft union that has not settled.

The UTU's Chesser emphasized that the proposed Penn Central cutbacks are a threat to job safety because other crew members as well as workers in related industries and the public would be subjected to additional hazards.

Chesser charged that Penn Central's unilateral action was "premature" under the National Railway Labor Act because the law requires that 30 days must elapse after the National Mediation Board completes its efforts in a case before either of the parties in a dispute may take action.

But Penn Central posted the notices on Mar. 16, immediately after rejecting the mediation board's proffer of arbitration and only two weeks before the proposed cutbacks would take effect.

The railroad has long contended that several thousand workers now on full time pay are not needed for the "safe and efficient" operation of its 3,000 daily trains.

The Dept. of Transportation reiterated the argument in comments it filed with a U.S. District Court in Pennsylvania. It noted that the trustees of the bankrupt Penn Central feel they are carrying an excess of 9,800 unneeded employes.

The Transportation Dept. said the employes were retained only because of existing labor contracts and the Ohio full crew law.

Penn Central said it must cut the 6,000 rail workers to bring the financial status of the railroad to an acceptable state of efficiency.

But Chesser declared that "the troubles of the Penn Central are directly traceable to gross mismanagement by railroad officials, past and present."

He said the contemplated lay offs represent "just another effort by that railroad to convey the idea that its employes are responsible for its difficulties."

Rail Health, Welfare Gains Aid 550,000

About 550,000 railroad workers and their dependents are receiving significant improvements in health-welfare benefits under an agreement negotiated by 19 unions with the nation's carriers.

A tentative accord was reached last Dec. 10, but it nearly came apart when the railroads began to back away on agreed-to benefits. Finally, just a day before the existing health-welfare program was to expire, the managements consented to what they earlier had agreed to.

Chief gains made by the unions include an increase in hospital coverage from a maximum of 180 to 365 days a year per confinement, a raise in the ceiling on major medical expense coverage from $20,000 to $50,000, and boosts in payments for surgery, anesthesia and out-of-hospital psychiatric care.

The pact provides for immediate reinstatement of insurance coverage for workers returning from the armed services. It also calls for expanded maternity benefits.

The program, which is entirely paid for by employers, runs from Mar. 1, 1972, to Mar. 1, 1974.

30-Day Limit Implied:

State Laws Curbed On Voter Residency

State laws that impose lengthy residence requirements for voting are unconstitutional, the Supreme Court ruled in an historic 6-1 decision.

The court's action will make it possible for an estimated 4 to 6 million persons who would otherwise be disenfranchised to vote in all elections.

Federal law now permits persons who meet only a 30-day residence requirement to vote for President. But until the court decision, they could be barred from voting for other offices on the ballot if they didn't meet state residence requirements—commonly six months or one year.

With only Chief Justice Warren E. Burger dissenting, the court overturned a Tennessee law that required persons seeking to vote to have lived at least one year in the state and three months in the county.

The language of the decision, written by Justice Thurgood Marshall, clearly implied that any residence requirements exceeding 30 days would fail the constitutional test.

The AFL-CIO, along with other groups seeking to broaden voter participation, has long urged a 30-day limit on residence requirements. The same week the court handed down its decision, the AFL-CIO was testifying at a House hearing for a national voter registration law and citing the "shocking fact" that millions of Americans were prevented from registering in the last election "by arbitrary and restrictive residency requirements." The federation testimony also criticized "unnecessarily stringent absentee ballot requirements."

Marshall's decision in effect represented the unanimous views of the remaining members of the old "Warren Court."

Pres. Nixon's two most recent appointees, Justices Lewis F. Powell, Jr., and William H. Rehnquist, did not take part in the case. Justice Harry A. Blackmun, while voting to overturn the Tennessee case, wanted to do so on narrower grounds and protested the scope of Marshall's decision.

Chief Justice Burger's dissent complained that the court's ruling contradicted a decision the Supreme Court had handed down in 1904 which, he said, "is as valid today as it was at the turn of the century."

Marshall, writing for the court majority, considered and rejected each of the reasons advanced for a residency requirement for voting.

A 30-day period, backed up by criminal laws against fraud, is adequate to permit election boards to verify residence, he said.

As for the argument that longer residence is needed to become a knowledgeable voter, Marshall noted that the states do not require any evidence of familiarity with issues and candidates from longer residents.

Besides, he added, with modern communications media, the bulk of campaign activity and voter education takes place during the month before an election.

The case was brought by a Vanderbilt University law professor who was denied the right to vote because he had moved to Tennessee in June of the election year.

Supreme Court to Review Right Of Union to Fine Strikebreakers

The U.S. Supreme Court says it will decide whether it is legal for unions to fine members who submit resignations during a strike and then engage in strikebreaking.

The high court has upheld union fines before, but in a case where members worked during a strike without first sending notices of resignation to their union.

The National Labor Relations Board contends that unions do not have the right to fine members after they have submitted resignations from the union.

Several federal appellate courts have reached differing conclusions over union fines for strikebreaking. Recently the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans upheld fines imposed by a Machinists local, but the case presented a narrower issue than the one the Supreme Court has now agreed to consider.

The issue before the Supreme Court is posed in a case from New Hampshire where 31 members of the Textile Workers Union of America broke a 1968-69 strike at the Nashua, N.H., plant of the International Paper Box Machine Co. after they sent resignations to the union.

The Granite State Joint Board of the TWUA tried each of the 31, imposed fines of a day's pay for each day worked during the strike, and attempted to collect the fines in state court. At that point, the NLRB ruled that the fines were illegal under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The 1st U.S. District Court in Boston disagreed, and the NLRB appealed to the Supreme Court, which said the case will be heard next fall or winter with a decision expected the following June.

In 1967, the Supreme Court voted 5-4 in upholding the right of the Auto Workers to fine union members who crossed picket lines during strikes at two Allis-Chalmers plants in 1959 and 1962. The workers were still members of the union when they broke the strike.

The strike at the Nashua firm was approved during a meeting of the local attended by most of the members including the 31 strikebreakers.

The union took the position that the strike vote bound the 31 workers to support the strike to its conclusion, and the appellate court agreed.

Judge Edward M. McEntee wrote in the unanimous opinion that although the Taft-Hartley Act "gives an employe the right to refuse to undertake and involve himself in union activities, it does not necessarily give him the right to abandon these activities in mid-course once he has undertaken them voluntarily."

The Machinists case grew out of a 1970 strike of the Mason & Hanger-Silas Mason Co. in Amarillo, Tex., during which one member worked throughout the strike. Two days after the strike began, the local received a letter of resignation from the strikebreaker.

After the strike, Machinists Local 1255 attempted to fine the employe an amount equal to wages received for strikebreaking, stipulating that he could not be a member of any IAM local until the fine was paid.

The worker filed an unfair labor practice charge and was upheld by the NLRB, which was subsequently reversed by the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

But the opinion of the circuit court did not rule on the entire question of whether a union can fine a resigned member who broke a strike.

Instead, the court said, "we hold that a union member who resigns during a strike and crosses his union's picket line to return to work may be fined by the union for his post-resignation strikebreaking when the fine is enforceable only by expulsion from the union."

"We express no opinion on the broader issue raised by the parties but not presented by this case of whether the [Taft-Hartley] Act permits a union to levy fines for post-resignation conduct that are ostensibly enforceable in court or by any means other than expulsion from union membership."

Job Lag Erodes Impact Of Manpower Training

Labor participants in a two-day conference marking the 10th anniversary of the Manpower Development & Training Act joined in applauding the program's successes—but added a strong note of constructive criticism.

Howard D. Samuel, vice president of the Clothing Workers and a member of the national advisory committee to the Labor Dept.'s Manpower Administration, stressed the AFL-CIO view that "training without jobs is a snare and delusion."

Job training can be only one part of "a broadscale attack, through both government and private resources, on our twin problems of unemployment and poverty," he said.

A series of panels, involving participants from government, industry, labor and universities, explored both the experiences of the first years of the manpower program and the projections for the decade ahead.

Samuel told the conference that there is "nothing less productive than to offer training to a disadvantaged teenager and then tell him to walk the streets when there are no jobs."

On the conference theme of looking ahead to the second decade of the program, Samuel termed the Administration proposal to turn the bulk of the manpower program and funds over to states and cities through a revenue-sharing device "an abdication of responsibility."

Abandoning federal direction, he warned, "would make it difficult to maintain the essential integrity of the manpower program, to make sure that manpower training is not distorted into subsidizing low-wage employers, undermining existing wages and working conditions, aiding runaways, helping high labor turnover in jobs which do not really need training before hiring."

Samuel recited the long record of trade union sponsorship and cooperation in manpower programs, including the Outreach program that has recruited and trained thousands of minority group members for apprenticeships in 75 cities.

Overtime Wage Standard Upheld on 10-Hour Day

Government contractors will still have to pay overtime rates after eight hours a day, the Labor Dept. announced.

The department held hearings last September to consider proposals, backed by a number of employer groups, to allow firms providing goods and services to the government to pay straight-time rates up to 10 hours a day under a four-day workweek arrangement.

The AFL-CIO and a group of affiliated unions testified in strong opposition to any change in the eight-hour standard. The AFL-CIO statement stressed that federal laws dealing with work on government contracts "must continue to protect workers against excessive hours of work per day, as well as excessive working hours per week."

A formal notice from the Labor Dept.'s Employment Standards Administration said the hearing failed to turn up sufficient evidence to justify a 10-hour day without overtime at present.

Crafts Seek Closer Link To Architects

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. is seeking to establish a close working relationship for the first time with the American Institute of Architects, which represents 24,000 architects across the nation.

The BCTD has inaugurated a series of meetings between the department's executive council and top representatives of the association.

Discussions will focus on such subjects as industrialization of the building process and the respective roles of architecture and labor, a joint scholarship program for apprentices or journeymen who wish to become architects, urban housing, seasonal problems, and construction financing problems — including the cost of money.

Meany Says Price Policies Aid Profits, Hit Consumer

Nixon Plan Seen Slight To Elderly

By John R. Oravec

Pres. Nixon acknowledged the plight of older Americans, but proposed little to improve their lot in his recent message to Congress, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged.

Seidman said the 5 percent increase in social security benefits that Nixon is recommending would not bring much relief to the elderly poor. He pointed out that it would not even keep their incomes in pace with the fast-rising prices.

Few new programs were outlined in the President's lengthy message, Seidman noted. And those already had been introduced by liberal members of Congress or proposed at the recent White House Conference on Aging.

Older Americans need vastly-improved services and more money to live on, he said. "But the message offered little on services and almost nothing on income."

More in line with the needs of retired workers is a 20 percent increase in social security benefits as proposed by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), Seidman observed.

The Mills proposal comes close to the 25 percent two-step increase urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council—15 percent retroactive to Jan. 1 and another 10 percent improvement next year.

The President prodded Congress for action on H.R. 1, the bill that

FAILURE OF PRICE CONTROLS is stressed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he shows members of the Price Commission how some food processors have reduced quantities in cans and packages without cutting prices. Meany told the panel that this instance of deceptive packaging demonstrates the "utter impossibility" of controlling prices with the commission's small staff.

Cites Lack Of Tools for Enforcement

By Tom Castor

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged that the Nixon Administration never intended to give the Price Commission the tools for effective enforcement of price controls and even if it had "the Price Commission's policies are designed to benefit big business and not consumers."

"The Price Commission is not controlling prices," Meany said in testimony before the panel. And he brought with him an AFL-CIO survey to prove it.

He also brought sacks of groceries to demonstrate price violations through deceptive packaging, underscoring the enormous scope of the problem of controlling prices. A mere 3,000 Internal Revenue Service agents are not enough to police the prices on 10 million units in the economy, Meany declared.

"There is no program for price reductions as such," he pointed out, charging that the Price Commission "is more concerned with profit margin maintenance and total profit expansion, no matter how large or profitable a company may be."

"And until the chairman's warning that some companies may have violated the profit rules is translated into firm, legal action, the consumer has every right to be suspicious."

Meany told the commission that "consumers question why every subsidiary of ITT that sought an increase received the full amount of their request," noting that some of the increases granted "make a mockery of the so-called 2.5 percent rule."

Layoff Threats:

House Acts to Curb Pollution Blackmail

By David L. Perlman

The House voted to turn the spotlight of public exposure on firms that try to blackmail workers into opposing government curbs on pollution by threatening plant shutdowns if the company is forced to comply with clean-water regulations.

A labor-supported amendment requiring the Environmental Protection Agency to investigate such employer scare tactics was one of the few changes the House made during two days of debate on water pollution control legislation.

After the amendment, sponsored by Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), was adopted by a 274-118 vote, the House approved the entire bill by a 378-14 margin.

The next step is a conference to reconcile the House and Senate versions of the legislation. The Senate bill generally provides stricter anti-pollution standards and a stronger federal role; the House version authorizes more federal funds to enable states and cities to contruct waste treatment plants.

Both the House spending authorization of $18.3 billion in construction grants over four years and the Senate figure of $14 billion for the same period are substantially higher than the Nixon Administration's recommendation of $6 billion over a three-year period. The total House package carries a $24.6 billion price tag.

The Ford amendment was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO, the Steelworkers and other unions whose members have been put over the barrel by employer warnings that their jobs would be endangered if the government demanded costly equipment or operating changes.

The dilemma this poses for workers is especially cruel because there is seldom any way to determine whether an employer is bluffing in

Labor Blasts Sugar Worker Wage Holdup

The Nixon Administration was raked over the coals at a House hearing for cheating thousands of low-paid sugar cane workers out of a meager 10-cent hourly raise by postponing the effective date of a new minimum wage order until the harvest season was over.

It was "unconscionable," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller declared. It shows how far this Administration will go "to assure windfall profits for corporations at the expense of workers."

The legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, which has adopted the cause of the unorganized

Mediator Cole Joins Disputes Plan Foes

David L. Cole, long-time labor mediator and arbitrator, told a Senate Labor subcommittee he was strongly opposed to Pres. Nixon's proposal aimed at banning strikes in the transportation industry and imposing a compulsory arbitration system.

Cole joined another veteran mediator, Theodore W. Kheel, in opposing the Nixon plan. Kheel previously testified against the proposal, calling the so-called "final offer selection" provisions "compulsory arbitration at its worst."

More opposition was registered before the Senate panel by two representatives of railroad unions who condemned bills that would impose compulsory arbitration and urged enactment of legislation which would allow selective strikes.

Cole warned the senators that "unacceptable things are hard to make work in our society," citing the case of New York public employe strikes even after passage of the Taylor Law which forbids strikes in the public sector.

Cole pointed out that there have been more strikes by New York public employes since the law was passed than there had been before.

"There is no sign unions intend to comply if they feel they have an injustice," he said.

Nixon's Education Bill Called Do-Nothing Plan

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to reject Pres. Nixon's "do-nothing" approach to equal educational opportunities.

Quality schooling for disadvantaged youngsters requires money, not presidential rhetoric, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis testified at Senate hearings.

There is no new money in the Administration bill with the "impressive title" of the Equal Educational Opportunities Act, Davis stressed.

It is touted as a means of achieving quality education for disadvantaged youth without busing. But it is strictly "a political document," the AFL-CIO charged.

Davis, who was joined at the witness table by Assistant Legislative Director Kenneth Young and Assistant Education Director John A. Sessions, said labor rejects the Administration approach because it "would do nothing, when so much needs to be done."

Not only doesn't it provide any additional funds for education, he noted, but it would take away funds the hope of saving money if community pressure leads to a relaxation of pollution standards.

Under the House version, which is not in the Senate bill, workers or their union could obtain an investigation by the Environmental Protection Agency of employer threats or claims.

The agency, at the request of any party, would be obligated to hold public hearings and issue a fact-finding report of the effect of an anti-pollution order on employment.

During the debate, a number of congressmen cited examples of employer tactics aimed either at avoiding extra costs or unjustly shifting the blame for a shutdown to the anti-pollution programs.

Ford noted that Union Carbide, after first insisting that massive layoffs would be necessary to comply with pollution standards, finally conceded that it could in fact continue operations.

And Rep. Lloyd Meeds (D-Wash.) told the House of a pulp mill shutdown in his district that the owners blamed on environmental requirements when other economic factors were responsible.

The amendment adopted by the House would not shield workers from economic hardships if their employer decided to close a plant or curtail operations because of pollution control requirements.

However, Chairman John A. Blatnik (D-Minn.) and other members of the Public Works Committee promised to explore methods of lessening the hardship on workers in a Public Works & Economic Development bill currently being considered by the committee.

Most of the debate over the bill centered on the efforts of a group of House members, led by Representatives Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), to toughen the federal anti-pollution standards to bring the measure closer to the Senate version. Their amendments were rejected by substantial majorities, leaving a thorny problem for the House-Senate conference committee.

Meany Assails Threat Of Penn Central Layoffs

A Penn Central proposal to lay off 6,000 brakemen and conductors Apr. 1 "is another example of the callous and cynical attitude of big business toward the working people of this country and the interests of the public," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged.

Pres. Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union, which represents the 6,000 workers along with 12,000 other Penn Central employes, vowed retaliatory action if the proposed cutbacks are put into effect.

Both the UTU and Penn Central were meeting with the National Mediation Board in an effort to settle the dispute even though the carrier previously refused a proffer of arbitration by the board.

The trustees of the bankrupt Penn Central have indicated a desire to cut back as many as 9,800 employes.

Meany characterized their proposed action as "an effort to make labor the scapegoat for bad management."

The federation president noted that "labor has already contributed more than its full share to the Penn Central—the labor force has declined since the 1968 merger from 102,000 to 85,000 at present."

If nationalization of the Penn Central is the answer as company Pres. William H. Moore hints, Meany said, "then let us face the facts, but let us not present the public with a railroad overburdened with debt."

Pres. Nixon announced as the AFL-CIO News went to press that he would issue an executive order under the Railway Labor Act before the midnight Mar. 31 deadline to block a strike by either the United Transportation Union or the Sheet Metal Workers for 60 days.

"Penn Central's problems must be examined and understood before they can be corrected. The role in Penn Central's failure by speculators, holding companies, merger promoters and other financial manipulators should be brought under public scrutiny."

Meany emphasized that "these financial freeloaders must not be given more dollars to gamble with at the expense of the public safety—and safety would be sacrificed under this scheme as surely as the incomes of these 6,000 families."

Meany said that nationalization of the carrier is no substitute for competent management, but if it must be done, "labor insists that the public get all the facts in order to make sure it is getting a railroad, rather than opening a financial pipeline to private profiteers."

Elsewhere in the railroad industry, 6,000 shopcraft workers represented by the Sheet Metal Workers were still at an impasse with the nation's carriers. The union has been unable to reach a settlement after 15 months of talks.

The workers are free to strike as of Apr. 1, 30 days after the Mediation Board relinquished jurisdiction.

Cole Says It Won't Work:

Disputes Plan Hit By Noted Mediator

Cole said he could not conceive of final offer selection working in the railroad sector because of the technical nature of collective bargaining in the industry.

Railroad agreements sometimes run to 100 pages, and Cole suggested that either side might take advantage of the procedure to propose a wage increase favorable to the other party in order to slip in work rules that could not be understood by the selection board in the short time it had to operate.

He said a railroad emergency board on which he served in 1948 worked for months on the issue of a 40-hour week for railroad workers.

Besides serving on such emergency boards, Cole is a former director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and has served as chairman of the New Jersey State Mediation Service and a member of the National War Labor Board.

Currently he is an arbitrator and mediator of labor disputes and an umpire under the AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan.

The two witnesses representing railway unions before the subcommittee were James E. Yost, president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. with which shopcraft unions are affiliated, and Edward J. Hickey Jr., counsel for the Railway Labor Executives' Association, which represents 15 unions including the shopcrafts.

Both spoke in favor of a bill that would allow limited selective strikes on the railroads so as to provide an incentive for collective bargaining without creating a national emergency.

The particular bill they favor was introduced by Senators Harrison Williams (D-N.J.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.)

Yost stressed that rail unions have sought to avoid nationwide shutdowns by turning to selective strikes on a few carriers—an approach upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.

However, the railroads have sought to convert such limited strikes to national emergencies by imposing drastic nationwide changes in working conditions in an effort to force Congress to step in.

The Williams-Kennedy bill would prevent such tactics, Yost said.

He emphasized that the Administration bill and an amended version submitted by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) would not only impose compulsory arbitration, but would wreck many provisions of the Railway Labor Act that have no bearing on emergency disputes.

Among these would be the Railroad Adjustment Board, which disposes of grievances, and the representation and mediation functions of the National Mediation Board.

Yost said if these bills became law they would "create a chaotic situation, junk years of experience and expertise in handling minor disputes and create more problems than would be solved."

Hickey opened fire particularly on the Packwood bill, which would extend compulsory arbitration to regional as well as national disputes.

He said he shared the view of many critics that it is "the most vicious anti-labor bill that has been considered in this century."

Nixon's Education Bill Called Do-Nothing Plan

voted by Congress to help school districts carry out legitimate desegregation programs.

The Administration's companion bill, to suspend busing as a tool of school desegregation, is before another committee. But Davis, noting that the Administration considers the two measures "separate but equal," warned against any move "to turn back the clock on desegregation efforts."

While recognizing that "the overwhelming majority of people do not like so-called massive busing," Davis said the AFL-CIO—unlike the President—believes that most people "do want quality, integrated education."

He told the Senate panel that "the AFL-CIO has long supported other remedies such as educational parks, magnet schools, the more effective schools program . . . but we also know that busing must be available as a tool when other remedies fail."

Unlike the President, Davis also noted, the AFL-CIO has "consistently recognized that compensatory education costs money. The word 'compensatory' means to make up for a loss, and the loss to disadvantaged students extends beyond the classroom. The 'make up' doesn't come cheap," he stressed.

In previous administrations as well as this one, Davis reminded the Senate panel, the AFL-CIO has pressed for full funding of the federal aid to education program which authorizes billions more than Congress has ever appropriated or any administration has sought.

But it was Pres. Nixon who twice vetoed bills that would have closed part of the gap between the authorization and the appropriations.

If the vetoed bills had been permitted to become law, Davis pointed out, "tens of millions of additional dollars already would have been spent to bring quality education to the disadvantaged."

The AFL-CIO testimony traced some of the twists and turns of Nixon's rhetoric on compensatory education. Some 18 months ago, he was warning that large sums spent for compensatory education too often raise hopes that are dashed.

But, Davis noted, "the President now goes on national television to cite the need for compensatory education. He would have us believe that he can solve the busing controversy with new compensatory programs that somehow require no new money."

Stiff Penalties Backed For Hiring Illegal Aliens

Employers who hire and exploit aliens who have entered the United States illegally should face stiff criminal penalties, the AFL-CIO urged at House hearings.

A statement by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller endorsed portions of an Administration bill that would make an employer who knowingly hires an illegal border-crosser subject to a year in prison and a $1,000 fine for each offense.

Failure to inquire about the citizenship status of a prospective employe or ascertain that a non-citizen had an alien status that permitted employment would be considered evidence of willful violation, under the legislation introduced by Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-Ohio) and several co-sponsors.

Biemiller's testimony, presented by Legislative Rep. Kenneth Meikeljohn, stressed the distinction between controlled, permanent immigration that has nourished the American economy and the use of illegal immigrants as a source of cheap and unprotesting labor.

"America is a country of immigrants," the AFL-CIO said, and "must continue to be a haven of liberty for the persecuted and oppressed."

This role, the federation warned, "is threatened by the increasing number of persons who enter this country illegally, take jobs needed by the unemployed in our own land, and work at substandard wages paid by exploiting employers. This process is robbing large numbers of American citizens and legal immigrants of their jobs and it continually threatens to undermine fair wage levels in other industries."

Even though more than 300,000 illegal aliens were apprehended in 1970 alone, the statement noted, the number in the United States has been estimated at close to 1.5 million.

"Because of their illegal status," the AFL-CIO said, "these immigrants are easy subjects for blackmail, exploitation and intimidation by unscrupulous employers and can easily be forced to accept sweatshop conditions for fear of being turned over to the immigration authorities for deportation if they object."

While strongly urging a stronger crackdown on employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, the AFL-CIO objected to holding the alien who takes a job equally guilty with the employer.

"Because many aliens who come to the United States are not versed in our customs and many are handicapped by language differences," the federation said, "we think it harsh to make the taking of a job . . . without proof of a willfull or knowing intent to violate the law a criminal offense."

No Tools for Enforcement:

Meany Says Price Policies Aid Profits, Hurt Consumer

The ITT subsidiaries with products ranging from military communications systems to bakery items have been granted price increases of more than 7 percent in some cases, according to Price Commission news releases. Most of their allowed increases were well above the 2.5 percent guideline.

Meany noted that a token force of tax collectors is being used to administer price controls that require a vastly greater enforcement staff during wartime periods of controls.

"I don't think you have the tools" to control prices, Meany stated time and again to the commission.

"I don't think the Administration will give you the tools. I don't think they intended to give you the tools. They expect you to control prices by pronouncements, and that just is not happening."

He defended organized labor's withdrawal from the Pay Board as necessary because of the gross inequities between wage control and price control under Pres. Nixon's economic policies.

In short, Meany said, "we didn't fail Phase 2, but we are completely convinced that Phase 2 has failed America."

"Wages are enforced . . . by a volunteer force of willing and able employers," he said.

"But with more than 10 million units to be covered, price controls —such as they are—are assigned to a small force of some 3,000 Internal Revenue Service agents, who find it virtually impossible to understand and interpret complex, confusing and changing Price Commission guidelines, rules and regulations, let alone enforce them."

Even if the commission had effective enforcement machinery, it is doubtful that prices would be controlled in view of the commission's composition and its rulings to date, Meany suggested.

He told the commissioners bluntly that the "very composition of the Price Commission is an affront to fairness" because there is not one single consumer representative on the commission.

"Instead, there are so-called 'public' members—all of whom have had a history of corporate connections. The 'public' is composed of consumers, not just corporate consultants or directors or trustees."

Meany illustrated his charge not only by listing price increases granted, but by citing the commission's exemption policies.

He pointed out that the commission had exempted 45 percent of all rental units from controls, and "as if this were not enough the Price Commission informed landlords how they could get more" than the 2.5 percent guideline for rent increases.

Also exempted, he noted, were retail establishments with less than $100,000 in annual sales. These represent 75 percent of all retail establishments in the country, although not 75 percent of all sales.

There never were price controls on such things as life insurance premiums, mortgage interest payments and the prices of land and homes, Meany observed.

And he cited the commission's decision to exempt all used items from controls, such as used cars "and other goods which are bought primarily by the poor."

"These exemptions reflect the Administration's lack of concern for the American consumer," Meany said.

"It is fair to ask if the Price Commission policies are narrowing the gap between the haves and the have-nots," Meany said, adding that the exemptions and exclusions show the answer is "no."

Meany said that while corporate profits for 1971 were the highest since 1966—up 15 percent over the $40 billion earned in 1970, the income gap between the poorest and the richest has nearly doubled in the past 20 years.

The AFL-CIO survey submitted by Meany included a check of 38 stores in 20 communities in 13 states. The highest markup was 96 percent on the price of spaghetti in a Minneapolis store.

And cameramen flocked around Meany and Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Community Services, as they showed commissioners packaged foods with reduced contents at the same prices charged for larger quantities which looked deceptively the same.

"What I'm trying to show is the extent of this job and the methods that can be used by the people who want to make a profit," Meany said.

"What I'm really trying to point out . . . is the utter impossibility of controlling this with the staff that you have.

"You can't possibly do the job."

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel also submitted a statement to the commission, emphasizing that the entire economic stabilization program is in jeopardy because of the inequities that have been built into it.

The commission did get one pat on the back, however, from Pres. W. P. Gullander of the National Association of Manufacturers, who said the commission "is definitely on the right road."

Pamphlet Sets Forth Stand on Pay Board

The AFL-CIO's position on the Nixon Administration's economic policies and the operations of the Pay Board is available in a new federation pamphlet.

The pamphlet, "The Nixon Economic Program: No Fairness, No Equality, No Justice," contains the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its special meeting in Washington, March 22, spelling out why AFL-CIO members were resigning from the Pay Board.

The publication is available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

THE PRICE COMMISSION is in business to help business, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged during testimony before the commission as he pointed to the absence of a consumer representative on the panel.

Nixon Economic Policies Assailed For Attempt to Rewrite Jobs Goal

The Joint Economic Committee of Congress accused the Nixon Administration of trying to conceal the failures of its assorted game plans by rewriting the definition of full employment.

The committee's Democratic majority termed "totally unacceptable" recent suggestions by Administration officials that full employment can be achieved with a jobless rate above 4 percent.

Even a 4 percent rate should be no better than an interim target, the committee said, with unemployment not higher than 3 percent the "appropriate" full employment goal.

Democrats on the House-Senate panel called for major job-creation measures, including a "substantially expanded" public service program.

Their majority report called also for the closing of "serious tax loopholes" to help finance needed programs and bring about an improved distribution of income.

By contrast, committee Republicans submitted a minority report arguing that Administration policies are on the right track and that the remaining "structural" unemployment problem can be licked by providing better vocational training for young people and women.

The committee minority suggested that paying a lower minimum wage to teen-agers would help bring down their unemployment rate. But seven of the eight Republicans couldn't quite bring themselves to support a higher minimum wage this year.

They struggled with the dilemma in this troubled paragraph:

"We feel that a rise in the present minimum wage for adult workers, while holding the rate at the present level for teenaged workers, might well have very favorable effects on teenage employment. However we question whether any rise in the minimum wage during 1972 is appropriate."

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) disassociated himself from the views of his GOP colleagues on an immediate raise in the minimum wage, noting that even an increase to $2 an hour would not make up for the loss in buying power since the present $1.60 rate was enacted in 1966.

The majority report by the committee Democrats called for linking manpower training programs more closely to the creation of job opportunities.

It called for vigorous enforcement of equal employment opportunity laws, urged resumption of press briefings by nonpartisan Bureau of Labor Statistics experts on the monthly employment and price statistics, and recommended a switch "as soon as possible" from the "cumbersome" mandatory economic controls to "a largely voluntary price-incomes policy."

Both the majority and minority reports were intended as an evaluation and commentary on the President's Economic Report, and followed hearings at which Administration, business, labor and academic experts presented their views.

Pilots Denounce Move To Shift Flight Physicals

A proposal to put physical examinations for pilots in the hands of air line management has been denounced by the Air Line Pilots as a possible threat to pilots and their unions and as being "in stark disregard of the public interest."

The ALPA was joined by the airlines themselves in opposing the change. Only six of the 40 carriers have the capabilities to provide physicals for the pilots who number 35,000. The government requires an annual physical examination for most and a semi-annual checkup for captains.

In all, 100 parties have expressed objections to the proposal, including the independent Allied Pilots Association which represents 4,000 pilots at American Airlines. The remainder are represented by the ALPA.

The Federal Aviation Administration is seeking to scrap the present system under which a pilot can select one of more than 2,000 private doctors designated as aviation medical examiners by the government to certify pilots as physically able to fly.

Dr. P. V. Siegel, the FAA air surgeon, has charged that a small group of pilots are using "easy doctors" to escape detection of such ailments as alcoholism, heart disease and mental problems.

Siegel claimed that one doctor performed more than 3,000 pilot examinations in one year. He said that 23 examiners did a total of 18,000 in 1971.

But ALPA Pres. John J. O'Donnell termed the charges "groundless" and said Siegel had failed to produce any evidence to support them.

The ALPA president said he had been informed by a "high official" in the Transportation Department that the real reason for the proposed rule change is not to police "easy doctors" but to allow the FAA to trim its budget by shifting the pilot examinations to the airlines.

Capt. Rod Gilstrap of the ALPA's aero-medical committee pointed out that the association "has repeatedly offered to work with the FAA in investigating Dr. Siegel's charges."

"Although the association has been turned down in every instance, the offer still stands," he said.

The proposed change would not only give the airlines power to examine their pilots once or twice a year as required by law, but also whenever "there is reason to believe a pilot is not physically qualified."

The ALPA argued that the rule change would give the airlines power to weed out pilots they find objectionable for other than physical reasons.

O'Donnell noted that the same procedure for certifying pilots as fit to fly has been used for the past 44 years and that there has never been a "jet air transport accident attributed to pilot incapacitation in the entire experience of free-world air transport."

"Any proposal to delegate the federal safeguards set up to continue this superb record would constitute nothing less than a stark disregard of the public interest," he declared.

He said the FAA proposal has been opposed by virtually every segment of the aviation and aeromedical communities. The airlines dispute the FAA's legal authority to delegate the responsibility for physical examinations.

Siciliano Stays On Pay Board For Business

Pres. Nixon chose Rocco Siciliano, president of a Los Angeles holding company, as the one business member to remain on the restructured Pay Board.

The number of business members was reduced by four after the resignation of four labor members —AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, Machinists Pres. Floyd Smith and Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock.

The revamped board will include the five original "public" members, Siciliano and Teamsters Pres. Frank E. Fitzsimmons.

Siciliano is president of the Los Angeles-based TI Corp. He served as an Assistant Secretary of Labor in the Eisenhower Administration and as Under Secretary of Commerce in the first two years of the Nixon Administration.

He has been president of the Pacific Maritime Association, the employer group which negotiates with the Longshoremen & Warehousemen.

The business members who stepped down from the Pay Board are Virgil Day, a General Electric Co. vice president; Robert Bassett, president of Bassett Publishing Co.; Leonard F. McCollum, chairman of the board of the Continental Oil Co., and Benjamin F. Biaggini, president of Southern Pacific Co.

Prices and Wages

THE BURDEN of controlling price inflation must rest with the Price Commission. It is not enough to hold down wages and expect that to be the solution.

Wages, in fact, are at a standstill. But prices and profits continue upward.

Average hourly earnings for non-supervisory workers in the private economy stood at $3.54 an hour in February 1972, the same as in January and barely over the $3.51 reported for December.

Productivity shot up in 1971 to 3.6 percent over the previous year, well over the average gain of 3 percent per year for the past 20 years. Unit labor costs for 1971 rose 3.2 percent, less than the increase in productivity.

By contrast, the costs per unit of non-labor payments rose twice as much—by 6.4 percent. Non-labor payments include profits, depreciation, interest, rent and indirect taxes.

According to Standard & Poor's annual surveys of industrial companies the total of wages, salaries and fringe benefits average approximately 28 percent of sales—not 100 percent as the public is led to believe. The 72 percent of the sales dollar in manufacturing is for non-labor payments and materials costs.

PERHAPS THE greatest flaw of Phase 2 is its lack of credibility. The AFL-CIO has stated many times since 1966 that if an economic stabilization program is necessary we would cooperate. But we insisted that such a program must be based upon equity and equality of sacrifice, and that controls must be imposed fairly and firmly on all prices, profits, dividends, interest rates as well as wages.

In the face of its one-sided, half-hearted and haphazard attempts to manipulate the economy and stem inflation, Phase 2 does not have—and does not deserve—the confidence of the American people. A recent Gallup poll shows that 62 percent of the American people are dissatisfied with Phase 2, and they have reason to be dissatisfied.

The rigid, political nature of wage controls and the virtual elimination of retail price controls is only one reason for the ever-widening gap of disenchantment, disbelief and dissatisfaction.

The others include the failure of the Administration to come to grips with profits and the high cost of money; the failure to impose controls on all foods; the opposition to the clear marking of all items with base and current prices; the reluctance to establish adequate enforcement machinery; the refusal for many months to report to complainants about the disposition of their complaints; the avoidance of vigorous prosecution of violators; the failure to recover overcharges for consumers; the confusing guidelines; the contempt for consumer participation in the determination of policies, guidelines and pricing decisions; the opening of new loopholes; the failure to protect the public from price gougers; the refusal to insist that, under certain conditions, prices should be rolled back.

WE WILL NOT BE a party to hoodwinking the American people. This commission has got to decide who it is serving: the Administration, big business or the public.

The only fair answer would be "the public," but it is obvious that in price control—as in wage control—concern for the worker and consumer is at the bottom of this Administration's priority list.

A Word Edgewise:

Hard World Realities Shake Revolutionaries on Campuses

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE CENTRAL ambiguities of the great college rebellion which broke out in the late 1960s concerned the relationship of the university or college to the community as a whole. While on one hand the student insurrectionists denied absolutely the old doctrine of in loco parentis (that the administration had a parental relationship towards its students), they were equally insistent that they not be treated like ordinary members of society.

In essence, they wanted special status—like clerks in the Middle Ages who were not responsible to the civil authorities. Their demand was in fact preposterous: they wanted to employ the campuses as counter-insurgency centers against our "wicked, immoral, repressive, etc.," society and enjoy immunity from any counter-measures the society might take.

To be specific, a group of these credit card revolutionaries would seize the administrative offices of a university, or a building, or would disrupt public meetings and classes and then claim sanctuary from the civil authority. If they had pulled a similar set of stunts in, say, the labor movement, the boys in blue would have had them en route to the jug (or perhaps the hospital) in half an hour.

But administration after administration, confronted by these stormtroopers, waffled around, offered amnesty, negotiated—did everything but pick up the phone and call the cops. In short, this witless claim to be beyond the jurisdiction of both university and public authority was given de facto validation.

That party is over. Instead of calling on the oppressed masses to rise, the "revolutionaries" of the 1960s are now writing somber fables about the rise of fascism. Although on the basis of their nihilist actions, they have every right to be scared, they are wrong again. But their paranoia does have one useful by-product: it keeps them out of circulation. (A member of one sect told a colleague of mine that "radical" groups no longer held meetings because they had all been "infiltrated.")

But after the parade (or the riot) come the street-cleaners. In 1972 the students have returned to the important business of education, but in a totally different environment from that which existed in, say, 1964. During the pseudo-crisis of the late '60s, the faculties and administrations of most institutions of higher learning gave away the keys to the kingdom.

That is to say, they eliminated the campus authority structure. If the students didn't like the grading system, abolish it. If the students wanted credit for courses in astrology, or witchcraft, or candle making, give it to them. Above all, since they were now certified adults, let them manage campus discipline.

(Parenthetically, I don't blame the students for this—when I was their age, I pushed as hard as I could against the constraints of "the system." The guilty parties are the men and women of my generation who, slightly frightened, somewhat obsessed with the cult of youth, refused to stand up and fight for the legitimate values of the academy.)

Particularly difficult for the students was the absence of any body of enforceable community sanctions. If the guy in the next room wants to "do his thing"—which is playing the hi-fi at 70 decibels all night long—what do you do?

THE DEAN SUGGESTS that, since he is not in loco parentis, it is your problem: work it out with him, perhaps it is just a "failure of communication." The guy with the hi-fi, however, tells you there is no communication problem, he knows you don't like it, and that, baby, is tough—try to learn to like it.

Out in civil society there is a remedy: you call the cops. And I am pleased to report that at a nearby university there has been a real breakthrough on this front. A number of students in a dorm did not like their neighbors' addiction to marijuana; they told them so with the predictable response; they then called the local police, who came equipped with all the procedural niceties and arrested the offenders.

This is known as living in the real world—it is almost worth course credit.

TV Interview:

Meany on Quitting Pay Board '...We Can't Do Any Worse'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appeared on NBC's Today show Mar. 27 for an interview with Irving R. Levine and Bill Monroe. The following is excerpted from the interview.

REPORTER: Mr. Meany, the President pointed out that the labor members of the Pay Board agreed with something like two-thirds of its decisions. Now, with your quitting the board, against that record, doesn't it appear that you wanted not just most, but all of the decisions to go your way?

MEANY: That's really an over-simplification. The labor members of the Pay Board, in most of those cases, were faced with the idea of voting for one or two alternatives and, of course, they took the lesser of the two evils. But that doesn't indicate that the labor people had anything to do with the decision.

REPORTER: Was there less agreement by the labor members with the Pay Board than those statistics indicate, in your view?

MEANY: There was really no agreement at all when you look at it.

REPORTER: Mr. Meany, why was it not reasonable for the board to hold the dock workers down to a 15 percent wage increase, even though they wanted and had signed an agreement for 20 percent, in view of the fact that the board's guidelines were 5½ percent for most raises and, in view of the fact that in the eyes of most Americans, 15 percent is a pretty big raise.

MEANY: Well, you see, the dock workers, in the last 10 years had 184 percent increase in productivity—according to the dock workers. According to the technicians over at the Pay Board, they had 150 percent increase in productivity over the last 10 years. They had a 30 percent increase in productivity in the last contract. Now, this means millions of dollars to their employers. And, of course, the whole idea is to keep down prices. Now, this so-called settlement by the Pay Board puts $17 million into the pockets of the employers who had signed to pay this. It is taken out of the pockets of the housewives of these members and given to the employer.

Now, what does that do to meet the price problem? In what way does that affect the price problem? Now, then, the background of this, of course, is that the President, Mr. Shultz and all the economists working for the government—all the so-called technicians, technical and legal economic experts—have been saying you have to get paid for productivity and you have got to prove productivity in order to get paid.

Well, here, people have productivity far in excess of what they are asking, so they are looking at it as a matter of simple justice and not comparing it with someone else. But, I ask the question, how does this help in meeting the price problem, by taking this $17 million from the housewives—the wives of these members—and giving it to the employer, after the employer had already agreed, in writing, to pay this. Now, how does this meet the price problem at all?

If that money were to go back in the treasury, or that money had to be reflected in reduced prices, but, you see, there is no companion action by the price board at all. In other words, this money goes and they can do what they like with it.

Does that help solve the problem of inflation? Or does that money being given these workers really make the problem worse?

REPORTER: Do you believe you will receive as good rulings off the Pay Board as you did . . .

MEANY: I am sure we can't do any worse. In fact, I have an idea that now Mr. Nixon has made the Pay Board a public board—I think this is a step in the right direction. I think in the interest of truth, however, he should take the next step and declare it is a government board—which it really is. It is a government board, it is controlled from the White House. I don't say Mr. Nixon controls it. He has about 40 hatchet men in the White House that do these things for him. Maybe it is Mr. Colson, maybe it is Mr. Bell, maybe it is Mr. Connally, maybe it is Ron Ziegler. I don't know who it is, but it is not controlled by the members, it is controlled from the White House.

REPORTER: On this program last week, Sec. of the Treasury Connally expressed some surprise at your timing. He wondered why you chose this moment to get off the Pay Board. Was there some political motivation?

MEANY: No, there was no political motivation. It was sort of the last straw. This had been coming. You must realize, Mr. Levine, we said at the outset that we would accept controls, provided they were tripartite and they were fair and equitable. Now, a fair and equitable tripartite board has an equal amount of public members balanced off by management and labor members. We said that this board was stacked against us from the start. I said that last November and you can look up the record. And then we turned around and said, all right, we are going to try to make this work.

I was amazed at the reaction—the almost hysterical reaction from the Administration. Mr. Ziegler talked about sabotage; the President talked about torpedoing the Pay Board; Mr. Gray of the Dept. of Justice, he compared me with the robber barons of old—I was the worst of these and all this. I wonder what he is going to say about Harold Geneen of the ITT when he is looking around at robber barons. But this is the reaction. And we said nothing about sabotaging. You can read our statement—1,600 words in that statement, and not a word about sabotage, not a word about non-cooperation. We just made up our minds that we couldn't sit on a board where the labor people felt that we had a hand in making the decisions when we did not have a hand in making decisions.

Giveaways Assailed:

Tax Loopholes for Business Spur Call for 'True' Reforms

NEW PRO-BUSINESS tax breaks added to the federal law last year have regressed the whole system and increased the urgent need for true tax reform, AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor charged on Labor News Conference.

"The most glaring need is for a major effort to overturn the business income tax giveaways" written into the 1971 law, that will cut corporate tax payments some $100 billion over the next decade, Cantor declared. He said that among the gimmicks that ought to be repealed are the "so-called 'asset depreciation system' . . . the investment tax credit and . . . the giveaway that allows corporations to spin off into export subsidiaries."

Cantor said, "It doesn't make much sense to encourage industries to invest money in additional machinery and equipment when only 75 percent of the existing machinery and equipment are in use." He said that Nixon Administration claims that "the quick write-off and the investment credit . . . would create jobs" haven't panned out.

"All we've seen is a tremendous budget deficit . . . along with a tremendous increase in profits," Cantor asserted, while unemployment continues to hang at high levels.

Cantor urged "elimination of the special tax treatment for capital gains," which, he said, "is a wild, crazy loophole that erodes the whole tax system."

He turned aside the contention that plugging the capital gains loophole would discourage industry's "incentive to invest," stressing that "to the extent you can reform the tax laws so they're much more equitable, you put more money into the pockets" of consumers who buy the goods and services industry produces.

"That's the appropriate way to get investment," he said, noting that "when corporations see that they're going to sell their products, they're going to start investing" in improvements and expansion.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

RECENTLY LABOR SEC. James D. Hodgson met with some of the top executives of the Dept. of Labor to discuss "our accomplishments of last year and our objectives for the current one."

The official "DOL Management Memo" on the meeting provides extensive quotes from the secretary. To anyone following the mounting, unsolved problems faced by the nation and the department, the unreal world of the secretary comes as a shock.

He leads off discussing the new safety and health program as an example of "how well the department performed last year both with respect to administration and accomplishment," saying:

"Here is a very large program with many constituencies and many built-in potential problems. But we have avoided many of these difficulties and surmounted others.

"This program is an example of good, hard-hitting management. I say this not just from my third-floor office, but from all the comments and feedback I have been getting from trips to the field, from business and labor groups and others."

As a matter of record, few programs of the Dept. of Labor have come under sharper fire from organized labor than the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Even the two authors of the legislation, Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.), have threatened oversight hearings. Many medical authorities are distressed over decisions on occupational health.

Probably no problem so directly affects the Labor Dept. as heavily as unemployment, which has remained near 6 percent for a substantial period under the Nixon Administration.

When Congress passed the Emergency Employment Act last summer there was considerable reluctance within the Administration to move. In fact, Nixon vetoed the first piece of legislation.

Now, in discussing it, Hodgson says, "we've done uncommonly well with it. The problems have been minimal and we've nailed them down. There are complexities, but they are containable. . . ."

Among the "minimal" problems may be included the fact that the initial goal set by the Labor Dept. of 150,000 jobs under the act resulted in only about 119,000.

And in observations on the unemployment problem, Hodgson declared that it "transcends our ability and our responsibility." Then he added: "And yet I have the annoying feeling that we should be doing more to help solve it."

This is the strongest statement made on the unemployment crisis in the memo.

HODGSON ADMITS that "we do have to record some minuses, too."

One of these was the "misleading publicity received by BLS last year." This was a reference to stories that the Bureau of Labor Statistics was undergoing major changes in data analysis programs and personnel which would result in a more favorable picture for the Administration.

Some key BLS officials were eased out and BLS now reports that six major changes in data analysis procedure are being worked out.

Hodgson characterizes as "most unfortunate" the "publicized squabble with the AFL-CIO headquarters."

The secretary says this "doesn't reflect any change in our continuing desire to get along with organized labor . . . We will still be receptive to labor; our doors are still open and fairness still continues to be our guideword."

But "getting along" with labor is a far cry from representing the working man. If organized labor thinks that the nation's workers need their own Cabinet-level champion, it's not unreasonable.

TRUE TAX REFORM is the only way to offset the unfair breaks businesses get in the federal tax system, including new gimmicks added to the law last year, AFL-CIO economist Arnold Cantor, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Mike Posner, left, of Reuters news service, and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

'Trigger' Rate Halts Extended Aid, Long-Term Jobless Bear Brunt

Many thousands of long-term jobless workers were dropped from the unemployment compensation rolls as the Labor Dept. announced the "triggering off" of a nationwide program of extended benefits for persons who have used up there regular state benefits.

Only an estimated 17 states will continue to pay the added 13 weeks of benefits—those with a rate of insured unemployment that is both high and also substantially above the level of the previous year.

The ending of the national program came despite the fact that the nation's unemployment rate, as measured by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, has remained at high recession levels.

But the more restrictive category of "insured unemployment"—which counts those receiving benefits as a percentage of those employed in firms covered by the unemployment compensation law—dipped below 4.5 percent for three consecutive months. Under the law, that cancelled the nationwide extended benefits program.

James O'Brien, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, pointed out that the insured unemployment rate is not an accurate reflection of the overall national jobless rate.

Since not all workers are covered by insured benefits, O'Brien said, the insured rate usually runs 1.5 to 2 percent below the overall rate.

Among workers excluded from insured coverage are young people just entering the labor force, workers who fail to file for compensation, long-term jobless who have exhausted their benefits, and others who are disqualified for particular reasons.

Extended jobless benefits covering all states are provided in the Employment Security Act Amendments of 1970. The earliest that this program can be triggered on again will be in late June.

During January, the Labor Dept. reported that the national program paid out $33.6 million in extended benefits to 347,370 workers who had exhausted their regular jobless payments.

Even so, the AFL-CIO has charged, a large number of workers did not collect extended benefits because many states failed to notify them that they were qualified for the aid.

Legislative Rep. Clinton Fair said in a recent Labor News Conference radio interview that claims were much higher in states where notifications were made than in states where workers were not told about the extensions.

For example, he reported that in Florida, which notified the long-term unemployed workers, 56 percent of them applied for the extended benefits. But South Carolina did not inform the unemployed of their rights, and only 32 percent of the eligible workers filed claims for the additional benefits.

O'Brien, who appeared on the same program, pointed out that although about 2 million workers exhausted their basic jobless benefits in 1971, only about 400,000 were collecting extended benefits.

Fair and O'Brien urged that states send personal notices to long-term unemployed workers informing them of the extended benefits under other programs.

Under the 1970 legislation, a state may qualify individually to pay extended benefits if its insured jobless rate is at least 4 percent for 13 consecutive weeks and has risen sharply this year.

The Unemployment Insurance Service of the Manpower Administration said that 17 states and Puerto Rico are likely to qualify for the continuation of state extended benefits. The states are Alabama, Connecticut, Hawaii, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Vermont and West Virginia.

A number of these states and several others also qualify for emergency compensation of an additional 13 weeks extended benefits under another law, the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act of 1971. But this temporary legislation expires next June 30.

Most states provide basic unemployment benefits of 26 weeks, which are financed by a payroll tax. On extended benefits, the federal government generally pays 50 percent of the extra weeks of benefits.

But under the emergency compensation program, the federal government pays the entire amount.

The Labor Dept. reports that during the week ended Mar. 11, insured unemployment was at 2.7 million and that 451,389 jobless workers filed claims for extended benefits.

O'Brien noted that during the past several months, about 150,000 long-term jobless workers have been exhausting their regular benefits every month.

Shoe Workers Official Dies in Auto Crash

Chicago—William A. Martin, a vice president of the United Shoe Workers was killed in an auto crash while returning here from a union meeting in Sheboygan, Wis.

Martin, 38, was the union's youngest general officer. He was named a vice president in 1968 and administered a territory including Illinois, Ohio, West Virginia, Wisconsin and California.

Back Maritime Program:

Marine Engineers Push Fleet Revival

Bal Harbour, Fla.—A renewed demand for rebuilding the American merchant marine into an effective trading fleet was coupled with a sharp denunciation of the policies of multinational corporations at the 91st convention of the Marine Engineers.

The union of licensed shipboard engineers and other professional groups said the "time is overdue for a turn-around which will permit this nation again to be proud of a modern merchant marine second to none in the world."

The "steady decline" in the number of U.S. flag ships, the delegates said, "should be a matter of deep concern to every American."

The statement predicted that if the trend continues, "the country with the greatest economy in world history will have withdrawn from the international maritime trade," a situation which the union described as "unthinkable."

The delegates called for strong support for maritime legislation, and endorsed the program approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting.

It called for carrying 50 percent of all oil imports in U.S. tankers; for requiring government-financed cargo to be carried entirely in U.S. ships provided their freight rates are equal to those of foreign flag vessels; for continuing the renewed shipbuilding program started in the 1970 shipbuilding act.

The union also voiced support for legislation to preserve the merger of El Paso Natural Gas and Pacific Northwest Pipeline as a "means of assuring the development of advanced U.S. technology in shipbuilding" to bring about maximum U.S. participation in the overseas transport of liquid natural gas to this country.

Pres. Jesse M. Calhoon backed up a resolution criticizing multinational corporations with strong criticism of governmental tolerance for these companies.

Noting that the maritime unions had long protested the unimpeded trend towards foreign-flag merchant ships competing unfairly with U.S. ships, Calhoon pointed out that only "7 percent of the oil used in this country is being brought in in American ships."

"Unless there is drastic action like the Burke-Hartke bill," the MEBA president said, "in less than a decade we will have 7 percent of the steel used in this country manufactured in the U.S. You will have 7 percent of the autos used in this country manufactured here. You will have 7 percent of the rubber, 7 percent of the computers.

"You can go down the line, industry by industry, and say 'it will be wiped out,'" Calhoon predicted.

He charged that many big multinational corporations have lost their American identity. "In some way," Calhoon said, "we must devise a litmus paper test to tell the American from the foreigner, because the big names, such as Westinghouse, General Electric, Bell & Howell, Esso and Sinclair are not American any more. To us, they are alien corporations."

The delegates approved constitutional changes providing for a revised roster of national union officers to include a president, secretary-treasurer, a national executive vice president and two national vice presidents.

With the executive board's approval, Calhoon named R. T. McKay, the head of the union's District 2, to be full-time executive vice president working out of MEBA headquarters. John F. Brady of District 2 was elected a vice president.

The other national officers besides Calhoon, are Sec.-Treas. C. A. Black and Vice Pres. C. E. De Fries.

Richard Markowitz of Philadelphia and Joel Glantein of New York were named general counsel and counsel, respectively.

Because of increasing activity by the union in the nation's capital, the convention authorized the officers to move MEBA headquarters to the Washington area.

The delegates voted to hold a special convention in 1975 to mark the centennial of MEBA.

Nevada Doctors Form Service Employes Local

Las Vegas, Nev.—Almost 30 practicing physicians, most of them in the Las Vegas area, have joined the Service Employes in the face of increased activity by conglomerates in Nevada's health care field.

SEIU Organizer Robert Anderson noted that the health conglomerates threaten to endanger the quality of patient care by placing too much emphasis on profit making.

Anderson said the doctors' union would not seek higher fees for service, but would concentrate on upgrading patient care by demanding adequate equipment and backup personnel for physicians in area hospitals.

SEIU Pres. George Hardy, in welcoming the doctors to the union, emphasized that doctors have "as much of a need as anyone to act collectively, especially as large corporations encroach upon the professional freedoms physicians have traditionally enjoyed."

"We welcome these new members into our union and share their deep concern over the nation's health care," Hardy said.

"We have continually fought for legislation aimed at improving health care nationwide. We'll make every effort to fight profiteering in Nevada by conglomerates."

The doctors' group has been chartered as SEIU Local 676 and eventually hopes to bring the state's more than 400 other doctors into the union.

The physicians are dropping their memberships in the American Medical Association, which they say has not been responsive to members' views.

"Physicians need an alternative to the AMA," said Hardy, whose union represents 150,000 nurses, orderlies and other health employes.

"They need to organize into a union—a real union—so their needs can be met."

"They have a concern that the nation's health and safety be ensured, and that their own working conditions allow them to deliver proper care to patients," Hardy said.

Windfall for Sugar Growers:

Post-Harvest Raise Assailed as Fraud

sugar cane workers, noted that the large firms that control the sugar plantations receive a federal subsidy of nearly $100 million a year in return for agreeing to pay minimum wages set each year by the Dept. of Agriculture.

This year, Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer noted, the growers were able to pocket the 10-cent-an-hour raise the government had set. Using the mid-August to mid-November wage-price freeze as an excuse, the Agriculture Dept. held off setting the new minimum wage until December—and didn't make it effective until Jan. 10, when the harvest was virtually complete in Louisiana and past its peak in Florida.

It was "a crude and immoral fraud perpetrated on the weak and the poor," Mayer protested.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.), also heard from a $1.70 an hour tractor operator who testified that the Agriculture Dept.'s delay cost him at least $70 in earnings.

The worker, Gustave Rhodes, was accompanied by a nun and a priest who have been assisting the sugar workers and their families.

He told the subcommittee that even when employed, his family needs food stamps to meet essential needs.

"I don't feel it's fair that a man with a so-called regular job should need food stamps," he said. "When the most you make any time is $1.70 an hour, I don't think it's fair for the Secretary of Agriculture, who is supposed to see we get fair and reasonable wages, to take $70 away from me or any of the workers on the sugar plantations and leave the price of sugar unfrozen."

The Agriculture Dept. told the congressional panel that it would be "unfair" to make the sugar cane growers pay the increase retroactively.

An indignant O'Hara took the floor of the House to accuse the Administration of a new "harvest of shame" in its treatment of the sugar workers.

He expressed ironic "admiration" for the cleverness of the Administration official who managed to find a way to announce the establishment of a higher minimum wage too late for it to do any good. Not only was the wage-price freeze long over when the belated wage hike was announced, O'Hara noted, but the price freeze never applied to sugar cane anyway.

It was of a pattern, he suggested, with the "punitive action" by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board in seeking to use the federal labor law to prohibit the Farm Workers from carrying on a boycott, while denying them the collective bargaining rights of the law.

Biemiller, whose letter was read to the subcommittee by Mayer, termed the belated 10-cent increase "inadequate" and urged that a larger amount be paid retroactive to the start of the harvest season.

Mayer's testimony for the Meat Cutters noted that sugar cane minimums are kept low because the amount is determined in large part by comparison with wage rates for other farm work. And in "a vicious cycle," other farm rates are kept down because of the sugar cane wage levels.

Many of the men who make the wage determinations, Mayer charged, have been associated all their lives with the employer groups "which have a self-interest in keeping farm wages low."

FREE JAZZ CONCERTS are being staged at five metropolitan New York junior high schools in cooperation with Musicians Locals 802 and 402. The concerts are financed by grants from the Music Performance Trust Funds, set up by the AFM and the recording industry, and from the Mayor's Committee for Living Music. The concerts include Dixieland, Afro, Latin and Big Band jazz.

Lily Tulip Cup Drive Ends In IBEW Victory

Springfield, Mo.—The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers won representation rights for a unit of 1,024 employes of the Lily Tulip Cup plant here to climax an 18-year battle by eight different unions participating in 12 separate representation elections.

The IBEW was the first to win a clear majority, 518-466 over no union. There were eight challenged ballots and two ballots were declared void.

AFL-CIO Organization Director William L. Kircher said the impact of the victory cannot be overemphasized because the plant plays a major role in the economic life of the community.

The organizing campaign was under the direction of IBEW Rep. Ray Edwards with assistance from AFL-CIO Field Rep. Wayne King.

Maritime Union Reaches Early Deep-Sea Accord

New York—Deep-sea sailors represented by the National Maritime Union were giving overwhelming approval to a new three-year contract with tanker and dry-cargo management which will mean a 5 percent increase in base pay and overtime in each year of the contract.

Ratification meetings were being held in U.S. ports and aboard ship. The NMU reported that the tally from the ports was 3.187 in favor of the contract and 126 against.

The agreement was reached well in advance of the June 15 expiration of the current pact with the industry, which is plagued by a diminishing number of American flag vessels.

The agreement covers seamen aboard 350 ocean-going vessels operated by 70 East and Gulf Coast companies.

Both union and management negotiators said that the early settlement was unprecedented. The NMU noted that its 20,000 members were competing for about 10,000 jobs.

The NMU agreement calls for additional increases in base pay and overtime for seamen working aboard automated cargo vessels—5 percent on June 16, and another 5 percent a year later.

An able seaman's base pay is now $529 a month. Overtime is computed at $4.27 an hour and is paid on any work after eight hours a day or five days a week.

The contract provides an increase in supplementary vacation pay and boosts the monthly pension benefit to $300 after 25 years service. However, an age minimum of 55 was added to the pension provisions. The NMU said it agreed to the age floor to protect the soundness of the pension program.

The employers agreed to contribute a fixed annual amount depending on what is necessary to support the pension plan.

"We have considered the needs of our members in light of the condition of the American-flag merchant marine on which their jobs depend," said NMU Pres. Joseph Curran.

"We believe the agreement is realistic and taking all factors into account, serves the interest of our members as effectively as possible."

The union said that seagoing job openings have dropped drastically for a number of reasons including the decline in tonnage carried on American-flag vessels, the technological trend toward bigger, faster and more productive ships and the phasing out of the Vietnam war.

The NMU and other maritime unions also have been hurt by the sharp reductions in the American passenger fleet, now limited to a handful of ships on the West Coast.

NMU members alone lost 3,500 jobs with the withdrawal of such major passenger ships as the United States, the Independence and the Constitution.

Church, Congressional Groups Hit NLRB Bid to Penalize Farm Union

A law that excludes farm workers from its protections and benefits shouldn't be used to penalize their union, Pres. Nixon has been told.

Protests against the "double standard" sought by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board came in separate statements from officials of the U.S. Catholic Conference and a congressional group made up of House and Senate members of Mexican and Puerto Rican ancestry.

NLRB Counsel Peter Nash, a Nixon appointee, has asked a federal court to enjoin the Farm Workers from an alleged "secondary boycott" of California's Napa Valley wineries.

Previous NLRB general counsels have taken the position that since Congress excluded agricultural workers from the National Labor Relations Act, they couldn't be subjected to its prohibitions.

Signing a joint letter of protest to the President were these officials of the Catholic Conference, the organization of Catholic bishops in the United States: John E. Cosgrove, director of the Dept. of Social Development; Msgr. George Higgins, director of the Division for Urban Life; the Rev. John McRaith, co-director, Division for Rural Life, and Paul Sedillo, Jr., director, Division for the Spanish-Speaking.

"The low incomes and harsh working conditions faced by our farm labor force make progress for farm workers a requirement of social justice," the Catholic officials said.

"The strengthening of their union is an important aspect of this effort," they wrote Nixon, urging him to "intervene to halt this wholly unfair action" of the NLRB general counsel.

On Capitol Hill, Sen. Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.), and Representatives Henry B. Gonzales (D-Tex.), Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.) and Herman Badillo (D-N.Y.) angrily protested that the Administration is trying to strip the Farm Workers of their principal weapon for obtaining better conditions—the support of American consumers in refusing to buy produce not grown and harvested under union conditions.

"We can understand why the Administration would want to smash the farm workers' union," the congressional group declared, "for it receives vast revenues from those who have fought the union every inch of its painful way—but this is not a matter to be determined by the size of party contributions. It is a question of decency, and we will not see decency sold out."

The complaint against the Farm Workers which the NLRB counsel endorsed was brought by a group called the Free Marketing Council. In a speech in the Senate, Montoya termed the council "a blatantly right-wing extremist group headed by a professional enemy of organized labor."

SEIU Pact Settles Hospital Walkout

East St. Louis, Ill.—Service Employes Local 50 won a 7 percent across-the-board wage increase for a unit of 260 employes at the Christian Welfare Hospital in a first contract negotiated after a two-month strike.

Local 50 also obtained an agreement on correcting wage inequities based on sex discrimination. This will amount to an additional 7 percent increase for some women employes.

The SEIU local had filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission charging the hospital with paying female housekeepers and orderlies much less than men performing the same work.

William Brennan Heads Nebraska AFL-CIO

Omaha, Neb.—William Brennan, an Elevator Constructors' business agent here, has been named president of the Nebraska AFL-CIO by the state central body's executive board. He succeeds Richard W. Nisley who held the post for 12 years.

Nisley resigned effective Apr. 1 to become a regional director for the Plasterers, serving five states.

Farm Workers Win 2nd Citrus Pact in Florida

Tampa, Fla.—The Farm Workers won a second victory in efforts to organize Florida citrus workers as employes of H. P. Hood & Sons voted 95-67 for UFW representation. The company and the union agreed to contract terms similar to those reached with Coca-Cola Co.

Hood is one of the country's major producers of citrus and dairy products. The Boston-based firm's Florida operations include 3,500 acres of orange groves plus a large processing plant at Dunedin.

The agreement increased hourly wages to $2.25, paid holidays and vacations and medical benefits for dependents.

The contract provides 9 paid holidays, from 1 to 4 weeks of paid vacation, life insurance for workers and their families plus health and welfare benefits. It contains strict limitations on the use of pesticides and states that free uniforms will be provided for jobs requiring protective clothing.

Free pickup sacks also will be provided. Formerly the workers were assessed $10 per sack. Other benefits include 5 to 10 days sick leave and 4 days paid funeral leave.

Little Improvement:

Aged Shortchanged By Nixon Proposal

contains much of his welfare reform legislation and minor improvements in programs for elderly and provides for the elimination of the monthly premiums that Medicare recipients must now pay for out-of-hospital doctor bills.

But the AFL-CIO has repeatedly stressed that the bill must be improved extensively in the Senate to make it an effective measure for meeting the needs of the elderly.

Besides sharp increases in social security retirement benefits, the AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged major improvements in the Medicare program, including full payment for prescription drugs.

Seidman noted that the Nixon message did not cover the cost-free prescription drugs, which he said are essential if the elderly are to meet other living costs.

Nelson H. Cruikshank, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, also contested Nixon's claims that the Administration's proposals would make social security "inflation-proof."

Nixon's plan, "by tieing social security benefits to future increases of 3 percent or more in living costs over a year's time, would doom millions of elderly to permanent poverty," Cruikshank said.

He said linking social security payments to the rising cost of living can be meaningful only if the benefits level is first raised substantially.

In a subsequent message to Congress focusing on the welfare reform aspects of H.R. 1, Nixon urged Senate passage of essentially the same provisions adopted by the House last year. These included family assistance payments with a sub-poverty level ceiling of $2,400 a year for a family of four.

Another provision of the bill would require all "employable adults" to register with the Labor Dept. for jobs or training programs, without even the guarantee that they would receive the federal minimum wage if work is found for them.

While the AFL-CIO has supported welfare reforms with federal financing and controls, it has called for raising the basic assistance floor initially to $3,000 per family and subsequently to the government-defined poverty level, which is now about $3,900.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council recently endorsed an omnibus amendment to H.R. 1 that embodies many of the suggestions proposed at the federation's 1971 convention.

The convention resolution stressed that "no payment be reduced below current levels, no welfare recipient should be referred to a job paying less than the minimum wage, no mother should be referred to work in the absence of adequate child care facilities for her children. . . ." The resolution also called for the protection of job rights for public employes when the federal government takes over the welfare program.

Maritime Trades Urge Cargo Guarantee on Oil

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. called on Congress to adopt legislation that would guarantee that a minimum of 50 percent of all U.S. oil imports must be carried by American-flag ships as an important step in strengthening the U.S. merchant marine.

MTD Administrator O. William Moody, Jr., told the House Merchant Marine subcommittee that a fleet of tankers capable of transporting oil and natural gas from strategic overseas reserves would be in the best interests of the country.

"Our national security," Moody said, "requires an uninterrupted supply of petroleum-imports in the years to come. We are in a tenuous position already because of our reliance upon foreign interests for this vital source of energy," and this reliance is "extremely dangerous."

Moody pointed out also that domestic energy resources are no longer "sufficient to meet our demand," noting that 23 percent of U.S. oil needs in 1970 were imported.

By 1985, he emphasized, it is estimated that U.S. energy consumption will nearly double and "we will have to import nearly 60 percent of our petroleum and almost 25 percent of our natural gas."

To supply the U.S. with oil and natural gas imports in 1985 will take from 500 to 2,600 tankers, depending on size, for oil, and as many as 100 liquid natural gas tankers, Moody said. Construction of these vessels would provide thousands of jobs for shipyard workers and seamen.

The lack of employment of U.S.-flag merchant ships has created a crisis that requires our immediate attention, he stressed, and the "utilization now of ships in idle status—including many modern tankers. Without the use of these ships we will not be able to preserve our existing nucleus of a viable merchant fleet until the long-range effects of the new maritime program can be realized."

Moody documented the department's case for the legislation with a detailed analysis of the growing energy crisis and the role of foreign-flag shipping in gradually destroying the U.S. merchant marine.

Chicago Adopts Law Barring Strikebreakers

Chicago—The City Council voted 44 to 1 in favor of an ordinance to outlaw professional strikebreaking. The measure was introduced by Mayor Richard J. Daley.

The ordinance forbids any employer to knowingly employ a strikebreaker, to import strikebreakers from another state or country, or to contract with any other individual or agency to import strikebreakers. Fines of $500 for each each violation are provided.

A strikebreaker is defined as a person who has his legal residence outside the metropolitan Chicago area and who comes into the city specifically for employment during a strike or lockout, or has customarily and repeatedly offered himself for employment during the duration of a strike or lockout in place of the employes involved in the dispute, or has regularly and habitually earned a major portion of his livelihood by offering himself for such employment.

The ordinance was sent to the City Council floor by the council's Finance Committee by a vote of 24 to 1 after testimony by leading union leaders and legislators. More than 100 unionists jammed the hearing room to demonstrate support for the measure. No testimony was offered in opposition.

The action makes Chicago the 13th city in Illinois and the 121st city in the nation to bar professional strikebreakers.

The 1971 session of the Illinois General Assembly approved a state anti-strikebreaker law, but Gov. Richard B. Ogilvie (R) vetoed the measure. A vote to override the veto failed in the Illinois Senate.

Abel Stresses Growing Impatience Of Public with Big Business Power

Austin, Tex.—Recent social and economic developments "signal the desire of Americans to move out from under the dominance and influence of big business," Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel declared at a convocation of the University of Texas College of Business Administration.

Abel said more and more identifiable groups are beginning to assert themselves, "to challenge those who are exerting too much influence and too much power over our lives; to help turn this country around so that the emphasis is on people—not business."

Describing the basic slogan of the trade union movement as "simple," Abel continued:

"We say the business of America is not, or should not be, business; the business of America is people. We say the needs of people have priority over the profit and balance sheet."

He charged that current government policies "tilt" toward industry and give it "privileged status and treatment." He called for a reordering of priorities to make the public interest paramount. He asked:

"Why can't government, industry and labor find a way to agree upon specific common goals to improve our lives in terms of quality rather than quantity?

"Why can't we jointly hammer out objectives for a better America and then enlist the majority of Americans in the job of implementing these goals?"

Abel suggested that "many of our economic and social failures can be attributed to a lack of long-range planning" and declared that a change in the country's direction would not be harmful to industry.

"On the contrary," he said, "our nation's backlog of unfinished business would require the full use of America's giant industrial capacity, much of which today stands idle."

He observed that Americans are beginning to take an "inward audit" of the things that comprise their existence and listed five "hopeful" signs:

- Congressional approval of the principle of financing future political campaigns through public contributions. "True," he said, "this election reform will not apply to the upcoming presidential campaign . . . but the initial breakthrough to make our public officials less dependent on well-heeled special interests has been made."
- Lowering the voting age to 18. "Extending the right of franchise to our youth represents another severe blow against the continuing ability of selfish interests to run our government."
- The growing effort among students to organize and exert their influence not only on campus but throughout the entire spectrum of national life.
- A new-found independence among consumers. "In the marketplace, people are now demanding quality—full value—their money's worth. They are up in arms over deceptive advertising, shoddy products, phony guarantees and tricky salesmanship. Never before have we seen so many consumers willing to raise hell. . . ."
- The movement to stop air and water pollution and to conserve the natural beauty and natural resources of the environment. "This new concern for our ecology represents another indication that fundamental social attitudes are changing for the better."

Abel said organized labor welcomes "these growing signs of independence among large segments of people."

"We are glad to see so many new allies, for we of the trade union movement are old hands at fighting the entrenched, special interests of this nation," he said.

5 from Labor Leave Panel On Production

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and four other labor members have resigned from the National Commission on Productivity.

The commission, made up of government, business and labor representatives, was appointed by Pres. Nixon in 1970 to explore means of achieving price stability through productivity gains.

In a letter to Pres. Nixon, Meany said:

"I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that my continued service on the National Commission on Productivity would not be in the best interests of the workers I have the honor to represent."

Also resigning from the commission were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons and Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith.

Montana Delegates Reject R-T-W Clause

Helena, Mont.—There won't be a "right-to-work" clause banning union shop agreements in the proposed state constitution that will be submitted to Montana voters in a June 6 ballot.

Delegates to the state's constitutional convention voted 79-16 against a ban on the union shop.

The debate was sharp but both sides agreed on one point—strong unions mean higher wages.

North Dakota Labor Battles R-T-W Plank

Fargo, N.D.—A united front of all North Dakota labor organizations was formed against a draft of a new state constitution that includes a "right-to-work" section that would outlaw the union shop.

The united group was formed at a reconvened North Dakota AFL-CIO convention that included not only 400 delegates from affiliated unions, but representatives from unaffiliated unions as well.

William Dockter, president of the state AFL-CIO, told of labor efforts, including a peaceful demonstration by 500 union members.

Dockter said that the labor delegates were in effect told to go home and mind their own business.

"This same kind of an answer given to farmers many years ago led to an agrarian revolt in the state," he observed.

Labor Challenges $1.90 Wage Cutoff

Exemption Lid Scored As Too Low

The AFL-CIO and Federation Pres. George Meany asked a federal court to order the Cost of Living Council to exempt persons earning less than $3.35 an hour from wage controls.

That's the figure labor contends that Congress had in mind when it voted to exclude from controls pay increases to anyone "whose earnings are substandard or who is a member of the working poor."

It is keyed to the lowest of three budgets the Bureau of Labor Statistics has worked out for a city family of four—based on an austere, bare-bones standard of living.

The labor suit charges that the Cost of Living Council, a Cabinet-level body headed by Treasury Sec. John B. Connally, violated the law by ordering the Pay Board to exempt only wages under $1.90 an hour from controls.

That's approximately what the government says is the poverty level. But an AFL-CIO brief contends that a House-Senate conference committee specifically rejected language that would have exempted persons earning $1.90 or less as too low a level.

The court challenge was initially brought by the Electrical Radio & Machine Workers and IUE Pres. Paul Jennings.

The AFL-CIO and Meany received permission from the court to join in the suit against the Cost of Living Council on behalf of all of the federation's affiliates, and to file a supporting brief.

The difference between a $1.90 and a $3.35 hourly wage exemption is a vital bread-and-butter issue, not just an "abstraction," the AFL-CIO brief stressed.

It cited as examples contracts negotiated by the Service Employes for Los Angeles hospital workers who had been earning $1.92 to $2.20 and hour and Detroit hospital workers who had been at a $2.14 to $3.15 wage range.

Presently awaiting Pay Board action, the brief noted, are contracts providing average 12 percent increases for members of the Grain Millers making about $2.90 an hour and a Woodworkers contract providing an 11.4 percent raise for workers with a base rate of $2.72 an hour. All of these increases are above the Pay Board's present guidelines and are subject to being cut back if challenged.

The labor argument that Congress intended a higher exemption figure than the Pay Board imposed

Youth Pay Issue Faces House Test

The Nixon Administration's attempt to weaken the Fair Labor Standards Act by setting a lower minimum wage for young workers poses "a threat to all labor," the AFL-CIO warned.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller summoned the aid of the federation's state and local central bodies in urging congressmen to support the wage-hour bill that the House Labor Committee approved last year.

The bill, providing a $2 wage floor for most workers, also would extend coverage to millions of public employes now outside the law and to domestic household workers.

It has been bottled up in the House Rules Committee. But, under prodding from the House Democratic leadership, the Rules Committee agreed to consider the legislation at an Apr. 10 meeting and is expected to clear it for early House consideration.

Shortly before the Easter recess of Congress, Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.) and two other GOP members of the Labor Committee served notice that they will seek to substitute a modified form of the Administration proposals.

They sugar-coated their bill by providing the same basic minimum wage step-up as in the Labor Committee's legislation—a rise from the present $1.60 to $2 an hour for workers whose jobs were covered prior to 1966 and a two-stage step-up for those added to coverage in 1966—to $1.80 this year and $2 next year. MERGER AGREEMENT uniting all organized New York state teachers into a single organization is sealed with a handshake. Meany Scores Windfalls:

Wage-Curb Profits Should Aid Buyers

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged the Price Commission to compel employers to pass along to consumers any windfall profits created by Pay Board rulings cutting back negotiated wage increases.

"Where a collective bargaining contract wage, agreed to by both employer and employe, is cut back by the Pay Board—giving the employer a windfall profit—simple justice would indicate that the Price Commission should compel the employer to pass these savings along to the consumer," Meany said.

In a letter to Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson, Jr., Meany reiterated a list of seven suggestions for effective price control adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in February and previously submitted to the commission.

He also noted that most of these suggestions had been made to the board as early as last November by Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of Community Services.

Grayson had sought Meany's suggestions on price control policies after the federation president appeared before the commission and charged that it did not have the machinery or manpower to control consumer prices and that the Nixon Administration never intended for it to have such powers.

The seven specific proposals adopted by the Executive Council and resubmitted to Grayson were:

- Consumer representation on the Price Commission.
- Application of price controls over items not covered and the closing of all loopholes.

AFT, NEA Slate Vote By 195,000

Top officers of two long-rival teachers' organizations in New York state have reached agreement on a merger that would create a 195,000-member federation. It would unite the state organizations of the AFL-CIO's American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association.

The merger pact will be submitted within 90 days for ratification by the 90,000 members of the AFT's United Teachers of New York and the 105,000 members of the New York State Teachers Association, the NEA affiliate.

Thomas Y. Hobart, Jr., president of the state NEA organization, and Albert Shanker, president of the AFT state body and of its big New York City local, issued a joint statement expressing hope that "the AFT and the NEA will initiate discussions leading to a single nationwide organization capable of speaking for all of America's 2.5 million teachers."

The AFT's national president, David Selden, who joined the merger negotiating committees at a press conference, echoed this hope and expressed "great satisfaction" at the "historic" merger agreement.

Just a few days earlier, a similar merger agreement was negotiated between AFT and NEA locals representing the instructional staff of the City University of New York—

New Guidelines Tighten Rules On Sex Bias

New guidelines designed to tighten the rules barring job discrimination based on sex have been published by the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission.

The broadened guidelines are advisory and do not have the force of law. They are intended to aid the courts, employers, unions and others on how the EEOC interprets Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 that bars discrimination based on sex.

The new guidelines hold that hiring policies that exclude women from jobs because of pregnancy violate the law and that health and insurance plan benefits must be extended to

Unions Upheld, NLRB Reversed, In Coordinated Bargaining Case

Philadelphia—In a case that could have an important bearing on coordinated bargaining, the 3rd U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that unions did not violate federal labor law in their 1967-68 bargaining with the copper industry.

The court overthrew a finding by the National Labor Relations Board that the unions' insistence on common contract termination dates amounted to the same thing as company-wide bargaining.

The case grew out of the 1967 negotiations between the Phelps Dodge Corp. and the unions cooperating in the AFL-CIO Joint Negotiating Committee for Phelps Dodge. The company agreed to bargain with the committee on behalf of 40 Phelps Dodge units in Arizona, but rejected the request that Phelps Dodge subsidiaries in Rhode Island and El Paso be included.

Following a strike and settlement, the NLRB upheld the company's contention that the union committee's insistence on common contract termination dates and simultaneous settlements amounted to an illegal demand for company-wide bargaining.

In the case of Phelps Dodge, it would have been illegal for the unions to strike in quest of com-

Canadian Labor Brands Jobless Rate a 'Disaster'

Ottawa—Unemployment made 1971 a "year of disaster" in Canada, and 1972 will bring more of the same, the Canadian Labor Congress said in its annual submission to the federal cabinet.

The 20,000-word memorandum presented in summary by CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald was virtually a bill of economic and social rights for Canadians.

It covered a wide range of issues, including social legislation, election reform, taxation, trade, youth, labor legislation, unemployment insurance, international affairs and pollution.

Its main thrust, however, was on unemployment and the state of the economy, charging that the blame for unemployment "rests solidly" on the federal government. It said the current high level of unemployment "continues to stem from the brutal and callous policies implemented several years ago."

The CLC took issue with government statements that high rates of joblessness could be attributed to changes in the rates of labor force participation. The submission said there had been little change in the actual figures and this explanation lacks any credibility.

The brief drew particular attention to the high rates of unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces.

It said Canada's jobless rate has been consistently higher than those of Britain, France, Italy, West Germany, Sweden and Japan and, until recently, the United States because other countries have given top priority to full employment policies while Canada had not. A "full employment budget" is needed to replace stop-and-go policies characteristic of the past, the memorandum said.

The CLC renewed its support for a guaranteed income, but disagreed with the proposal that the guarantee be set at 70 percent of the so-scalled poverty line, and that single people under 40 be excluded.

To attack the nation's proverty problem, the CLC calls for: more spending on low-income housing and medical services, a more equitable system of taxation, and manpower and training programs based on a realistic assessment of manpower needs. The present old-age pension should be raised to $80 from $60 and made payable at age 60, and it should include realistic upward adjustments to meet living cost raises, the CLC urged.

The brief called for more public housing; increased public ownership of urban land, held in perpetuity and leased for homes; more support for co-op housing; support for community health services, better housing, health facilities and educational programs for native peoples, and a review of strategy on regional economic development.

The memorandum expressed the hope the government would press for adoption of a competition bill to provide improved safeguards for consumers.

On trade, it expressed concern over the effect of U.S. trade policies on Canadian jobs and it especially urged the government to maintain the key safeguards of the auto pact and to resist pressures to permit individuals to import new and used cars into Canada.

The memorandum also urged the government to resist pressure from management groups to revise sections of the proposed labor legislation that would require employers to give workers notice of technological changes and, under certain circumstances, make such change subject to collective bargaining.

It described the new tax act as "a haven for tax lawyers, once they have learned to decipher it."

On pollution, the CLC urged national standards enforced by government inspection and appropriate penalties for polluters.

Elevator Talks Broken Off, 20,000 Strike

Philadelphia—Some 20,000 members of the Elevator Constructors struck across the nation Mar. 31 after an employers' association informed the union that it wanted to break off negotiations on a new five-year contract.

The national contract—which covers union members who install, erect and maintain elevators and escalators outside of New York City—expired Mar. 23. Talks were extended on a day-to-day basis until the employers decided to end negotiations, according to union Pres. R. Wayne Williams.

Another contract covering the New York City Elevator Constructors expires later this year.

Williams said the impasse involved disagreement on wages as well as a management proposal to transfer some jobs outside the union's jurisdiction.

A representative of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service was meeting with the union here in hopes of resuming negotiations.

More Emphasis on Fringes:

Pay Board's Policies Spur Shift in Bargaining Trends

The government's wage control program will prompt unions to shift their emphasis in collective bargaining in 1972, especially into the areas of cost-of-living clauses and fringe benefits.

The 3.5 million workers covered by major contracts negotiated in 1971 were also subjected to unsettling events, with many of their deferred increases left in doubt by Pay Board policies, according to AFL-CIO Economists Rudy Oswald and Phillip Ray.

Writing in the AFL-CIO's Federationist magazine, Oswald and Ray note that the contracts bargained for 1,000 or more workers in 1971 call for average annual wage increases of 8.1 percent over the life of the agreements. That's a drop from the 8.9 percent average of 1970.

When fringe benefits are added, the average 1971 settlement provided for an annual increase of 8.7 percent over the life of the contract, also a drop from the 9.1 percent average for 1970 settlements.

The bulk of the workers—over 1 million of the 3.5 million covered by contracts negotiated in 1971—will receive increases in the 5 percent to 7 percent range when cost-of-living escalator clauses are excluded.

However, cost-of-living escalators were one of the major developments of 1971 bargaining, Oswald and Ray note, and will continue to be important in 1972 bargaining. The number of workers covered by escalator clauses under major agreements reached a new high of 4.3 million by the end of 1971.

"Some unions will be returning to one-year contracts rather than continuing the recent trend of three-year contracts," the authors predicted.

They said other highlights will include agreements calling for increases disallowed by the Pay Board to become effective as soon as the law permits or for arbitrators to assign funds disallowed by the board into areas not directly under the Pay Board's control.

"Fringe benefits that were partially exempted from the direct controls of the Pay Board by the 1971 Economic Stabilization Act will also be emphasized," the article says. "These include such areas as pensions, life insurance, health and welfare clauses, profit sharing plans and savings plans."

Bargaining on at least some agreements will take place in 1972 in aerospace, airlines, apparel, electric and gas utilities, glass, insurance, leather goods, maritime, oil, paper, services, shipbuilding, textile and wholesale and retail trade. Key construction contracts will expire in seven major cities. But major agreements in auto, steel, meatpacking, postal, rubber and trucking run at least through 1973.

Among the 1971 developments on major contracts which Oswald and Ray cite as examples of continuing trends were:

- Pension benefits in the range of $7.50 to $10 per month per year of service, with other improvements to remove sex differentials, improve vesting, increase survivors' benefits, provide better "bridge" payments until social security eligibility begins and earlier retirement—to as young as 50 wth 25 years service in some contracts.
- Health plans which sought to offset soaring hospital and medical costs by insuring longer hospitalization, raising fee schedules and extending coverage to previously uncovered areas such as dental care, major medical and optical and drug plans.
- Job security, becoming increasingly important during a period of high unemployment and continuing automation, included new attention to severance pay clauses, transfer rights, job training and tuition refund plans, shorter hours of work and longer vacations, relocation expenses and supplemental unemployment benefits.
- Holidays and vacations improved to the point that the old norm of nine paid holidays per year is giving way to 10 or 11. Vacations, especially for long-term employes, were increased to such standards as four weeks after seven years of service or six weeks after 22 years. Vacation bonuses continue to expand, as do sabbatical leaves and two-week summer plant shutdowns.

Other collective bargaining agreements in 1971 introduced such developments as "big city" pay allowances in the telephone industry, annual bonuses, and protections against polygraph tests or taking part in procedures in which the employe objects—such as nurses assisting in abortions.

Bonus to Strikebreakers Ruled Illegal by NLRB

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that an employer cannot pay a bonus to strikebreakers after a strike is ended even if they didn't know they were to be rewarded.

As a remedy, the board ordered the company in the case to pay the same bonus plus 6 percent interest to the strikers who returned to work after settlement of the dispute.

The 3-to-1 decision grew out of a strike by District Lodge 117 of the Machinists against Aero-Motive Manufacturing Co. of Kalamazoo, Mich. At stake was the question of whether a company could reward non-strikers, penalize those who went on strike, and so interfere with the right to strike as an economic weapon. The board decided that such a course was illegal.

When the strike at Aero-Motive ended, the company gave a $100 bonus to 107 employes who crossed the picket line and continued work. The reward, the company said, was compensation "for risking their health, property, and peace of mind."

The union said that in reality the bonus was a reward for strikebreaking and, as such, seriously and illegally weakened the right to strike of the 74 workers who engaged in the walkout.

"While the precise issue may be somewhat novel, the governing principles seem to us to be well-established," said the three-man majority. "It is by now axiomatic that employers violate the act if they grant special benefits to employes who refrain from engaging in concerted activity and deny such benefits to those who choose to engage in such activity."

The majority declared that however much the company contended that it was legitimate to give the bonus to the non-strikers, the fact was that the payments were bound to represent a reward to non-strikers and so would be to the disadvantage of the strikers.

"This not only created a divisive wedge in the work force," the majority said, "but also clearly demonstrated for the future the special rewards which lie in store for employes who choose to refrain from protected strike activity."

The majority consisted of Chairman Edward B. Miller and Members John H. Fanning and Howard Jenkins.

In dissent was Member Ralph E. Kennedy, who argued that the bonus was really compensation for damage that had been done to non-strikers' cars during the strike and for their harassment by telephone and in other ways. He said the "compensation" was legal. Kennedy also objected to the "reward" to the strikers.

White House Tactics Hit:

Rail Unions Protest Role as 'Scapegoat'

Sheet Metal Workers Pres. Edward J. Carlough and United Transportation Union Pres. Al H. Chesser registered anger and surprise at the manner in which the White House established Emergency Boards to deal with separate disputes between their unions and the railroads.

Pres. Nixon invoked the Emergency Board provisions of the Railway Labor Act supposedly to avert possible strikes by either union Apr. 1, but Carlough charged that the "Administration is fully aware of the fact that we had no present intention of striking the nation's railroads."

Under the Railway Labor Act, the naming of a board requires the parties to maintain the status quo for 60 days. That means there can be no lockout, no changes in working conditions and no strike during the period while the board investigates the dispute and makes recommendations.

The Sheet Metal Workers, representing 6,000 railroad shopcraft workers, were free to strike Apr. 1—30 days after the National Mediation Board relinquished jurisdiction in an impasse on contract negotiations which have dragged over 15 months.

The UTU had warned of retaliatory action if the Penn Central went ahead Apr. 1 with unilateral plans to lay off 6,000 of the 18,000 workers the union represents on that carrier.

But Chesser noted that the crisis had been averted when Penn Central pulled down its notices "promulgating job eliminations."

Carlough charged that a statement by presidential Press Sec. Ronald Ziegler on invoking the Emergency Board provisions amounted to a "commercial for compuslory arbitration" and that it was "completely gratuitous if it is intended as a threat against our organization and other railroad workers."

"It can only serve to further heat up the situation unnecessarily," Carlough declared.

"As a responsible organization dedicated to serving our members, we are at least as concerned as the Administration for the safety and convenience of the American public.

"To suggest—as Mr. Ziegler does—that we have in any way jeopardized that safety and convenience is unwarranted, uncalled for," and a position "which we reject totally and completely."

Chesser said his union regretted that "the President was forced to resort to an Emergency Board when across-the-table bargaining could have solved the problem without creating another crisis."

The UTU offered to negotiate for 60 more days with Penn Central, but the carrier refused that offer as well as a proffer of arbitration from the Mediation Board.

"It is hard to understand their attitude in not accepting this offer, but now willingly going before an Emergency Board for the same 60 days we offered before the board was appointed," Chesser said.

"We will appear before this board in complete candor, and hope that the Penn Central will be equally honest in disclosing the entire picture—including the financial one. We believe the public is entitled to all the facts—and from both sides.

"It is unfair to blame the employes and exonerate the officials and financial manipulators who have been exposed in the public press recently for their role in wrecking a great railroad system."

Carlough said the Sheet Metal Workers also will comply fully with the Executive Order setting up the boards.

BATTERED BULLDOZER is transformed from junk status to a useful piece of equipment by apprentices of the Operating Engineers salvage-and-training program at Lafayette, Ind. The IUOE is conducting the program in 28 states at great savings to the federal government and the union.

Engineers' Training Plan Salvages Worn-Out Government Equipment

Worn-out heavy construction equipment—much of it destined for the government junk heap—is being salvaged by the Operating Engineers to train apprentices at great savings to the Labor Dept. and the union.

Bulldozers, earth movers, graders, scrapers and tractors on the federal government's "excess" property list are being restored by the union to provide many additional years of service.

For years, the union had been training apprentices on the job. But in 1963, the IUOE started to provide practical training in off-the-job projects financed with its trust funds and Labor Dept. grants.

For this type of training, the union leased the equipment. But the rental costs ran into the hundreds of thousands of dollars and cut deeply into the funds available for job training.

Then in 1967, when the Operating Engineers needed more equipment for a Job Corps program in Jacob's Creek, Tenn., the union learned that the Atomic Energy Commission was about to junk an old bulldozer.

It was declared "excess" property, meaning that any other government agency could claim it. The battered machine was acquired for the union through the Job Corps.

This was the start of the union's salvage-and-apprenticeship program.

Reese Hammond, education and research director of the IUOE, explained:

"We spent $1,400—all for parts—and the 12 Job Corps mechanic-trainees rebuilt the whole machine under the supervision of an Operating Engineers journeyman.

"When the job was done, we had a 35-ton bulldozer on which to train youngsters," he said, noting that the fair market value of the machine was set at $20,000.

IUOE locals followed suit later for their own training programs.

"Most of our apprenticeship programs are now obtaining this stuff," Hammond reported, "and their repair, utilization and maintenance doesn't cost the government a dime."

The restored "junk" equipment, worth about $10 million as reclaimed assets belonging to the Labor Dept., is being utilized by IUOE joint apprenticeship committees in 28 states, the union said.

While the union pays for all the shipping of the equipment, parts and repair costs, the federal government retains the ownership. This still adds up to big savings to the union over the costs of leasing comparable equipment.

Federal Manpower Administrator Paul J. Fasser, Jr., praised the Operating Engineers' programs as a credit to the entire labor movement.

"Whether it's excess equipment or simple participation in manpower development programs, organized labor has shown what it can do," Fasser stressed.

A typical salvage-and-training program conducted by the IUOE locals is being done in Detroit. Local 324 got involved a little more than a year ago with the acquisition of three pieces of salvage equipment.

Today, the 12,000-member local has an inventory of equipment restored from junk status that would have cost more than $2.7 million new. Its rebuilt market value is estimated at $1.5 million.

Ray E. Bishop, the IUOE property officer of the union's national training program, pointed out that this means the restored equipment is made available to the locals and joint apprenticeship committees at two and three times below the cost of comparable new equipment.

N.Y. Teacher Units Set Vote on Merger Terms comprising 19 senior and community colleges.

The NEA Legislative Conference of the City University, headed by Dr. Belle Zeller, has 3,800 members and the AFT United Federation of College Teachers has 1,600 members in the City University system.

In a joint statement urging ratification in balloting to be completed by mid-April, the two organizations declared:

"For too long we have been rivals, needlessly dissipating our human and fiscal resources. Now we will concentrate on making the City University an institution of quality education and enlarged opportunity under conditions in which we as professional staff members can do an effective job."

Under the statewide merger agreement, the two organizations will combine their resources by Sept. 1, 1972, with present officers sharing authority. Elections would be held for a single set of officers and a new constitution adopted by the spring of 1973.

Starting on May 1, 1973, per capita dues on the entire, combined membership would be paid to the NEA, the AFT, and the national, state and appropriate local central bodies of the AFL-CIO.

Effective immediately, Shanker and Hobart said, the two groups have entered into "an interim coalition" that bars any future election contests for bargaining rights.

They also agreed to establish a joint lobbying effort in the state legislature, combine their political action programs and set up cooperative projects in other fields.

Governing bodies of both organizations will meet this month to set up the referenda machinery, with the actual membership balloting expected to take place in May.

Although the merger agreement was initiated and developed at the state level, both the AFT and the NEA national organizations had representatives present during the final stage of the negotiations.

The AFT's New York City local—the United Federation of Teachers—has 72,000 members in the city's school system and touched off the tremendous surge in collective bargaining by teachers when it won a citywide representation election 11 years ago.

NEA locals hold bargaining rights in most of the "upstate" cities. The NEA organizations, once strictly professional organizations that shunned the concept of collective bargaining, have increasingly turned to negotiations and to strike action when necessary.

Selden, who as national AFT president proposed several times a nationwide merger to the NEA, expressed strong support for the concept of mergers at the state and local level.

Labor in Mississippi Charts Election Goals

Jackson, Miss.—The Mississippi AFL-CIO stepped up the mobilization of an all-out political action program for the 1972 elections at its sixth biennial convention.

The 288 delegates—the largest number ever to participate in the state federation's history—focused both on the candidates and issues in the state congressional races and in the presidential campaign.

Three of the five Mississippi congressional members in the House are not seeking re-election. To fill their seats, delegates called for a concerted effort by unions and the state federation to support the election of candidates who will best serve the interests of workers and the people.

The major national issue of the convention emerged in a review of the Nixon Administration record, including high unemployment, unabated inflation, unjust wage and price controls and its overall anti-labor attitudes.

A convention resolution urged union members throughout the state to vote against the Nixon ticket in November and called on the Democratic Party to nominate a presidential candidate "who can provide the proper kind of leadership" for the nation.

The convention re-elected by acclamation the state body's two top officers: Pres. Claude Ramsay to his sixth full two-year term, and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Knight to his seventh term.

Thirteen resolutions were adopted at the three-day convention. Among the key resolutions, delegates called for:

- Enactment by Congress of the labor-supported national "no-fault" auto insurance program.
- Rejection of the Administration's proposed national sales tax, in the form of a so-called value-added tax, as an increased burden on consumers.
- Import quotas on all foreign products that are causing high unemployment in related U.S. industries.
- Increased cooperation between unions and the AFL-CIO in efforts to organize Mississippi's unorganized workers
- Amending the state constitution to allow a second successive term for the governor.
- Support of state and national COPE programs and for local campaigns to boost financial contributions.

The Real School Question

THE AFL-CIO is pleased to appear in support of legislation authorizing, or improving, badly needed national educational programs. It is, therefore, unusual for us to testify in opposition to any bill—let alone, a proposal that carries the impressive title: "The Equal Educational Opportunities Act of 1972."

But, we are in opposition to this bill. We are in opposition, because we believe the bill would do nothing, when so much needs to be done.

Let me explain our position. Like the President, we have listened to the nation and to Florida. We recognize that the overwhelming majority of people in our country do not like so-called "massive busing," but—unlike the President—we also recognize that the overwhelming majority of people in this country do want quality, integrated education.

The real question, then, is: Can we achieve quality, integrated education in all school districts without busing? We think not. And, that is what the courts have said. There are situations where there is just no other remedy. And, there are many school districts throughout the country that recognize this fact of life.

The AFL-CIO has long-supported other remedies such as educational parks, magnet schools, the more effective school program, and other innovative approaches, but we also know that busing must be available as a tool when other remedies fail to accomplish the purpose.

FOR THIS REASON we must oppose any Administration or legislative proposal that would flatly prohibit all new busing, even for a specified period of time. To prohibit busing when other remedies are unworkable is to tamper with the educational rights of children.

We also oppose this bill because it carries no real commitment to improve the educational opportunities of disadvantaged youth. The AFL-CIO has fought ever since the inception of the Elementary & Secondary Education Act for adequate funding of those who need the most help. For us this has not been a partisan fight. The AFL-CIO took the same position during the previous Administration. So, the AFL-CIO opposes the bill because, first of all, despite its seeming promise, it calls for no new money for the disadvantaged.

In our view, then, it is basically a political document. It provides no new funds to improve the educational opportunities of disadvantaged children and it does nothing to promote integration.

AMERICA CANNOT slow down its efforts to integrate its schools. To turn back the clock on desegregation efforts while sanctioning the continuance of vast inequities in our schools can only have appeal to the rankest of bigots.

In 1954, the labor movement hailed the Brown decision as "historic." Like all fair-minded Americans, we recognized the inequities of the dual school system. It has now been almost two decades since that widely hailed decision. We have made progress, but there is still a long way to go. The AFL-CIO has been in this battle for progress at every step of the way.

Just as we have fought hard to implement the Brown decision, we will vigorously oppose all efforts to retreat. The AFL-CIO believes that the Administration bill represents such a retreat.

'Move Over, We're Coming In!'

A Word Edgewise:

Liberal Democratic In-Fighting Obscures Tricky Dick's Record

By John P. Roche

THE OTHER NIGHT I made a serious mistake: I went to a meeting of liberal Democrats to discuss the upcoming presidential primary in Massachusetts.

Arriving late, I thought initially I had come to the wrong location, there seemed to be a wild argument in progress that resembled one of those way-out therapy sessions. You know, the scene in which one character is playing a trumpet, two more are beating each other with pillows, three are engaged in yoga exercises, and another half-dozen are reciting poems, praying to Allah, or simply shrieking their heads off.

Things sorted out a bit after a while, but much of the ensuing evening was spent in quite bitter personal exchanges. "How can you be for Muskie? He supported Vietnam and pollution." "McGovern is a liar—he refused to join Morse and Gruening against the Tonkin Gulf Resolution and didn't oppose the war until 1966." "Jackson is an agent of the military-industrial complex, a phony liberal." Humphrey—oh Lord, poor Humphrey: "Johnson's flunky," "Opportunist," etc., etc.

In my reportorial capacity I threw another name in whenever the conversation slowed down, but there is no point in going on to Lindsay, McCarthy, and Chisholm. On any vote, there would have been a majority for the proposition that _____ is a bum, and you could put any name in the blank.

Two aspects of this jolly little political gathering bothered me. First, what might be called the quality of the rhetoric, the savage way in which people who have known and often worked with each other for years talked. It had overtones of the ferocious language that various religious sects employed in their quest for Christian purity. When, for instance, one elder stateman simply said he would vote for any liberal Democrat that the convention nominated, including Jackson, you could almost physically feel the consensus that he should be burned at the stake.

But second, and more important, there was, to borrow from Sherlock Holmes, the strange case of the dog that didn't bark. It was a bit hard to keep track of what were often simultaneous speeches, but to the best of my recollection nobody even mentioned Richard M. Nixon, currently President of the United States and undoubtedly the Republican candidate for re-election in November.

I threw his name in once just to see what would happen. Nothing happened. The disputants looked at me as if I had dragged in an irrelevant topic, as if I had, say, mentioned Queen Elizabeth II, and went back to chewing at each other.

As a historian, I find this incredible. More than 20 years ago the mention of Nixon would have set the whole crew frothing.

He was, politically speaking, the devil incarnate who had successively knocked off Congressman Jerry Voorhis and Congresswoman Helen Douglas by suggesting they were, if not open Communists, party-line dupes. In 1954 he went so far as to suggest that the Democrats were the party of treason. If he had been the GOP presidential candidate in 1956, I suspect we liberals would have backed Richard Russell to beat him.

NOW RICHARD NIXON has an entirely different impact on the liberals; indeed, on the public at large. Nobody seems to love him very much, but—far more significantly—neither is he hated. The contrast came across vividly in 1968 when, a few weeks after the Democratic shambles in Chicago, candidate Nixon rode there on top of a car down streets packed with enthusiastic supporters. There were no pickets, no screamed imprecations, no nothing. After the sullen, sickening events at the Democratic convention, it was almost a celebration.

The American people were, in fact, sick of hate—and they still are. If in 1972, the Democrats retain the image of the party of haters (and George Wallace can be counted on to do his bit in one ring while the liberals are chopping each other up in another), the fact that few people really love Mr. Nixon will be much less important to his prospect of victory than the other side of that coin: that the hatred he once generated as "Tricky Dick" has largely vanished into the past.

Reforms Pressed in Congress:

Extra Fees, Kickbacks Balloon Closing Costs for Home Buyers

By Sidney Margolius

FAMILIES LOOKING FOR HOMES in recent months have been shocked by closing costs of $1,000 and more even on moderate-price houses and as much as $3,500 on higher-priced homes. Closing costs in recent years have skyrocketed, along with the price tags on houses.

Frederick Waddell, education director of the Credit Counseling Centers in Michigan, reports that he and his wife encountered closing costs ranging from $700 to over $1,300 on moderate-price housing priced from $23,000 to $27,000. Included in these extra charges were "exorbitant fees" for such items as a title search, title insurance and survey fees (even on a brand new house).

Waddell is a determined consumer advocate and a former university instructor in consumer economics. He didn't take these costs for granted, but questioned them. The builder or real estate agent typically argued, "They are required by state law," or "Everybody does it." On the house the Waddells finally bought they had to pay closing costs of $1,127.

Waddell also complained to the state Dept. of Licensing & Regulation. He pointed out that the mortgage company required that homeowners' insurance be included in the escrow payments on the new house despite the fact that he already had such insurance paid for three years in advance. He had to pay a fee for a credit report required by the bank even though the bank also charged a "service fee" of 1 percent of the amount of the mortgage (an extra $200 in the case of a $20,000 mortgage).

There is no doubt that these and other extra fees such as title insurance have become a money-making holdup at the expense of homeseekers already hard pressed by severely inflated housing prices. One of the most flagrant overcharges is for title insurance. Bills have been introduced in Congress by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.) to control some of the worst aspects of such insurance.

The home buyer is a captive market for title insurance. The banks and other mortgage lenders require you to buy it to protect their "equity" in the house. That means that if the title to the property proves faulty, the title insurance company will pay the mortgage lender the remaining amount owed on the mortgage. For example, somebody might turn up who can prove that your house actually is on his land. The national title insurance companies charge you $2.50 per $1,000 of mortgage to insure the lender against any such possibility.

But this arrangement protects only the lender. If you also want to insure yourself against loss due to a faulty title, you have to pay another $1 per $1,000, or a total of $3.50 per $1,000. You aren't actually required to buy the additional insurance protecting your equity in the house. But most home buyers are too frightened by even the faint possibility of loss of their investment not to buy it.

Proxmire reported that one of his own staff members, even though this man is a former law professor, was not allowed to do the title search himself for a house he bought. He was told that if he wanted to buy the house he had to buy lender's title insurance even though he was assuming the present mortgage and there was no legal defect in title. In fact, the lender was already fully protected by the former owner's title insurance policy.

This is the real bonanza for the title companies. In an age when families move frequently, the title companies keep selling new policies over and over on the same houses, and families who move several times find themselves buying title insurance several times. (Some title companies do give a discount on reinsurance of titles.)

THE PRICE of title insurance itself is high, since it includes fees for agents, and often for lawyers. Many home buyers may not realize it, but their own lawyers often get a rebate from the title company, frequently 15 percent of the amount paid.

In general, Proxmire's survey showed, title companies pay out on an average about 20 percent of their income just in commissions. In further fact, they pay out very little in claims; only about 2½ cents for every dollar they take in.

Rebates to lawyers are supposed to be prohibited in most areas except for a few Middle Atlantic states. But the practice goes on even in states where it is supposed to be barred, reports Martin Lobel, legislative assistant to Proxmire.

The Proxmire and Patman bills would require mortgage lenders themselves to pay part of the cost of title search and any title insurance they require to protect their interest. The bills also would require title companies to sell insurance to home buyers at the same rate they charge lenders.

Patman's bill also would prohibit the kickbacks to lawyers.

Real estate brokers also are running scared as the result of the growing effort to put a lid on all the added fees and commissions involved in buying a house. The National Association of Real Estate Boards has challenged an interpretation of Sec. George Romney of the Housing & Urban Development Dept. seeking to impose ceilings on sales commissions.

No Solution for Quality:

Nixon 'Education Renewal' Plan Assailed as Political Document

PRES. NIXON'S new plan for "educational renewal" was branded an empty promise that adds up to little more than a political document.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, charged in a network radio interview that Nixon's call for a moratorium on busing was a political response to the recent Florida primary.

It offers no solution to the problem of upgrading low-quality schools and expanding opportunities for disadvantaged students, Davis said. In fact, he noted, only 18 months ago, the President said "we shouldn't invest any money" in compensatory education—that it was "bad government, bad politics and, in fact, bad education."

Now, Davis noted, the President says he is all for compensatory education—so long as it dosen't involve any new federal money. But increased funds are essential to better schools, Davis stressed, on Labor News Conference.

Davis said the Administration could do far more toward improving the schools by pushing hard for full implementation of laws already on the books than it can by seeking new legislation.

"There is no need for any new legislation to do what he wants to do," Davis asserted, adding that "the President is misleading the American people when he says—or implies—that this is a brand new effort."

The labor educator stressed that Congress has already enacted the needed upgrading programs, and authorized $4.8 billion for the effort under Title I of the Elementary & Secondary School Act. But, Davis said, only one-third of the funds authorized by that legislation has been appropriated and he called on the Administration to put meaning into its call for better schools by supporting full funding of the program.

Reporters questioning Davis on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program were Donald Finley of United Press International and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRES. NIXON IS FOND of catchy headline phrases to describe his programs not the least of which is his "New Economic Policy" which turns out to be not so new as it is a fancied up version of his old "trickle-down" theory of economics.

Actually the United States is in desperate need of a truly "new" economic policy that will forget the catchwords and buckle down to the job of getting the economy moving again, workers back on the job and inflation licked.

Latest proposal for such an economic start is contained in the current "Report of the Joint Economic Committee on the January 1972 Economic Report of the President."

It contains at least a dozen ideas, some of which are close to what organized labor has been recommending now for many years—at least one on international trade with which labor disagrees—but all of them well worthy of more public attention than they have received so far.

At the top of the list is the committee's deep dissatisfaction with today's rate of unemployment and the measures that the Nixon Administration is using to meet that basic problem. The congressional report—which represents the sentiments of most of its 20 Senate-House members—says flatly:

"Recent suggestions that full employment can be equated with an unemployment rate greater than 4 percent are totally unacceptable."

The report calls for a level no higher than 3 percent, or about half of what it now is, and asks Nixon to come up with a definite plan to stimulate the economy, not repress it.

One suggestion for this is that the Federal Reserve should develop a program to achieve lower long-term interest rates, particularly those on home mortgages.

The current system of price and wage controls is described as "too complex to be administered efficiently." A largely voluntary price-income policy would be desirable instead.

An important observation in the report is that manpower policies should be tied directly to jobs with job opportunities stimulated "through growth of aggregate demand in the private sector and through expansion of the public sector."

There are other suggestions: that Congress close tax loopholes that are still a scandal to the nation; that the social security tax system be made more progressive; that major subsidy programs be restudied; that the defense program be limited to provide essential national security and not used as a method of economic stimulation; that military expenditures be more carefully checked.

One of the most controversial suggestions of the Joint Committee's report is that the solution to international trade problems "is not to be found in quotas or similar restrictions limiting imports." Instead, the report suggests adjustment of exchange rates, strengthening of competitiveness "through efficient management, increased worker productivity and shifts in the makeup of output."

MONETARY REFORM is also suggested; replacement of the dollar as an international currency in favor of special drawing rights by the International Monetary Fund and similar arrangements are proposed.

What is important about the committee's recommendations is not whether they are the perfect answer to the nation's problems, but that the American people be given alternatives to the deadly business-oriented sameness of the Nixon solutions to the nation's ills. No matter how framed as earth-shattering and curealls, Nixon proposals invariably end up as bribes and rewards for business and crackdowns on workers.

A new start in solving the problems of the American economy is now desperately needed. The Joint Committee's report might well serve as a jumping off place.

A BUSING MORATORIUM called for by Pres. Nixon on the promise to upgrade schools was little more than a political document, AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was interviewed by Frank Swoboda, left, of Business Week magazine and Donald Finley of United Press International. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Major Airlines Ordered to Cut Anti-Strike Aid

An examiner for the Civil Aeronautics Board has ordered the major airlines to cut back on the growing sums of money they have been paying out from a fund used for mutual aid when one of them is struck.

The examiner ordered the ten major "trunk" lines to roll back their maximum aid payments to 25 percent of a struck member's normal operating costs, rather than the 50 percent level agreed to by the lines in 1969. In addition he ruled that seven local-service carriers should be excluded from the pact.

The decision was hailed by Pres. John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots as a victory for the traveling public and an important step "in the interest of improving labor relations in the airline industry."

O'Donnell pointed out "although the aid pact was created in 1958 to shield the airlines against what they termed 'unreasonable' labor demands, it has failed to achieve its objective. Instead, the ready availability of anti-strike benefits has served only to stimulate and prolong labor-management disputes."

He cited studies showing that 38 strikes were called by airline unions between 1950 and the inception of the aid pact eight years later. Since then, he stressed, there have been 63 walkouts—lasting an average of 35.5 days versus 15.1 days before 1958.

"Now that CAB has applied the brakes on the aid pact's escalation," O'Donnell said, "it is hoped that the airlines will exert every effort to the resolution of labor differences at the bargaining table—instead of relying on the resources of other carriers."

Lower Pay for Youth Held Threat to Labor

—would move up to $1.50 and then to $1.70 an hour.

The Republican bill, Biemiller stressed, "would not expand coverage nor correct inequities in the present law."

In fact, he noted, "it would introduce some new inequities." Under the Republican substitute, retail employes paid a guaranteed salary plus a small commission would be excluded from overtime coverage.

By contrast, the committee bill would repeal or phase out present overtime exemptions for food processing workers, transit workers, employes of nursing homes and hotel and motel employes.

Under the Erlenborn bill, persons under 18 and students under 21 would be held at the $1.60 level or 80 percent of the applicable minimum wage for the occupation.

This, Biemiller charged, "would encourage employers to substitute youth for older workers with families."

Biemiller reiterated the AFL-CIO's concern about the high level of teenage unemployment and "about any unemployment."

But he emphasized that "the real problem . . . is that the economy is generating too few jobs for all workers, old as well as young. The answer is the creation of more jobs" and not a "pool of exploitable young workers."

Lowering the minimum wage for youth, he charged, would lead to discrimination against older workers "and higher profits for employers at the expense of young workers."

A Senate Labor subcommittee is currently completing action on a companion measure, sponsored by Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.).

It has approved a two-step raise in the minimum wage to $2.20 an hour. Newly covered workers would be brought to that level in three annual steps. It also voted to expand coverage to an estimated 9 million additional workers

NLRB Ruling Overturned:

Court Backs Unions On Copper Tactics

pany-wide agreements since only individual bargaining units are certified by the NLRB. The trial examiner and the full board found that such a violation had occurred.

But the appeals court threw out the NLRB interpretation in its entirety. It ruled that as long as negotiations are carried on at separate locations, and since "no bargaining was conducted at any unit with regard to wages, terms or employment conditions at other locales," there was no violation of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The appeals court ruling would also establish that a union can strike over two other bargaining demands —a limited no-strike clause and a "most favored nation" clause.

Modification of the traditional no-strike clause would allow a union to strike in support of their fellow employes in other bargaining units of the same employer in some instances. The "most favored nation" clause, which the Steelworkers negotiated with Phelps Dodge, gives the union a right, upon demand, to any more favorable provisions bargained by the same union in a different unit of that company.

However, if the union insists on physically merging the negotiations of various units or on a company-wide package applicable to several units, it would be in violation of Taft-Hartley.

That's what the NLRB contended had happened at Phelps Dodge and the appeals court overruled.

The board's decision was based on what it interpreted as the "intent" of the union and the contention that the unions delayed settlement of the 1967-68 strike in Arizona until agreement was reached in other units.

The court disagreed with the board's interpretation of intent and said that awaiting an agreement in other units was a "harmless violation" since the other units reached agreement by the time the Arizona settlement was ready for signing.

The board had ruled that submitting the Arizona contract to the union's Nonferrous Industry Conference for approval amounted to an attempt at delay. But the court found that no time had been lost in submitting the agreement to the conference, which was set up by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. to coordinate negotiations not only at Phelps Dodge but also at Kennecott, Anaconda and American Smelting & Refining, the other three major copper producers.

The NLRB decision against the unions was handed down in August 1970 and the case was argued before three federal judges last September. Attorney Michael Gottesman argued the case on behalf of the IUD.

The NLRB's argument on "intent" stemmed from a March 1967 meeting of the Nonferrous Industry Conference, which established a goal of company-wide master agreements and common contract termination dates.

When the company-wide master agreement was resisted by Phelps Dodge, it was abandoned and separate negotiations took place at the various company locations. The NLRB's subsequent finding, however, contended that the unions never gave up the objective of company-wide bargaining and thus had the "intent" of violating Taft-Hartley.

In disagreeing, the court said that the board's arguments had amounted to a legal "rationalization" of the board's decision once it had been made.

High Joblessness Dips in 2 Areas

Two of the 150 major employment areas in the U.S. showed enough job improvement during March to be dropped from the 6 percent or "substantial" jobless list. They were Lorain-Elyria, O., and the Davenport-Rock Island-Moline area of Illinois and Iowa.

This brings the number of "substantial" unemployment areas down from 57 in February to 55 last month.

Four other areas improved enough to be reclassified from the "moderate" (3 to 5.9 percent) to the "low" (1.5 to 2.9 percent) jobless categories. They were Asheville, Durham and Greensboro, N.C., and Greenville, S.C.

AFL-CIO Cites Benefits In College-Level Exams

A national program to award college credits to self-educated Americans has the endorsement of the AFL-CIO.

Education Director Walter G. Davis called on all federation affiliates, state and city central bodies to cooperate with the College-Level Examination Program which could bring job advancement and new opportunities to many thousands of workers.

He urged education directors and education committees to bring wide attention to CLEP because of its potential benefit to union members.

CLEP is based on the concept that individuals should receive academic credits for what they already know—a way of providing college equivalency for the self-educated who have not participated in traditional college studies.

CLEP was launched in 1967 by the College Entrance Examination Board with the financial support of the Carnegie Corp.

Today, nearly 1,000 universities and colleges will award credits based on the CLEP examinations, the board pointed out, noting that the credits are being widely accepted for advanced college studies and job advancement of workers.

Davis said it is essential that AFL-CIO unions support the program "so that individuals with talent are discovered and given the kind of training and opportunities which will allow them to grow and develop—and to make meaningful contributions to their nation and their communities."

While thousands of persons have taken advantage of the program, the College Board noted that there are millions who are not aware of CLEP's benefits. It stressed the importance of an extensive informational campaign to reach all potential beneficiaries.

From its log of case histories, the College Board cited the achievements of a former Chicago auto upholsterer, Irving Kossey, who is now working toward a Ph.D.

After taking the CLEP examination at Roosevelt University, Kossey was given two years of college credit, the maximum under the program. He continued studies at the university for a bachelor's degree and won a scholarship for graduate study. He later earned a master's degree in English literature and became an instructor. He is now the administrative assistant to the dean of Roosevelt's College of Arts & Science.

The college board cited other cases involving a machinist and a drill press operator who were elevated to high positions in their firms after completing CLEP exams and additional studies.

15,000 in Seattle Back PHS Hospital

Seattle—Fifteen thousand persons here have signed petitions protesting Administration efforts to close Seattle's U.S. Public Health Service facilities.

The petitions, circulated by the Central Seattle Community Council and the Health Care Coalition were sent to Rep. Brock Adams (D-Wash.).

Alaska Sets Major Benefit Boosts In Workmen's Compensation Law

Juneau, Alaska—A model workmen's compensation act was adopted by the Alaska state legislature and quickly signed into law by Gov. William A. Egan (D).

The measure boosts the maximum weekly benefits for temporary total disability or permanent partial disability from $127 to $175.

Additional increases approved by the legislature for permanent partial disability—as in the loss of a leg, hearing or a finger—average about 40 percent.

The new law put Alaska above Arizona, which had been leading the 50 states on payments for on-the-job injury at $150 a week maximum benefit.

Major industrial states rank further down the economic ladder on weekly payments for temporary total disability.

For example, benefits in California are $105, Pennsylvania $60, Illinois $89 to $109, Ohio $84, Connecticut $95 to $143, and Washington $121.

However, several of the less-industrialized states continue to lead states where manufacturing is the key industry. Among these are Hawaii, Montana, Nevada, Oregon and Utah.

Federal employes receive the best coverage under workmen's compensation in the nation. They can currently collect up to $480 a week in benefits for temporary total disability.

The Alaska workmen's compensation measure was enacted through a determined effort of the state AFL-CIO, which helped dislodge the bill from a committee in the state Senate.

The Senate passed the measure Mar. 8 and the House concurred the following day. Gov. Egan signed it into law the following Monday.

When the bill cleared the Senate, Majority Leader Terry Miller (R) and Minority Leader Joe Josephson (D) hailed the measure as "the most significant advancement for the working man ever approved by the Senate."

Among the key permanent weekly disability payments included in the measure are:

- Loss of an arm, 280 weeks compensation, up to $21,160, increased from $16,000.
- Loss of leg, 248 weeks compensation, up to $20,800, increased from $14,200.
- Loss of foot, 173 weeks compensation, up to $14,350, increased from $10,200.

The total allowable amount for permanent total disability or death was increased to $30,000, from the previous range of $17,000 to $20,000.

Other cases of disability not directly specified in the act are based on 65 percent of the worker's average wage.

New York Strike Settlement:

Phone Pact Clears Pay Board Panel

The Pay Board's new three-man Cases & Appeals Panel approved the full settlement negotiated by the Communications Workers for 38,000 employes of the New York Telephone Co.

The settlement follows the pattern of 33.5 percent in wage increases over three years already allowed more than a million telephone workers across the country.

"It would have been sheer folly to withhold any part of that settlement from a single group in the same Bell System," CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said.

"So the action of the Pay Board panel is good news, indeed, especially in view of the fact that it has been the source of so much bad news in recents days and weeks."

CWA members in New York had been on strike from July 18, 1971, until last Feb. 18. They ratified the new contract by mail ballot.

The new three-man panel created by the Pay Board was to begin issuing rulings on the more than 1,000 cases awaiting board action, but major cases and policy decisions will still be decided by the full seven-man board.

Designated to sit on the panel at its first meeting were public member Neil H. Jacoby, Rocco Siciliano, the one remaining business member, and Teamster Pres. Frank E. Fitzsimmons, the only remaining labor representative.

Meanwhile, the Pay Board made public the fact that the five former business members of the board had challenged a number of deferred wage increases due hundreds of workers including 81,000 Postal Service employes.

The challenges were made during the week of Mar. 6 but were not made public until all the parties were notified. It was presumed that by Mar. 31, all parties would have received notifying letters.

The challenges did not specify whether entire contracts were to be reviewed, or merely the deferred wage increases.

Generally, the letters asked for more information.

The challenges involve 39 union contracts, but the number of workers affected was not available.

The deferred increases in question, the board said, range up to 16.3 percent. The board has set a guideline of 7 percent for raises involving exceptional circumstances.

The Pay Board policy on deferred or incremental wage increases negotiated before the Nov. 14 beginning of Phase 2 is that in general, they may take effect unless challenged.

Farm Workers, NLRB Confer on Union's Status

Fresno, Calif.—The Farm Workers have entered into negotiations with the government in an attempt to clarify the union's right to press a boycott of non-union wineries. The dispute has been marked by bitter charges of union-busting against the Nixon Administration.

In a stipulation signed by the union and the office of the National Labor Relations Board's general counsel, it was agreed that the Farm Workers would discontinue the boycott and the government would drop its petition for a federal court injunction against it.

The agreement was reached two days before the U.S. District Court here was to hear arguments on the government's request for an injunction.

The Farm Workers had termed the bid for an injunction an overt attempt by the Nixon Administration to squash the fledgling union, which received its charter from the AFL-CIO only in February. Strong support for the UFW position has been proffered by other unions.

Since agricultural workers are specifically exempted from the protections of the National Labor Relations Act, they should not be subjected to its restrictions on boycotts, the union has said.

UFW Director Cesar Chavez had cited the NLRB general counsel's action as another example of Pres. Nixon's anti-worker policies, which he charged include packing the NLRB with pro-management members, initiating anti-labor legislation and freezing the wages of low-paid agricultural workers while allowing food prices to soar.

In a strong statement of support, Pres. Martin J. Ward of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters said that the government's actions against the Farm Workers dispel any lingering doubts "about the fundamental anti-union, anti-worker, pro-employer bias of the Nixon Administration."

"The condition of farm labor in this country is a national disgrace." Ward said. "We think the President and all agencies of the federal government should be seeking ways and means to help farm workers climb up the scale instead of stamping out whatever little chance of self-help they do have."

IUE Calls For Clarification of Taiwan Policy

The top officers of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have written Pres. Nixon asking clarification of Administration policy on Taiwan.

Pointing out that Taiwan is "an outpost of American industry, the site of scores of factories erected by U.S.-based multinational firms," the union leaders asked the President:

- Will the U.S. Commerce Dept. continue to encourage the export of production and jobs to Taiwan?
- Are American companies now in Taiwan assured a continuation of present conditions for the indefinite future?
- Does the Administration intend to seek to replace with more American production and jobs the economic support provided the Taiwanese economy by our country's military presence when our military withdraws?

The letter noted that many U.S. firms "have invested hundreds of millions of dollars on the island and are now enjoying tax holidays and other generous concessions extended by the Republic of China government."

At the same time, the unionists said, exports to the United States will be vastly increased.

Massachusetts Unions Mourn Sal Camelio

Boston — Salvatore Camelio, president of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO since 1964, died unexpectedly at his home in Belmont, Mass., Mar. 30. He was 66.

Camelio, who also was president of the Middlesex Labor Council since 1959, was a veteran member of the Rubber Workers. He was elected the first president of URW Local 25 in Boston in 1933 and had served as New England director for the URW for a number of years until his retirement in 1970.

He was the secretary-treasurer of the Massachusetts CIO Council from 1946 until merger with the AFL state federation in 1958. Camelio was executive vice president of the State AFL-CIO before he was elected to the top office in 1964.

During World War II, Camelio served on the War Labor Board and the Manpower Advisory Board. He also has served on the boards of Massachusetts Bay United Fund, Governor's Economic Advisory Task Force, Histadrut Council, and was active in a number of community and service organizations.

Camelio was born in Geata, Italy, and came to the United States as a child. He is survived by his wife Angela, five children and three grandchildren.

The executive council of the State AFL-CIO is expected to select a successor to his office shortly. Camelio had one and one-half years remaining in his term.

U.S., Japanese Labor Focus on Multinationals

Tokyo—An AFL-CIO delegation and leaders of the Japanese Confederation of Labor held two days of discussions here on economic problems facing workers of both nations.

It was the fourth annual conference in a series that has alternated between Washington and Tokyo in a mutual effort towards greater understanding of common problems in such areas as dealings with multinational corporations.

A joint statement by the two trade union centers stressed the value of "continuous communication and cooperation" against companies, especially the multinationals, "which subordinate the economic health of countries and the welfare of human beings on the altar of accumulation of profits."

Representing the AFL-CIO at the Tokyo conference were James A. Suffridge, vice president emeritus of the federation; AFL-CIO Vice Presidents I. W. Abel and Hunter P. Wharton; Harry Goldberg of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs; United Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Francis Schaufenbil; George Collins, international affairs director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Lester Thornton, international representative of the Steelworkers.

The delegation from DOMEI, the Japanese federation, was headed by its president, Seiji Amaike.

The joint statement took note of "DOMEI's struggle to improve working conditions including wage levels of the Japanese workers, and the insistence that Japan substantially shift its emphasis from the overblown capital accumulation of export trade to the betterment of the domestic situation."

It noted also "the necessity for the AFL-CIO to overcome the increased unemployment that has occurred in the United States because of the activity of the multinational corporations and other unhealthy economic and trade practices."

Both sides welcomed the scheduled return of Okinawa to Japan and explored a broad range of international problems, including environmental and ecological issues.

Part of the U.S. delegation, including Wharton and Suffridge, continued on to visits with union leaders in other nations.

At New Delhi, in addition to talking with trade union officials, they met with government leaders, including Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. At Istanbul, they met with Seyfi Demirsoy, president of Turkey's labor federation, and in London they conferred with top officials of the British Trades Union Congress.

Musicians Reach Pact on Recordings

New York—The Musicians have reached agreement with the phonograph recording industry on a new three-year contract covering members who perform all types of recording dates, ranging from classical music to rock 'n' roll.

Terms of the settlement were not announced pending a ratification vote by mail referendum.

Height Rule Dropped After Union Lawsuit

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers won an agreement from a General Electric Co. plant at Tyler, Tex., to discontinue a minimum height requirement which the IUE charged was discriminatory toward women job applicants.

The company also agreed to hire seven women applicants who had been turned down for employment only because they did not meet the height requirement of 5 feet 7 inches. IUE Local 782 had filed suit on behalf of the women in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Texas.

The union's suit which was settled out of court, maintained that the height rule barred 94 percent of all women between the ages of 18 and 79 from employment and, therefore, was an instance of sex bias in hiring.

The IUE charged that the rule, as applied to both men and women, "is not a reasonable or necessary requirement for employment" because "the vast majority of jobs in the Tyler plant can be performed in the most efficient and satisfactory manner" by persons less than 5 feet 7 inches tall.

The plant produces central air conditioning units for use in the home.

Although GE denied that the height rule was an example of sex discrimination, it nevertheless agreed to discontinue using it as a criterion for employment.

Rep. Burke Warns:

Free-Trade 'Myth' Threatens Economy

Existing U.S. "free trade" policy is bankrupting the country, Rep. James A. Burke (D-Mass.) warned in calling for measures to stem the flood of imports "that has washed hundreds of thousands of jobs away."

Speaking to a luncheon of the Maritime Trades Dept., Burke pinned much of the current economic crisis on the nation's foreign trade posture.

Burke, co-sponsor with Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.) of the Foreign Trade & Investment bill now before Congress, stressed that unless the drain on the U.S. economy is halted the stability of the nation is in jeopardy.

"We need protection from the grossly unfair reality of our free trade policy," he said. "The alternative is the slow starvation of our economy, the continued erosion of jobs and income and, indeed, a continuing threat to the suvival of the nation itself."

Burke said that free trade in the world market is a "myth." He traced the development of the myth from the time the United States was the strongest of the world's exporting nations and as it fostered vast foreign economic and industrial aid programs for underdeveloped countries.

"Our experts trained people around the world in ways they could compete with our industry. We gave away the machinery to set up shops and sent technicians to get operations going. . . . We licensed patents so that the latest technology could be adopted by industry overseas."

"And perhaps worst of all," Burke stressed, "through a system of tax advantages and credits, we encouraged our nation's industry to locate overseas."

However, throughout this period, he noted, trade barriers were being built up against U.S. products around the world.

"But now the myth is beginning to wear thin," Burke declared.

"Those trade barriers are still up around the world and our encouragement of foreign trade investment has become a Frankenstein's monster—rending apart the basis of our foreign trade."

He said, "we see whole industries closing as their operations move to subsidiaries of American firms scattered around the globe.

"We see people lining up to cash unemployment checks, people who have many skills to contribute to America's development and who cannot because the jobs aren't there."

Measures pending in Congress, including the Burke-Hartke bill, would put an end to this imbalance, he noted. Yet, he added, "every time you try to discuss those trade measures, someone conditioned by the old mythology of free trade hollers the word 'protectionist.' "

"We need to protect ourselves in many fields from the incredible flood of imports," Burke said. "And we have to establish our right to the government's fair share of profits that multinational corporations are raking in by producing things abroad and sending them back here for sale."

The workers, not the corporations, bear the brunt of the economic impact of the free trade myth, he said.

"The companies can flee to Hong Kong, to Malaysia, to Ethiopia, but the worker stays where he is with no job and little prospect of finding one," Burke pointed out.

A REVITALIZED MARITIME FLEET is essential to the nation's economic welfare, delegates agreed at the 91st convention of the Marine Engineers in Bal Harbour, Fla. The convention also called for passage of the Burke-Hartke foreign trade bill to curb adverse impact of low-wage imports and policies of multinational corporations.

Meany Urges Effective Steps On Price Curbs

- Mandatory labeling of base and current prices on all retail items.
- Establishment of adequate compliance and enforcement machinery.
- Prompt processing of consumer complaints, including reports to consumers on the disposition of their complaints.
- Elimination of secrecy from Price Commission proceedings and provision for open hearings.
- Government action to assist consumers in the recovery of overcharges.

"These proposals," said Meany, contain the beginnings of an effective economic stabilization program.

"The failure of the Cost of Living Council, the Price Commission and the Internal Revenue Service to implement our recommendations of Nov. 9 and our Executive Council proposals of Feb. 18 are written in the failure of Phase 2," Meany declared.

The Price Commission's approach—in favor of business at the expense of the consumer—was apparent from the very beginning, Meany said.

"Mr. Perils reported to me, following his appearance before your commission almost five months ago, that the commission didn't appear interested in our proposals since his presentation was received without a single question or discussion."

New Guidelines Tighten Rules Barring Sex Bias

women workers disabled by pregnancy, miscarriage, abortion or childbirth.

The EEOC guidelines revised existing directives on women's protective legislation adopted by a number of states, extending to men certain benefits previously limited by the state laws to women. These include minimum wage laws, working age standards, premium overtime, special rest or meal periods and retirement ages.

States that do not bring their laws into conformity with EEOC guidelines may be open to court challenge on the ground that they are in violation of the Civil Rights Act.

The guidelines also are aimed at equalization of fringe benefits including medical, hospital, accident, life insurance and retirement benefits, profit-sharing and bonus plans, leave and other terms, conditions and privileges of employment.

Special attention was directed to distinctions such as "head of household" or "principal wage earner" status which confers greater benefits on men, and pension or retirement plans containing differentials based on sex.

Before publication of the guidelines in the Federal Register, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers had filed suit in U.S. court in Richmond, Va., charging the General Electric Co., with sex discrimination because it refused to pay sickness benefits to seven women at its Salem, Va., plant for absences due to pregnancy and childbirth.

The IUE suit claimed that women workers unable to work because of pregnancy are entitled to the same sickness and accident benefits paid any other worker for non-occupational disability.

The union contended that GE's refusal to pay the benefits is a violation of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act because this section of the law forbids discriminatory employment practices on the basis of sex.

Sickness and accident benefits amounting to 60 percent of wages—with a maximum of $150 weekly—are paid for up to 26 weeks per disability under IUE's national contract with General Electric.

In its complaint, the union pointed out that GE has paid these benefits to male employes "for every kind and type of sickness and accident . . ." but has refused to pay "any female employe for any absence due to disability arising from, or related to, pregnancy or childbirth."

IUE represents about 90,000 GE workers, and at least one-third of these are women, the union said.

Court Asked to Raise Wage Exemption Level

was buttressed by a "friend of the court" brief filed by Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.).

Ryan told the court that he was the author of the language in the House bill exemption "substandard" earnings and he said the legislative history clearly supports the $3.35 exemption as the intent of Congress.

His brief and the AFL-CIO brief noted that the official report of the House Banking Committee on the Economic Stabilization Act amendments declared:

"It is the intention of the committee that this exemption from control apply to all persons whose earnings are at or below levels established by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in determining an income necessary to afford adequate food, clothing and shelter and similar necessities."

The AFL-CIO brief also ripped into the justifications used by the Cost of Living Council in holding the exemption to $1.90 and under—including the argument that a "family budget" shouldn't be used to determine substandard wages since many families have more than one wage-earner.

In fact, the AFL-CIO countered, nearly two out of three low-income families have only a single wage-earner. And the congressional attempt to apply the exemption to all individuals whose earnings are inadequate for the minimum budget level is clear.

Joining the IUE in asking the district court to issue a summary judgment against the Cost of Living Council, the AFL-CIO declared:

"The conclusion is clear—the Cost of Living Council has arbitrarily and capriciously refused to abide by Congress' mandate."

Court action is essential to remedy its "lawless ruling."

Inflation Adviser Butz Spouts New Labor Line

Sec. of Agriculture Earl Butz has a new suggestion for fighting inflation.

It's even better than his earlier advice that consumers who think meat prices are too high shouldn't "eat quite so much."

Butz told an Atlanta news conference that "the nation's union members should get new leaders . . . who will rise to the call of greatness."

He blamed inflation on "the power of labor leaders" and said it was "a sorry sight" when four union leaders left the Pay Board. The place for "every man, woman and child" is in the "front lines" of the battle against inflation, Butz declared. Workers should find themselves "new leaders who are in tune with today's needs" and, presumably, will keep wages down.

The Dept. of Agriculture's public information office thought so highly of this advice that it played a recording of it for four days on the "spot news service" it feeds to radio stations throughout the nation.

Rail Union Appoints Research Director

Detroit—The Maintenance of Way Employes have announced the appointment of Raymond A. Flanagan, Jr., as director of research.

Flanagan, 29, has been a reporter for several Pennsylvania newspapers and active in the Newspaper Guild. He fills the vacancy left by the death of Russell J. Blake early this year.

St. Louis Raid Turned Back By Machinists

St. Louis—Workers at the McDonnell Douglas aerospace plant here gave Machinists District 837 a solid vote of confidence in rejecting an attempted raid by a 2-to-1 margin.

The victory in the representation election was even more impressive than the IAM achieved three years ago over the Technical Employes of Aerospace Manufacturers (TEAM).

This time around, District 837 received 6,344 votes to 3,646 for TEAM.

The election interrupted the IAM's negotiations for a new contract with the big aerospace firm.

IAM District Pres. Cosimo Troia said that bargaining is expected to resume about Apr. 13, after the National Labor Relations Board certifies the election results.

Meany Rips Nixon Policies Of Aid to Business, Wealthy

Senate Unit Votes $2.20 Wage Floor

A Senate subcommittee has approved a labor-supported bill that would raise the minimum wage to $2.20 an hour and expand coverage to some 6 million additional workers.

Administration supporters are expected to battle in the full Senate Labor Committee to trim back the legislation and to carry the fight to the Senate floor if they lose in committee.

Based on legislation introduced by Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.), the Senate bill would:

- Raise the minimum wage for those whose jobs were covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act before 1966 from the present $1.60 to $2 and then to $2.20 a year later.
- Set the minimum wage for all other non-farm workers at $1.80, with annual step-ups to $2 and $2.20.
- Raise the farm worker minimum from the present $1.30 to $1.70, with future step-ups to $2 and $2.20.
- Gradually abolish the lower minimum wage schedules for Puerto Rico by providing 20-cent annual increases until parity with the mainland is reached at the $2.20 level.
- Expand coverage to include public employes not now protected by the law, domestic household workers, additional groups of farm workers and retail trade and service

WAGE EARNERS are paying for the Nixon Administration's favoritism to big business and banks, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the National Press Club in Washington.

5.2 Million Unemployed:

Jobless Rate Climbs As 'Mess' Continues

By Tom Castor

Unemployment climbed back near the 6 percent level that has prevailed for almost a year and a half and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared that the increase, coupled with a new rise in the Wholesale Price Index, reveals "the continuing economic mess confronting the American people."

The jobless rate edged up to 5.9 percent in March on a seasonally adjusted basis after dipping to 5.7 percent in February. And although the number of persons with jobs made its greatest increase in nearly five years, there were still 5.2 million persons unemployed—not far below the 10-year high of 5.5 million reached last July.

Meany noted that the unemployment rates were as high as 11.7 percent for unskilled workers, 10.5 percent for Negroes, 9.9 percent for 20-24-year-olds and 12.3 percent for veterans in that same age group.

Nearly 2.5 million persons who wanted full-time jobs were working part time.

"It is clear that the economy is not creating enough jobs for a rapidly growing labor force in a period of fast-rising productivity," Meany said.

Turning to the rise in wholesale prices, Meany said the March increase of one-tenth of 1 percent—following the massive rise of nine-tenths of 1 percent in February—underscores the continuing seriousness of the inflation problem.

"In the four months of so-called price controls since last November," he observed, "the Wholesale Price Index has risen at a yearly rate of 6 percent, compared with an increase at an annual rate of 4.6 percent in the six months from February to August 1971—before the President announced his new economic policy to combat inflation."

Economic Record Scored as 'Dismal'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged the Nixon Administration with engineering a "massive redistribution" of income and resources to benefit big business and the wealthy at the expense of the rest of the nation.

While business and banks prosper, Meany said, "the American people are being fleeced at the supermarket checkout counter, squeezed in the pay check and compelled to bear an undue share of the tax burden."

The AFL-CIO president ripped into the Administration's "dismal" economic record in a major address to the National Press Club in Washington. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

He linked the "almost hysterical" White House reaction to the resignation of four labor members of the Pay Board to the Administration's continuing search "for a scapegoat to carry the burden of its colossal failures in the economic sector."

The burden of its failures, Meany stressed, has fallen hardest on those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

Business profits, spurred by the "flagrant favoritism" of the Administration's tax policies, are up sharply. And the result has been a shift in income and resources "away from those most in need, away from public programs of the highest social priority, and toward big business and the affluent elements of our society."

Meany spoke scathingly of the twists and turns of the Nixon Administration's economic game plans, the broken promises and wildly inaccurate predictions—and, throughout, the assumption by the President and his advisers "that economic progress begins and ends

'Watchdogs' To Step Up Price Probe

By John R. Oravec

Organized labor's price watchdogs were told to accelerate their nationwide monitoring activities despite the frustrations caused by the failures of the Nixon Administration's Phase 2 controls.

The message was delivered to 500 delegates attending the week-long session of the AFL-CIO National Conference on Community Services. While the focus was on the impact of runaway consumer prices, the delegates also explored other community and social problems.

Director Leo Perlis of the Dept. of Community Services charged that price controls are rigged in a way that makes it almost impossible to determine whether increases are legal or not.

But labor's monitors will not give up, he stressed. "We will accelerate our monitoring activities," not only in shopping centers, supermarkets and apartment houses, but also at hospitals and doctors' offices, he declared.

Rail Union Urges U.S. Acquire Penn Central

United Transportation Union Pres. Al H. Chesser urgently recommended that Congress take the bankrupt Penn Central Railroad from the private sector and "place it in the hands of public officials whose sole responsibility will be to make the railroad a viable transport network in the East."

Chesser, whose 150,000-member rail union represents 18,000 Penn Central workers, told a press luncheon in Washington that the carrier is "dead as a private enterprise system."

He told reporters that it was "killed by greed, killed by mismanagement, killed by colossal ignorance."

Chesser stipulated however that the American public should not be burdened with the debts incurred for the Penn Central by speculators. He said Congress should take over the Penn Central without accruing the carrier's debts and pay only the "salvage price for the scrap value" of the carrier's physical assets.

"What needs to be done," said Chesser, "is to let the gamblers lose. Wipe out the debt structure. If ownership must pass to the public, let it pass free and clear for a new start. The taxpayer must not be put in the position of bailing out those who gambled and lost."

Chesser's recommendation for

40% of Corporations Found Escaping Taxes

Profits are booming for America's corporations, but the tax bite the government gets is no more than a nibble.

A newspaper study of Internal Revenue Service statistics found that more than 40 percent of U.S. corporations pay no federal income tax and some of the biggest companies pay only token amounts.

One set of depreciation and deduction loopholes enables a high proportion of companies to "erase" their operating profits and show a paper loss on their tax returns.

Another set of tax credits, loopholes and carryover provisions can reduce the tax obligation on hundreds of millions of dollars of net income to token amounts.

The tax data uncovered by Scripps-Howard reporter Robert Dietsch bolsters charges made by Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-Ohio) that corporations are becoming "freeloaders" in the U.S. economy while the tax burden is increasingly shifted to the wage-earner who "pays on every dollar of income."

The average taxpayer, Vanik noted, "has no depreciation gim-

Price Watch Stressed At AFL-CIO Conference

Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) told the conference the Phase 2 control program that followed the 90-day freeze "doesn't make any sense at all." He went on to point out the inequities between wage and price controls.

"The government has an enforcer on wages," Proxmire noted. "And, of course, there are 5 million firms in this country—so you have 5 million enforcers."

But "how about prices?" he asked. "You just have a pitiful handful of people from the Internal Revenue Service to try to hold down prices."

But the worst part of the price control program is the secrecy that surrounds the submission of data by firms applying to the Price Commission for increases, he said.

"The Price Commission doesn't go behind this data," Proxmire pointed out. "The businesses can supply anything they wish, no matter how inaccurate it is. There is no way anybody is going to find out because it is never challenged."

Proxmire also criticized the Price Commission for continuing to make determinations in closed-door meetings, despite persistent prodding from the Joint Economic Committee of Congress to lift the curtain of secrecy.

That pressure from Congress resulted in "only one open hearing in the many months that we have had Phase 2," he said, and "with thousands of prices being determined—thousands going up—no hearings at all."

Proxmire also noted that the Cost of Living Council has now admitted that 20 percent of the nation's large firms whose reports have been examined were in violation of Phase 2 profit standards.

He said this leads to the possibility that anyone who can violate the standards will likely ignore the price regulations.

"Here is the clearest kind of evidence that this program is simply not working," he stressed.

In addition to the far-ranging consumer problems, the conference sessions and workshops studied a number of community affairs programs involving labor. These included United Fund activities, assistance for the unemployed, drug abuse, alcoholism, voluntary health agencies, criminal justice, and labor's participation in the arts.

Among major speakers were Sen. Harold E. Hughes (D-Iowa) on alcoholism; Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) on crime and juvenile justice; Pres. George M. Elsey of the American Red Cross on blood banking, and Chairman Edwin D. Etherington of the National Center for Voluntary Action on labor's cooperative efforts.

The conference was to conclude with the Philip Murray-William Green Award banquet honoring AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, president emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters, for his lifetime of humanitarian service.

Novella Porter Is Acting Head Of Auxiliaries

Mrs. Novella Porter, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, has been named acting director of the women's activities organization.

Mrs. Porter takes over the functions of Mrs. Marcella S. Beatty, who retired Mar. 1 as executive director because of illness.

Mrs. Beatty had headed the national auxiliaries since 1959. She began her union career with the Machinists in Wichita, Kan., during World War II. She later served as a full-time assistant shop chairman and also as an organizer for the IAM.

Mrs. Beatty also has served on the President's Committee on the Employment of the Handicapped, President's Committee on Consumer Interests, Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services and the U.S. Savings Bond Division.

Mrs. Porter was first appointed secretary-treasurer in 1967 and was re-elected at the past three biennial conventions. She became active in women's activities in 1948 with Local 26 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. She was elected a vice president of the National Auxiliaries in 1963.

Mrs. Porter, who also continues to serve as secretary-treasurer, said the auxiliaries are working on the development of a more effective national program of women's activities through the cooperation of AFL-CIO affiliates and local unions.

Tangle of Contradictions:

Senate Probe of ITT Bares One Scandal After Another

By David L. Perlman

One political scandal led to another as the Senate Judiciary Committee continued to probe the tangle of contradictory testimony that has held up confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as Attorney General of the United States.

There was strong new evidence of the machinations of ITT—the multi-billion dollar International Telephone & Telegraph conglomerate that got an out-of-court settlement of a Justice Dept. antitrust suit after pledging financial backing for the Republican National Convention to be held in San Diego this summer.

Rep. Bob Wilson, the San Diego congressman who heads the money-dispensing Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, admitted the authenticity of an interview he gave that in effect made liars out of ITT officials who had denied knowledge of the now-famous memorandum from lobbyist Dita Beard.

The trail of both the ITT case and a separate Justice Dept. cover-up of admitted interference with an investigation of illegal corporation contributions to Pres. Nixon's campaign fund led to both Kleindienst and the inner circles of the White House.

A flat refusal by the White House to let presidential aides testify before the committee has put the once-certain confirmation of Kleindienst in serious jeopardy.

Influential conservatives as well as liberal Democrats now are prepared to fight the nomination. Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.), a respected leader of the southern bloc, said he will battle to keep the nomination from even coming to the floor if key White House aides do not testify. And Assistant Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) indicated a similar stand.

Meanwhile, the Judiciary Committee continued its effort to unravel the facts.

Wilson said ITT Pres. Harold S. Geneen, whom he described as an old friend, had personally pledged to him a guarantee of $400,000 for the GOP convention. And he said the head of ITT's Washington office, William R. Merriam, had admitted to him having received a memo from Mrs. Beard. In fact, Wilson said, Mrs. Beard had told him she wrote the memo at Merriam's request.

In a jumble of confusion, Merriam then took the witness stand to:

- Deny that he had ever seen the Beard memo.
- Admit that he "may" have told Wilson that he had received it, but if so he was mistaken.
- Say he dumped office files into a shredding machine after Columnist Jack Anderson published the text of the Beard memo because "there might be a lot of others in there like that," and "we wanted to clear out everything . . . that would have embarrassed us in any way."
- Decide finally that he couldn't have received the memo on the day it was dated because he was out playing golf all that day.
- Complain, after senators prodded at contradictions in his testimony, that "everything I say, I'm getting worse."

Meanwhile, the committee put into the record a letter from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover that laboratory tests of the memo turned over by Anderson linking the antitrust settlement to the GOP convention pledge confirmed that it was actually written about the time it was dated.

This punctured ITT's claim that its test showed the memo to have been written some six months after its June 25 date.

Kleindienst, the top Justice Dept. official involved in the ITT case, was even more directly tied to a political-influence scandal originally exposed by Life Magazine.

This also involved San Diego, the Nixon Administration and Republican politics—although not ITT.

Life Magazine reported that a Nixon appointee, Assistant U.S. Attorney Harry Steward, had blocked a subpoena that would have required a Republican fund-raiser in San Diego to testify before a federal grand jury on illegal corporation contributions to Pres. Nixon's 1968 campaign.

Steward had worked with the man under investigation, Frank Thornton, as a Republican fund-raiser. The Justice Dept. conceded that he had told federal investigators that Thornton was a friend who had arranged his appointment as a federal attorney and who was promoting him with the Nixon Administration for a federal judgeship.

The head of the Justice Dept.'s Criminal Division, Henry E. Peterson, acknowledged to the Senate committee that Steward's actions were "highly improper."

He admitted that Kleindienst knew all the facts in the case this February when he issued a public statement absolving Steward of any wrongdoing.

And he said Kleindienst had told him personally after talking with Steward, "Frankly, I think he hasn't done anything wrong."

When senators wanted to know how the apparent clean bill of health given by Kleindienst could be squared with the admittedly "highly improper action," the Justice Dept. official had a ready answer.

"Wrongdoing," he suggested, means corruption in which "money was involved" such as bribery, and that was not present in this case.

Later, he said that "the reason we had to clear him is that information was leaked to the press that the investigation was being conducted."

Still another and potentially even more damning charge against Kleindienst remained to be aired before the Senate committee.

That involves testimony by Kleindienst last year at a trial in which one Robert T. Carson was convicted of participating in a bribery scheme.

According to an account in the New York Times, Kleindienst testified that Carson had asked him to help out a friend who was under federal indictment. And in return, the friend would contribute $50,000 to $100,000 to Nixon's campaign.

Kleindienst said that at the time he didn't consider the proposition to be an offer of a bribe. It wasn't until he learned that Carson was under FBI investigation, Kleindienst testified, that he realized a bribe had been offered.

Geneen Well Paid For His Troubles

Harold S. Geneen, president of the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp., may be having his troubles these days with Senate hearings on political influence-buying.

But he's well paid for it; in fact he's the nation's highest-paid executive.

Last year, Geneen earned $812,494 in salary and exercised stock options worth an additional $795,850.

His stock option profits were about the same as the previous year, but his salary went up by some $46,000.

Five other ITT executives earned more than $200,000 in 1971, according to the company report.

IBEW Spurs Joint Talks On Union-Busting Firm

Growing evidence of nationwide union-busting activities by Federal Pacific Electric Co. has led the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers to seek a coordinated bargaining approach to the firm under the auspices of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

In a letter to all IBEW locals, Pres. Charles H. Pillard outlined the deterioration in relations with Federal Pacific during the last 18 months.

The company manufactures switchboards, motor controls, residential circuit breakers and similar electrical products. Pillard said that the IBEW, which represents 2,500 employes at 11 Federal Pacific plants from Massachusetts to California, has enjoyed good labor relations with the firm for years, as have other unions.

But controlling interest in the company was acquired by the U.S. Smelting & Refining Co., 18 months ago, and labor relations have since deteriorated, Pillard reported.

The IBEW was certified as the bargaining agent following a representation election at the company's plant in Albemarle, N.C., on Mar. 12, 1971. But to date, the company has refused to offer the employes an agreement. Following the firm's refusal to comply with a National Labor Relations Board order on an illegal discharge of an employe, the Albemarle workers began an unfair practice strike.

Simultaneously, IBEW locals in Los Angeles and Dallas have reported "stalling tactics" by Federal Pacific Electric in negotiations there, although the Dallas local eventually reached agreement on a new contract.

Since the Steelworkers, Machinists and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers also have contracts with Federal Pacific Electric, the IUD was asked to set up a coordinated bargaining committee.

Representatives of those unions met in Albemarle in late March to review the company's activities and its financial position, including pension and insurance provisions under various contracts.

Voter Drive Stressed:

Economic Issue Key For Blacks, Whites

By Rex Hardesty

Houston—The Nixon Administration has done Negro Americans a favor by focusing the nation's political attention on the economy where it belongs, delegates to the A. Philip Randolph Institute's third national conference were told.

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the institute, said that while "it's fashionable to have a new issue every other year," the underlying cause has always been economic. That has been true, he said, of the concern with civil rights in 1960, violence in the streets in 1964 or women's liberation in 1970.

"But now, for the first time, there is absolutely no doubt that the principal issue is the economy," Rustin said of the 1972 elections. He said the Nixon Administration's "economics of scarcity" has made that clear, to the black and white community alike.

The three-day 1972 conference marked a milestone in the growth of the six-year-old A. Philip Randolph Institute, Rustin noted. The 492 delegates represented 76 institute chapters in 29 states and were members of 54 international unions from the AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers and the Teamsters.

The registration at previous conferences, held annually to map voter registration and get-out-the-vote activities among institute chapters, had been only 100 and 300, Rustin said.

Close cooperation between the institute and labor movement's various levels of organization were emphasized at the workshops and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland called the institute, "one of the best investments the AFL-CIO ever made."

AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Brakan reminded the delegates that a 300,000 vote switch in New Jersey, Illinois, Ohio and Missouri would have reversed the outcome of the 1968 election.

The delegates also heard from AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman and Education Director Walter G. Davis in a panel on labor's relations with minority groups.

Speaking of the 1963 March on Washington, Rustin said he wouldn't "conduct another march like that if you gave me a million dollars. The only march I want to see is on the ballot box."

Similarly, Rustin criticized the recent Gary, Ind., black convention for its apolitical, separatist sentiments. He said the Gary convention displayed the "deep political agony" of the 5,000 blacks who attended. It should have concluded that "only politics will save us," Rustin said, but instead it came up with no agenda and talk of an all-black third party.

Rustin told the predominantly Negro gathering that the "answer to black people's problems lies in Washington, D.C., not in Gary, Ind."

Kirkland, speaking to an audience of almost 800 at the conference banquet, said the Nixon Administration is a modern version of the age-old avarice of the privileged class, which always wants more.

Citing the increases in unemployment, consumer prices and the number of poor in the past 38 months, Kirkland said the Nixon Administration added up to "a massive robbing of the poor and looting of the nation's resources" in the form of corporate tax advantages and soaring profits.

Similarly, the working man can judge his chances of getting justice from George Wallace by looking at the history of injustice, unemployment, low wages and poverty which "the George Wallaces are the authors of" in the South.

Profit Violations Found For 20% of Top Firms

More than 20 percent of the nation's largest corporations are violating Price Commission regulations by raising their profit margins beyond permissible levels, according to a Nixon Administration official.

The Administration official, Donald Rumsfeld, director of the Cost of Living Council, said a review of 105 quarterly reports from firms with $50 million or more in annual sales revealed that at least 24 of them "apparently (are) operating at profit margins in excess of those permitted by the regulations."

Rumsfeld said "these firms run the risk of being found in violation of the stabilization program regulations if they are unable to justify their reports."

Meanwhile, the Price Commission ordered its first price rollbacks since it has been in operation. It ordered Browning Ferris Industries, a waste management company in Houston, and Harvest Markets, food retailers in Buffalo, to roll back prices because they had exceeded permissible profit margains.

The commission also told Aimco Industries, Inc., a subsidiary of ITT which manufactures brake shoes, to refund $75,000 in price increases charged customers between Jan. 3 and Feb. 23.

The subsidiary was ordered to make the refund—by April 29—because the Price Commission said it had violated regulations by failing to obtain advance permission for the price increase.

Rumsfeld told a meeting of oil company officials in Washington that the fundamental control on prices is "the regulation regarding profit margins."

Under Price Commission guidelines. companies can raise prices if they can justify these hikes, adjusted for any increased productivity.

Thus, as Rumsfeld told the oil executives, "firms are permitted to increase prices to cover increased costs if, and only if, such increases do not result in profit margins in excess of those established during the base period."

The base period refers to a company's average profit margin on sales in the best two out of the three previous years.

Firms with sales in excess of $100 million a year must get prior approval for price increases, and firms with at least $50 million in sales must report price increases and profit margins each quarter.

A WEEK-LONG STRIKE against Macy's by 8,000 members of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union Local 1-S won a new two-year agreement that upgraded wages and fringe benefits for sales personnel and other employes. AFL-CIO New York Regional Director Michael Mann leads pickets at Macy's main Herald Square store along with RWDSU members who had widespread support from New York City's more than 1 million union members.

Agents Turn To Union for Job Insurance

The Insurance Workers reported overwhelming success in a campaign to organize sales representatives of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. in the wake of an announcement by the company that it would phase out by attrition 11,000 "debit" agents represented by the union.

The union has filed election petitions with the National Labor Relations Board for Metropolitan sales agents located in 14 cities in 11 states.

The petitions were filed after a massive response to a first mailing of union information to the sales representatives, said Insurance Workers Pres. William A. Gillen. He noted that the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization had aided the effort.

The phasing out of debit agents—those who collect premiums at regular intervals from policy holders at their homes—was dropped like a bombshell by Metropolitan negotiators as they opened their presentation in talks for a new contract for the 11,000 workers. The current contract expired Mar. 31, and talks were continuing.

Gillen noted that phasing out of the debit agents will have little bearing on current negotiations because the agreement does not prescribe job methods, but added that the impact of the company's action on total employment was not clear.

A generation or more ago, Gillen said, the small policies purchased by working people and paid for on a weekly basis made the debit agent as familiar a neighborhood fixture as the mailman.

Although there are few weekly collections today, personal collections still account for a heavy percentage of the life insurance business, and Metropolitan is one of the two principal debit companies.

The union observed in its monthly newspaper the Insurance Worker that Metropolitan Life "is abandoning the personal-contact system that was the keystone of its growth—a system that for generations has been synonymous with life insurance in the minds of most Americans."

Pay, Benefit Gains Won After Strike at Macy's

New York—A two-year contract providing $16 in wage increases plus a wide range of fringe benefits was won by 8,000 members of Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Employes Local 1-S after a one-week strike at six area Macy's stores.

The work stoppage had wide support among New York City's more than 1 million union members. One day after the strike began, Teamsters Joint Council 16 instructed 170,000 metropolitan union drivers not to cross picket lines, thus cutting off the flow of merchandise to the strikebound chain.

Local 1-S Pres. Sam Kovenetsky said the victory "was predicated on the determination of our people—the members of Local 1-S. The help that was given by the labor movement in New York City was overwhelming."

Pres. Harry Van Arsdale Jr. of the New York AFL-CIO said Local 1-S was "showing the way" in its battle to raise the minimum wages of historically low-paid workers.

Before the strike, sales employes at Macy's earned an average of $116 a week, which the union said was worth substantially less at New York living costs.

The employes will receive an $8 increase retroactive to Feb. 1 when the previous contract expired, an additional $2 weekly on Aug 1 and another $6 March 1, 1973.

The hourly minimum will be increased to $2.92 by March 1 of next year. The union also secured an agreement from the company for further discussion of sales commission rates.

Pensions were increased from the range of $1.80-$4.50 per month per year of service to a range of $2-$5, meaning that an employe with 40 years of service could retire at age 65 with a $200 month benefit.

A provision also was added so that a surviving spouse could continue to receive the benefit until such time as the pensioner would have reached the age of 70.

The contract stipulates that any employe with 20 years service cannot be made to accept lower pay because of job transfer.

A dental plan was added to health benefits for employes only, and an optical plan was added for employes as well as dependents.

Assisting in negotiations were Alfred Addeo and A. A. Desser of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

George W. King Dies, Bricklayers Leader

George W. King, first vice president of the Bricklayers, died Apr. 10 at an Arlington, Va., hospital after a heart attack.

King, 77, had been an international union officer since 1960, a local union officer since 1942 and a member of Local 5 in Cleveland since 1923.

He learned his trade in Glasgow, Scotland where he worked as a journeyman—with time out for a professional soccer career.

Funeral services were scheduled for Cleveland on April 14. Survivors include his wife, Jean, and two brothers.

Carpenters Set Training For 3,235 Jobless

The Carpenters signed a new government agreement to train 3,235 jobless and underemployed workers in an on-the-job training program operating in 44 states.

The union will conduct the training through its joint apprenticeship committees and modular housing contractors who have bargaining agreements with the union.

Financed with $2,570,000 in Manpower Development & Training Act funds, the 18-month program will focus on recruiting jobless Vietnam era veterans, minority group members and disadvantaged workers.

Four types of training will be offered: preapprenticeship for 525 persons, apprentice-entry for 570, skills upgrading for 1,140 and modular housing construction for 1,000.

In an existing training contract with the Labor Dept., the Carpenters recruited 4,500 persons, graduated 1,860 and have 1,950 still in training.

The new contract was signed by Carpenters Pres. William Sidell, Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson and representatives from the Manpower Administration and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Nixon Pie

THE SAME NIXON Administration policies that have produced a continuing high level of unemployment and a pernicious level of inflated prices have resulted also in stopping and actually reversing a trend toward a fairer distribution of income among American families.

A look at the 1970 Census figures on family income and its distribution documents the shift that has taken place in the past few years after a slow but steady improvement since 1960.

Those census figures show that in 1960 the fifth of American families with the lowest income received 4.9 percent as their share of the total pie. By 1968 the lowest fifth had increased its percentage to 5.7 percent, with a slight improvement taking place every two years.

But in 1970 the bottom fifth of American families saw their share drop back to 5.5 percent, the same place it had been in 1966.

While the poorest families were feeling the effects of Nixon Administration policy by getting less, the richest families, those composing the top fifth, were actually improving their share of the pie.

In 1960 the highest fifth of American families in terms of income received 42 percent of the total going to all families. By 1968 this figure had dropped to 40.6 percent. But in 1970 it climbed back up again to 41.6 percent.

Presented in slightly different terms, the bottom fifth of American families received 6.8 percent of the increase in total national family income for the years 1960-68. That share dropped to 4.4 percent for the years 1968-70.

The top fifth increased its share from 38.6 percent for the 1960-68 period to 47.3 percent for the 1968-70 period.

In terms of dollars, it is estimated that the 40 percent of the nation's families on the lower rungs of the income ladder had average incomes of under $5,000 per year in 1970 and received only 17.5 percent of the nation's total family income.

The poorest 20 percent of the families averaged about $3,000 per year and received only 5.5 percent of the total income.

In contrast, the families in the top 20 percent averaged more than $23,000 per year and their share of the total was 41.6 percent—more than double their population share.

The figures show in addition that a group representing only 5 percent of the population averaged about $32,000 in 1970, receiving 14.4 percent of the total family income—almost triple their population share.

A FAIRER distribution of the income and wealth of the nation has been a primary goal of the American trade union movement, a goal keyed to the concept that a worker is entitled to a fair share of the wealth he helps produce and as that wealth increases so should his share.

In past decades there has been some progress made toward this goal, progressing when liberal economic policies were in effect, slipping back when regressive policies were applied.

The census figures disclose the sharp impact of Nixon economic policies—and later figures may show an even sharper impact—toward reversing the trend to equity and justice for America's workers.

A Word Edgewise:

Direct British Rule in Ulster Wise Step to End Discrimination

By John P. Roche

ONE OF THE DREADFUL ASPECTS of international crises is that only when the heat goes on, do policy-makers focus on the problem at hand. And then, because the received wisdom is that one should not "react to pressure," perfectly sensible men are frozen in proud immobility.

The Dept. of State, for example, had a collective convulsion in June 1964, when—in the middle of a ridiculous "crisis" with Panama—Pres. Lyndon Johnson picked up the phone and called the Panamanian president. Presumably, as the "Leader of the Free World," Johnson should have waited for a call from Pres. Chiari. Actually it was a good move and led to subsequent, fruitful negotiations.

Americans are not the only people addicted to putting potential hot issues "on the back-burner." That is precisely what the British did with the question of Ulster. And the result is that a policy that might have been implemented three or four years ago, with sighs of relief all around, is now itself the center of controversy.

There have been too many Americans shooting from the hip in the Irish crisis, but I believe I have earned the right to contribute to the discussion. Three years ago I visited Ireland and subsequently wrote a column which began "Ulster is an improvisation which has outlived its usefulness."

After exploring the variables, I argued for the elimination of the Ulster (Stormont) autonomous government and for the institution of direct British rule. "Ulster . . . should simply become a section of Great Britain, comparable to Scotland and Wales. British laws would then apply and Catholics and Protestants could live under the nondiscriminatory jurisdiction of the British Parliament."

When that was written, the Labor Government was in power in London. Now the Conservatives have moved to institute direct rule. The reason Labor did nothing was that it was running on inertial guidance: there had been a few incidents, a mini-riot or two in Derry, but nothing to justify vigorous action.

Prime Minister Harold Wilson left Ulster "on the back-burner," where the Conservatives found it—and hoped to be able to leave it unmoved. After all, the big issue was the Common Market. Those damned Irish had been shooting each other for centuries: let them enjoy their hobby.

True, pressure was brought on the Ulster government to institute long-overdue reforms. The Protestants had gerrymandered the province and developed the art of rigging elections to the point where the Catholic minority (one-third of the population of 1.5 million) was literally powerless. Economic discrimination was rife. But it was too little too late and the gunmen moved in at both ends of the spectrum.

To make a long, tragic story short, by this spring Ulster was radically polarized with British troops in a peacekeeping mission which was interpreted by Catholics as protection for the Protestant establishment at Stormont.

Moreover, the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, Jack Lynch, was being pushed into an increasingly impossible position: the hard-liners in Dublin were accusing him of deserting the "six orphans" (the counties that make up Ulster), while the British and Orangemen were attacking him for covertly supporting the violence.

ONE OF LYNCH'S NIGHTMARES was that the British might take Ted Kennedy's advice and pull their troops out of Ulster, a decision that could have resulted in a blood bath of communal warfare, with the Catholics outnumbered and outgunned. And an inevitable demand that the Irish Republic intervene militarily in the north, the consequences of which are simply inconceivable.

Now London has taken a wise move and we can only pray that the success of direct rule has not already been bypassed by passions and events.

So far, most of those involved have responded responsibly. Perhaps as we watch and hope for a solution to this bloody impasse, we might declare a moratorium on American kibitzing; that is, politicians and commentators (including me) should shut up.

Promises Vs. Performance:

Nixon Economic Record Trails Far Behind Optimistic Rhetoric

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the National Press Club on Apr. 7, 1972.

THE ISSUE is the economic policies of this Administration.

We have been promised effective policies to combat inflation. Where are they?

We have been promised a sharp reduction of unemployment. Where is it?

We have been promised that the Administration's international economic measures, including devaluation, would eliminate the deficit in international trade and create 500,000 new jobs. Can you find any shred of convincing evidence that this process is even under way?

We have been promised and promised for 38 long months. But the record shows that the nation's economy is in a general mess, with promises to the people instead of performance. The delivery, to date, has been favors to big business and the banks, while the people continue to get optimistic rhetoric and disastrous game plans.

Let me summarize the actual record. This is not propaganda or idle rhetoric. This is the actual record of 38 months of the Nixon Administration from U.S. government statistics:

Unemployment:

January 1969—2.7 million people or 3.4 percent of the labor force.

March 1972—5.2 million people or 5.9 percent of the labor force.

Major industrial areas with substantial unemployment—this refers to areas over 6 percent:

January 1969—6 areas.
March 1972—55 areas.

Number of people unemployed 15 weeks or more:

January 1969—334,000.
March 1972—1,224,000.

Number of workers employed part-time because full-time work is not available:

January 1969—1,647,000.
March 1972—2,466,000.

This means 656,000 in this category at a time when the work force is growing.

Number of workers employed in manufacturing:

January 1969—20 million.
March 1972—18.8 million.

Loss of 1.2 million—again, I point out, at a time when the total work force is growing.

Number of workers employed in contract construction:

January 1969—3.4 million.
February 1972—3.2 million.

Now, let me take the Consumer Price Index—in the three months, November and December 1968 and January 1969—just prior to the start of the Nixon Administration, the increase of the Consumer Price Index was at the yearly rate of 4.7 percent.

In the three months, December 1971 and January and February 1972, the Consumer Price Index is going up at the yearly rate of 4.9 percent. In one month alone, February 1972, it increased at the yearly rate of 6 percent.

Another Item—The number of people below government-defined poverty line:

The most recent information from the Census Bureau is for 1970, which registered the first increase in the number of poor people in 10 years—a rise of 1.2 million people.

The number of people below the government-defined poverty line declined from 39.9 million in 1960 to 24.3 million in 1969—a drop of 15 million in the 10 years prior to the Nixon Administration. However, it rose to 25.5 million in 1970.

Another Item—The number of people in this country receiving public assistance:

I think this is really a very important item and it's a very disturbing item because we're getting to the point where you begin to wonder how many people we are going to need to keep one person on welfare. And we are getting to the point where it is going to put us in a real dilemma.

January 1969—the last month of the Johnson Administration 9.9 million people on welfare.

October 1971—after 2½ years of this Administration we have 14.7 million people on welfare.

An increase in the number of people receiving public assistance of 4.8 million people.

Foreign Trade:

In the year 1968—we had a surplus of $837 million.

In January 1969—we had a surplus of $70 million.

In 1971—we had a deficit of $2 billion—the first annual deficit in 79 years.

The deficit for February 1972 was $597.6 million—or at an annual rate of well over $7 billion.

Well, I don't think we should give way so completely to despair; things should change. After all, on June 6, 1968, this statement hit the airwaves: "The imposition of wage and price controls during peace time is an abdication of fiscal responsibility. Such controls treat symptoms and not causes. Experience indicates that they do not work, cannot ever be administered equitably and are not compatible with a free economy."

That was June '68, and the man who said that was Richard Nixon. And then on Aug. 15, 1971, he said something different. So, I don't think we should despair—changes can happen. After all, any night now we may get a new announcement of a new bag of tricks, from the TV. It may even displace "Laugh In." But the nation's economic and social problems are really no laughing matter, and they require serious consideration and genuine remedies rather than bags of tricks.

Registration Barriers Scored:

Federal Voter Standards Vital To Increase Election Turnout

NATIONAL VOTER STANDARDS coupled with steps to lower registration barriers would not only open the ballot to more Americans, but could reduce the total public cost of conducting elections, COPE voter registration expert John Perkins declared.

Voter participation in the United States "is at the bottom of the ladder" compared with election turnouts in many other democracies, largely because of cumbersome and confusing state and local registration and voting requirements and procedures, Perkins said on Labor News Conference.

He pointed out that while at best, only 61 percent of the total potential vote is cast in U.S. federal elections, voter turnout in Sweden and Denmark, where the government goes directly "to the people—to the electorate—to the potential voter" to get them registered—runs "as high as 89 percent."

Perkins, an assistant director of the Committee on Political Education, stressed that some states do go directly to the potential voters and therefore do far better than the national average in both voter registration and election turnouts.

He cited the example of Idaho, where "a deputy registrar is allowed to go 'door-to-door' to register voters . . . and registration closes only two days before the elections." He pointed out that "in 1968—in the presidential election—registration exceeded 90 percent in Idaho, and the turnout was better than 70 percent."

HIGH VOTER PERFORMANCE in Idaho, where the government makes a real effort to enroll potential voters, "is a strong argument for a federal law" setting uniform registration standards and procedures in all states, he asserted, and proof that "where the government does face up to its responsibilities, the people will act."

Perkins said he was "disappointed" that the Senate turned down Senator Gale McGee's (D-Wyo.) National Voter Registration bill, which included a provision for postal card registration.

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOW THAT CONGRESS has approved the "equal rights" amendment to the Constitution and the states have begun the process of ratification, the impact that it will have on American life—social, economic and even political—is just beginning to make itself felt.

The amendment, although clearly designed to give women absolute equality with men over the entire spectrum of life, also affects men no less. It, therefore—if finally ratified as the 27th Amendment—will have profound influence on the status of both men and women over a wide area of national life.

Like other amendments to the Constitution, of course, its impact will depend on judicial interpretations from the lowest of courts all the way to the Supreme Court.

Organized labor was opposed to handling the problem of sex equality through a constitutional amendment. In testimony before Congress a year ago, the AFL-CIO, for example, made clear its belief that carefully drawn legislation to outlaw sex discrimination was preferable to a sweeping constitutional amendment that would "destroy more rights than it creates."

Labor was, and still is, deeply apprehensive that a literal interpretation of the amendment will destroy protective legislation for women that has been fought for over the years.

The labor fear is that a constitutional amendment, couched as it is in necessarily broad terms, "will create more problems than it will resolve."

Some of these problems already are beginning to surface. Many of them were brought out during congressional debate, but they are now entering the wider field of public questioning. They include:

- Military Service: Under a literal interpretation of the amendment, women would be subject to the draft laws and even for combat duty.
- Sex Crime: Under today's laws, some discriminate against women, others against men as in the cases of rape and prostitution. How will the courts handle these discriminatory laws?
- Marriage: Here again, there is a wide discrepancy in current law between the right of wives and husbands. Alimony—men now pay it but almost no women do—the right to child custody, determination of legal residence, conditions of divorce settlements, legal responsibility for debts.
- Child Support and Custody: Normally the courts have favored mothers in giving them custody and fathers in producing support. "Ability to pay" may now become the criterion in support cases.
- Retirement: As a rule women are given the choice—if it may be called that—for earlier retirement than men. The social security system gives an advantage to women who retire at age 65 over men in computing pension benefits based on the three years between 62 and 65.
- Working conditions: Under current law in most states women are protected in such areas as night work, over-time, heavy lifting, employment in such arduous work as coal mines.
- Education: Colleges and universities which have specialized courses for men and women presumably will have to "equalize" their curriculums, maintain the same admission standards, provide housing on a completely open "sexless" basis.

Supporters and opponents of the new amendment differ widely among themselves as to how the courts will interpret it. By and large supporters either feel that strict and literal enforcement is desirable or feel that the courts will take a common-sense attitude. Opponents fear that literal interpretations will violently change the very fabric of American life or produce intolerably varying interpretations of what the amendment means.

Already some eight states have ratified the proposed amendment. That means that 30 more must ratify before it goes into the Constitution. Widespread public debate on the state level now seems highly in order.

BETTER VOTER TURNOUTS and lower total costs of conducting elections could result from a federal voter registration law setting uniform standards and simpler procedures in all states, John Perkins, center, declared on Labor News Conference. INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE on communications technology and policy, attended by experts from nine nations, listens to Sec.-Treas. Glenn Watts of the Communications Workers. The three-day symposium in Philadelphia was co-sponsored by the CWA and the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg School of Communications.

CWA, University Parley Explores Impact of Communications Progress

Philadelphia—A unique international conference of communications experts met here at the invitation of a union and a university to explore the technological world of tomorrow and its impact on workers and society.

The three-day symposium was co-sponsored by the Communications Workers and the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg School of Communications.

It brought together 350 specialists from industry, labor, governments, universities and public interest groups. They came from the United States and eight foreign nations.

In a message to the conference, CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne stressed that to his union, "technological advances are more than a matter of scientific curiosity." Part of labor's job, he said, is to reconcile new technology with the welfare of individuals.

The address by Beirne, who was recuperating from an operation, was read to the conference by CWA Sec.-Treas. Glenn Watts.

Beirne said the working papers prepared for the symposium "open doors to the future and provide insight into how we, as trade unionists, should prepare for it."

He cited new problems of job content and job security and the need for "new approaches in union organizing."

A British Nobel Prize winner, Dr. Dennis Gabor, was the keynote speaker. Dr. Gabor, a noted authority in applied electronic physics, discussed the role of communications in influencing opinion and action in fields ranging from peace to population, and attitudes to crime and drugs.

Technical discussions dealt with such matters as interconnection of cable television systems, data banks and the "cashless society."

Stefan Nedzynski, general secretary of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone International, with which CWA is affiliated, spoke of labor's insistence on representation in the governing boards of publicly owned radio and television systems.

CWA Executive Vice Pres. Louis B. Knecht said his union's leadership "very early in the game" recognized the inevitability of changing technology and stressed the need to make automation a force that would benefit "the people as a whole."

Senate Panel Approves $2.20 Minimum Wage employes in smaller establishments now excluded.

When the full committee begins consideration of the bill later this month, the Administration is expected to press for a subminimum wage for youth, continuation of a farm worker differential, as well as a cutback in added coverage and a limitation of the minimum wage increase to either $1.80 or at most a gradual step-up to the $2 level.

The House Rules Committee, meanwhile, put off an immediate vote on clearing a $2 wage floor bill reported by the House Labor Committee. But the legislation is expected to clear the Rules Committee at an April 18 meeting and to reach the House floor for action the following week.

House Republicans have served notice they will seek to substitute a measure that would hold the minimum wage for youth at the present $1.60 level and bar additional coverage.

The House Ways & Means Committee moved close to final approval of a revenue-sharing bill that would parcel out $3.5 billion a year in federal funds to local governments and $1.8 billion to states.

And the Senate Banking Committee found it had stirred up a hornets' nest when it followed the guidance of bank lobbyists and drastically changed a Fair Credit Billing measure sponsored by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and approved by a subcommittee.

Proxmire issued a statement repudiating the final version of his bill, declaring that it should be "more accurately termed the Bank Protection Act" and that unless it is improved on the Senate floor, "no bill is better than a bogus bill."

One section killed by the committee would have allowed a consumer who made a purchase with a bank credit card to have the same rights as if he had used a store's own charge account. He would be able to withhold payment if the merchandise was defective and the store refused to replace or repair it.

Another deletion was a section that would have prohibited creditors from assessing retroactive finance charges on monthly billing statements.

As Proxmire explained it, under some billing systems, "if a consumer is billed for $100 and makes a partial payment of $90 within the traditional 30-day period, he is charged interest not against the remaining balance of $10 but against the previous balance of $100." He estimated that consumers are overcharged at least $200 million a year under this procedure.

The bill was also stripped of a section that would have stopped the practice of billing customers for undelivered merchandise and another provision that would have prohibited minimum finance charges in excess of the normal interest rate.

Nixon Proposal Condemned:

Opposition Mounts To Anti-Busing Bill

The senior Republican member of the House Judiciary Committee, a former Supreme Court justice and the chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights spoke out strongly against Pres. Nixon's proposal for a "moratorium" on court school desegregation orders involving busing.

Rep. William M. McCulloch (R-Ohio) read a stern lecture to Acting Attorney General Richard G. Kleindienst, who came to testify before the House Judiciary Committee in favor of the Administration's bill to restrict the power of federal courts.

McCulloch, who had introduced the bill at the Administration's request, said a thorough study of its content had convinced him that it was both unconstitutional and unjust.

Speaking to Kleindienst, who is awaiting Senate action on his nomination to be Attorney General, McCulloch declared:

"It is with the deepest regret that I sit here today to listen to a spokesman for a Republican Administration asking the Congress to prostitute the courts by obligating them to suspend the equal protection clause (of the Constitution) so that Congress may debate the merits of further slowing down and perhaps even rolling back desegregation in public schools."

As Kleindienst sat silent, McCulloch asked: "What message are we sending to our black people? Is this any way to govern a country? Is this any way to bring peace to a troubled land?"

And Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.) joined in the attack, charging that the Administration bill amounts to a "lack of confidence" in the federal judiciary.

At the University of Alabama, Law School students at a program honoring the late Supreme Court Justice Hugo L. Black, heard a former colleague quote the views of the Alabama-born jurist to attack the Nixon bill.

Arthur J. Goldberg, who sat with Black on the court before becoming U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, told the students that regardless of their views on busing, "no lawyer can differ with the concept that court decisions must be obeyed and enforced."

He appealed to the Alabama Law School gathering:

"Defend the courts. Defend their independence from executive and legislative interference. Defend the integrity of the judicial process. . . .

"Defend the many courageous judges, many from the South . . . who have properly invoked judicial authority to ban racial discrimination."

And, Goldberg urged, "defend the Constitution itself, which explicitly provides that no state shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.' "

In another setting, the Nixon-appointed chairman of the federal Civil Rights Commission used strong language to denounce the President's position.

The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, who is also president of the University of Notre Dame, told a news conference in California that Nixon is copying Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace on the "phony issue" of school busing.

Wallace, he said, "heated up this phony issue in an election year and everybody jumped aboard the wagon, including the President. It is an issue doctored up to deal with emotionalism and fear, rather than the true issue of better schools."

Kirkland Serves Notice Labor to Fight Back

Philadelphia—White House charges that labor is sabotaging wage controls by withdrawal from the Pay Board are "nonsense," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland declared.

The Pay Board, he noted, "will continue to function overtly as it did covertly—as a system of government controls over workers, designed to repress wages while the affluent are left free to profiteer."

But there will be an important difference, Kirkland said. "It will not have a union label on it—or at least not an AFL-CIO label."

Nixon's program, he said, is "based on the single premise that all the country's troubles stem from high wages" and that lower pay is the "magic cure-all."

Kirkland reminded his trade union audience that "the American labor movement was created to fight on behalf of plain people all abuses of power by employers and by the government."

And he served notice that "we will not yield genteely or gracefully to any program from any quarter that aims to weaken the rights and freedom of working people."

The AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer spoke at a dinner honoring Michael Johnson, executive vice president of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO. The testimonial was sponsored by Histadrut, the trade union federation of Israel.

Kirkland told the large audience that it is "only natural" that Johnson and other U.S. labor leaders are "staunch friends of Israel and Histadrut."

"To us," Kirkland said, "Israel stands above all else for the dignity, the freedom and the progress of working men in that vital corner of the world."

COPE Conferences Pack In Delegates

Record-breaking attendances have been registered at the first eight of 12 scheduled area COPE conferences focusing on the issues and candidates in the '72 election campaign. New U.S. Grant Set to Train 968 Painters

The National Joint Painting & Decorating Apprenticeship and Training Committee has signed a $900,000 agreement with the Labor Dept. to train 968 jobless or underemployed workers on the job.

Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery and Martin DeVries, president of the Painting & Decorating Contractors of America, signed for the joint committee.

The training program will operate in 29 states through subcontracts with local joint apprenticeship and training committees, local unions, district labor councils, and with painting and decorating contractors who have bargaining agreements with the Painters' union.

Vietnam Vets Organize for Jobs, Education Aid

Thousands of Vietnam era veterans are protesting bitterly that the GI "Bill of Rights" being given them is grossly inadequate and that they are being made the victims of "an unpopular war."

At the root of their complaints is a lack of funding for the educational and training programs offered them, a lack of jobs to make it possible to continue their training or to live decently after they are forced to become drop-outs.

The National Association of Collegiate Veterans, which represents about 250,000 veterans of the Vietnam war period, declared at a recent press conference in Washington:

"The Vietnam-era veteran has been neglected, taken for granted, patted on the head and ignored long enough. He has been faced with the 'revolving door' concept of service from any of the agencies that are supposed to be of help to him on his return from the service."

To meet this problem, the association, almost entirely made up of former blue-collar workers who had no college deferments, has launched a campaign to force political candidates to take a stand on veterans benefits, to get out the vote, to educate the public on the need for better GI programs that will actually help them get the training they need and the jobs they need when their training is completed.

In this, the veterans have appealed to numerous groups for help and cooperation and are working closely with Frontlash, the union-backed "register-and-vote" movement.

Their complaints against their treatment both on the federal and state level are numerous. Officers of the association told the press that:

- Funding of Vietnam veteran programs is far below that for veterans of World War II. One veteran estimated that the cash value of the World War II program was about twice of that for the Vietnam program in terms of "real" money.

- There is a grave lack of jobs, either part-time or full-time, that would enable veterans to finish their training courses and, as a result, the rate of drop-outs is high. A study made at Michigan State University showed that only 14.9 percent of veterans were taking advantage of the programs offered. The unemployment rate of veterans in Michigan was set at 21 percent.

- There is little trust in Veterans Administration statistics on participation in GI programs. VA has said that 38 percent of veterans are participating. Vietnam veterans insist that while this may be the rate of initial enrollment, the big drop-out rate is not being published.

- State employment services, which are supposed to help veterans find work, are doing a poor job. In one case in Maryland 250 veterans signed up for a job-producing program when there were only 30 jobs available.

The veterans are seeking a minimum increase in subsistence allowances of 20 percent; authorization of payments up to $1,000 a year for books, fees and tuition; extension of the period of entitlement to benefits from 36 to 48 months, and advance payments of up to two months in allotments to enable a veteran to get through the first months of his training program.

Consumer, Worker Suffering:

Meany Rips Nixon On Dismal Record

in the stock market and corporate financial reports."

Item by item, Meany compared the state of the economy when Pres. Nixon took office with conditions after more than three years of the Nixon Administration.

He cited unemployment up more than 2 million, with a fourfold rise in the number of long-term unemployed.

He noted the nearly tenfold rise in the number of major industrial areas with over 6 percent unemployment—and the drop in the total number of workers employed in manufacturing and construction.

And, Meany stressed, after a decade of steady decline, the number of people below the poverty level moved up again.

Last year, he noted, for the first time in 79 years, the United States had a trade deficit which this year is threatening to grow even larger.

"How's that for a record?" Meany asked.

America needs more than "a new bag of tricks" to regain economic health, he stressed.

"We have been promised effective policies to combat inflation. Where are they?

"We have been promised a sharp reduction of unemployment. Where is it?

"We have been promised that the Administration's international economic measures, including devaluation, would eliminate the deficit in international trade and create 500,000 new jobs. Can you find any shred of convincing evidence that this process is even under way?"

Meany reiterated the AFL-CIO's continued willingness to cooperate in an "even-handed" stabilization program that would include controls on all prices, costs and incomes—including profits.

But he stressed, "we will not be patsies for an unfair, inequitable and unjust program that is loaded against the consumer and workers, in favor of big business and the banks."

And that, he made clear, is how labor views the Nixon Administration programs.

Ford Executives Get Cadillac Pay

It's not too hard to get a big raise from a large corporation—at least not if you're the chairman of the board or the president of the company.

Take the Ford Motor Co. Henry Ford 2d, chairman of the board, collected $689,000 in salary and bonuses last year—up $189,000 or 37.8 percent from the previous year.

Company Pres. Lee A. Iacocca was paid only $675,000. But on a percentage basis, he did better. That was a 48.3 percent increase over the previous year.

Overall, top officials of the company had pay boosts averaging 27 percent.

Rail Union Urges U.S. Acquire Penn Central

nationalization as the only means of preserving the Penn Central came as a presidential emergency board opened hearings into the latest dispute between the railroad and the union.

The Penn Central had unilaterally sought to lay off 6,000 conductors and brakemen as of Apr. 1, and the union had warned of retaliatory action when Pres. Nixon invoked the emergency board provisions of the National Railway Act. This prevents either party from taking action for 60 days while the board hears arguments and prepares recommendations.

Named to the board were Francis A. O'Neill Jr., as chairman, a former member and chairman of the National Mediation Board; Frank J. Dugan, a professor at the Georgetown University law school, and James J. Sherman, economics professor at the University of Southern Florida. All have served as arbitrators and mediators.

A similar board was named by Nixon in a contract dispute involving the Sheet Metal Workers, who represent 6,000 shopcraft workers on the nation's carriers. They are the only shopcraft union that has not reached a contract agreement with the carriers after 15 months of bargaining.

Named to that board were Chairman Charles M. Rehmus, director of the Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations at the University of Michigan; Alexander P. Porter, Washington, D.C., and Clare B. McDermott of Pittsburgh. The latter two are lawyers and arbitrators.

As the emergency board opened hearings on the UTU-Penn Central dispute, the union reiterated the recommendation for nationalization as an alternative to the price that the trustees of the bankrupt line say must be paid to save the carrier.

The trustees not only want to reduce the size of train crews, which are standard for the UTU on all railroads, but they also propose ultimately to slash 3,800 other jobs and drop 9,000 miles of the Penn Central's 20,000 miles of track. The carrier also wants the right to determine the size of train crews unilaterally.

Although the union noted that nationalization was not in the province of the board's possible recommendations, it added that neither should the board recommend for the carrier on the basis of its claimed needs for reorganization.

As far as crew sizes go, UTU Attorney Lester Schoene pointed out that the Railway Labor Act, bargaining history and the courts have held that crew size "must always be a subject for local bargaining."

Chesser emphasized for newsmen that the Penn Central had been cited for nearly 3,000 safety violations in less than three years and fined more than three-quarters of a million dollars.

He also asked what kind of management would suggest a reduction of nearly 10,000 employes when it paid more than 8 million overtime manhours last year.

'Come and Get It!'

Jobless Rate Hits 5.9% As Labor Force Grows

Meany said that while consumer attention has been focused on soaring food prices, the wholesale price of items such as hides, skins, lumber and plywood have continued to rise and will have their effect at the retail level in the coming months.

"The American people need jobs and an end to inflation—rather than promises and optimistic statements," the federation president said.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said that the price of farm products and processed foods declined during March by four-tenths of 1 percent after several months of sharp increases.

The overall increase in wholesale prices was the smallest in five months after increases of eight-tenths of 1 percent in December and January and nine-tenths in February.

In its report on jobs, the BLS said that total employment rose 620,000 during March, seasonally adusted, the largest monthly gain since June of 1967.

The increase was primarily among men, both adult and teenagers, although the BLS reported that the unemployment rate for those in the 16-19 age group was nearly 18 percent.

The actual number of jobless showed a decline of 200,000 in March, but on a seasonally adjusted basis, this represented an increase of 160,000 unemployed.

The number of workers unemployed less than five weeks was 2.3 million, 170,000 above the level of the previous month.

Those unemployed 27 weeks or more totaled 633,000, a decline from February, but the average duration of joblessness remained about the same at 12.4 weeks—almost a full two weeks longer than a year ago.

Nearly a half-million Vietnam-era veterans were unemployed of the 4.1 million currently in the labor force.

The overall jobless rate for veterans in the 20-29 age group stood at 8.6 percent, up from the 7.4 percent rate of February.

For nonveterans in the same age group, the unemployment rate was much less at 7.5 percent.

Private, nonfarm payroll employment rose more sharply than it usually does between February and March. After seasonal adjustment, the number of payroll jobs was up 275,000 to 72.0 million.

Manufacturing employment rose by 90,000 last month to 18.8 million, up 310,000 from its August 1971 low.

The BLS said that two-thirds of the increase occurred in the durable goods industries, with the largest gains taking place in primary metals, fabricated metals and electrical equipment.

The average workweek for rank-and-file workers on private nonfarm payrolls was little changed at 37.1 hours. Factory overtime inched up one-tenth of 1 hour to 3.3 hours, the highest level since January 1970.

Average hourly earnings rose 2 cents during March to $3.57, and the gain in hourly earnings coupled with the small rise in weekly hours resulted in an increase of $1.09 in weekly pay to $131.73.

After seasonal adjustment, however, the increase amounted to only 73 cents in weekly wages for the average worker.

Paul F. Sifton, Washington representative of the Auto Workers until his retirement in 1962, died in Oxaco, Mexico, at the age of 74.

Sifton was a well-known newspaperman and playwright before joining the UAW staff in 1945. He was a close associate of the late Walter P. Reuther.

Space Shuttle Benefits Cited To Labor Press

The proposed space shuttle opens the door to mankind to live and work in space to a degree far beyond isolated trips to the moon, the noted rocket pioneer, Dr. Wernher von Braun, told a luncheon meeting of the International Labor Press Association in Washington.

Von Braun, who is administrator of space planning for NASA and LeRoy E. Day, deputy director of the space shuttle program, told the labor editors that perhaps 50,000 jobs may eventually be involved in future space shuttle work. What remains to be determined is how much money Congress will vote for the project.

For fiscal 1972, von Braun said, the space agency is asking some $220 million for research and development work. Over 12 years development costs are expected to reach $5.5 billion. He insisted that the space shuttle eventually will reduce the cost of space exploration inasmuch as much of the equipment used for launching space craft and returning them to earth will be reuseable.

At its February meeting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted a statement urging Congress to vote the necessary funds for the space shuttle.

"It will make space as accessible as the airplane has made the other continents," the Council said, and will prove its value in exploration, science and technology, and national defense.

40% of Corporations Found Escaping Taxes

micks, no tax-free bonds, no capital gains."

Vanik, a leader in the liberal Democratic drive for tax reform, said the 1971 tax legislation pushed through by the Nixon Administration as part of its "new economic policy" has turned out to be "a gigantic tax giveaway to a few special interests."

Corporate profits shot up $10 billion last year, Vanik noted, but because of the new loopholes the corporate tax liability in the fourth quarter of the year was nearly $1 billion less than in the previous quarter.

And over a 10-year period, he warned, the government will lose some $90 billion in corporate tax revenue.

When loophole after loophole, deductions, tax credits, depletion allowances, depreciation are all tallied up, the result can be ludicrous.

Thus, the multi-billion dollar U.S. Steel Corp., paid only token taxes to the United States on its net income of more than $150 million. In fact, it paid four times as much in taxes to Venezuela on its operations in that country than it did to the U.S. Treasury on its vastly greater operations and profits.

Vanik cited an electric power company that reported higher operating revenues, earnings per share and dividends in 1971 over the previous year—but paid only $156,000 in taxes compared with $2.4 million the previous year.

And a timber and paper corporation that had a net income of $4 million received a refund of $7.7 million on taxes paid in previous years under carryback provisions of the law.

Forced Arbitration Bill Hit As Anti-Union Masquerade

From Administration to Congress:

Labor Asks Shift In Economic Reins

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on Congress to take over the guidance of the nation's economy from an Administration that "has proven its incompetence."

"The American people need a change," Meany told the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

Price controls have been "a farce and a sham" and prices have been rising just as fast as they did before the so-called controls. "The big difference is now, because of wage controls, many workers will be less able to pay the tab."

In the interest of fairness, Meany stressed, "there must be substantial revision of the Economic Stabilizaiton Act. And, as we have said time and again, there must be an excess profits tax as an integral part of a fair and effective stabilization effort."

Meany prodded Congress also to enact "measures to move the economy to full employment without delay."

The Administration may be indifferent, he said, but "Congress cannot lose sight of the fact that unemployment continues at an unacceptable plateau of close to 6 percent."

Meany followed the chairmen of the Price Commission and the Pay Board to the witness table, and his testimony was sharply critical of both programs.

Before submitting his formal statement for the record, Meany joined with Committee Chairman William Proxmire (D-Wis.) in a spirited, free-wheeling dialogue.

Proxmire, as has been his custom in these hearings, opened with a

Meat Cutters To Appeal Pay Rollback

Baltimore—The Meat Cutters vowed to appeal a federal court ruling granting a government rollback of negotiated wage increases for 77 union members employed by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. in this area.

"We feel we were singled out," said Meat Cutters Vice Pres. Leon B. Schachter as he voiced the union's indignation at the decision of U.S. District Judge C. Stanley Blair.

"The union will appeal the case," Schachter said. "The union will go all the way to bring about justice—even if only 77 persons are involved."

The A & P management had admitted previously in a public statement that it had directed the government's attention to the 16-month contract it signed with the union last November.

The suit was filed in federal court by the Justice Dept., and U.S. Atty.

House Votes Backpay For Blue-Collar Units

The House voted approval of retroactive pay raises for 214,000 hourly paid, blue-collar employes of the federal government.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, had the backing of both unions and the Administration. It wipes out the last remnants of Pres. Nixon's unsuccessful effort to defer all government pay raises for six months to set an anti-inflation "example" to the rest of the nation.

Congress rejected Nixon's attempt to delay a scheduled raise for salaried white-collar employes, and they received their increase last January.

Shortly after that, Nixon cancelled an order he had issued holding up area wage surveys for the government's 600,000 blue-collar workers. But the damage had already been done to about one-third of the workers, whose pay raises came from two weeks to three months later than would normally have been the case.

The bill, which cleared the House by voice vote without opposition, is intended to make amends to this group.

It makes all wage adjustments retroactive to their normal effective date—overturning a ruling by the comptroller general that the increases could be made retroactive only if the wage survey had been scheduled before Aug. 15, 1971.

MURRAY-GREEN AWARD is presented to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph by James A. Suffridge, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee. Randolph, president emeritus of the Sleeping Car Porters, is the first labor leader ever honored with the federation's highest award for public service.

Murray-Green Prize:

Randolph Receives Top Labor Award

By John R. Oravec

Labor honored one of its own great Americans with the presentation of the Murray-Green Award to A. Philip Randolph, veteran union leader and civil rights fighter.

Randolph, chief founder of the Sleeping Car Porters and a vice president of the AFL-CIO since 1955, received the federation's highest honor at the closing session of the 16th National Conference on Community Services.

He joined the ranks of such other noted recipients as Eleanor Roosevelt, Dr. Jonas Salk, Gen. Omar Bradley and Harry S Truman. The award, which carries a $5,000 grant, was established by the AFL-CIO to salute persons who have inspired others to work for the common good. It is a memorial to Philip Murray and William Green who headed the CIO and the AFL respectively at the time of their deaths.

Randolph received a standing ovation from the more than 800 banquet guests as the award was presented by James A. Suffridge, vice president emeritus of the federation and chairman of its Community Services Committee.

In his acceptance speech, Randolph reviewed the long and still continuing struggle of the nation's black people for social justice and the role of the labor movement in lending its strength to the struggle.

Because leadership will not come from the White House, he said, organized labor must carry on the fight.

"Organized labor also gives strength to the human spirit," he ob-

Meany Vows All-Out Fight On Measure

By David L. Perlman

Labor considers the right to strike essential to collective bargaining and will fight compulsory arbitration legislation "with all the strength at our command," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told Congress.

Meany ripped into the Nixon Administration's bill to bar "crippling" strikes in transportation industries as "an anti-labor measure masquerading as public interest legislation."

Testifying before a Senate Labor subcommittee and answering wide-ranging questions from senators, Meany stressed the "vital difference" between voluntary and compulsory arbitration.

"That difference should be discernible to any free man," he declared.

Both the Administration bill and a similar measure sponsored by Sen. Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) would permit the President to halt a major strike against railroads, airlines, maritime, longshore or trucking firms by requiring unions and employers to submit a "final offer" and an "alternative final offer" to an arbitration panel.

The panel would choose one of the offers without change or modification.

Meany termed this "incredibly frivolous" substitute for collective bargaining "the latest example of this Administration's penchant for government by gimmick."

Two former directors of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, Meany noted, had testified in detail "just how foolish, and how

Abel Warns of Parallels To Pre-Depression Era

Pres. I. W. Abel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Dept. likened the economic conditions brought about by the policies of the Nixon Administration to those that led to the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Abel, who is president of the Steelworkers, met with representatives of the news media following a two-day meeting of the IUD executive committee.

"We detect trends toward a repetition of the economic conditions of the 1920s, and the possibility that these trends may lead, as the earlier ones did, to severe economic dislocation," Abel told the news conference.

"The similarity between economic conditions and the economic policy of our national Administration today and those prior to the Great Depression are alarmingly close."

He cited as an example of this similarity the steep rise in corporate profits, aided "by government poli-

Weak Controls Hit by Labor's Price Monitors

The Price Commission heard once again what union members think about the Administration's so-called price controls—this time from a group of six AFL-CIO price watchers from across the nation who labeled the program a "farce."

The price watchers, accompanied by AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, whose department supervises the price watch, recited consumer complaints ranging from the impossibility of reading complicated base price lists to the high cost of peanut butter.

Harold Cullum of Kansas City, a member of the Retail Clerks, said lists of base prices which large retail stores are required to keep for customer inspection are so complicated as to be meaningless.

He said he had trouble figuring out the lists.

"If an experienced groceryman can't understand this thing without great difficulty, how can a layman?" he asked.

Mrs. Violet L. Waggoner of Denver cited such instances as a jump in the price of coffee from 90 cents to 95 cents a pound and the advertising of a dishwashing product at 10 cents off its normal price, even though the price remained unchanged.

"I am a mother of seven children. Imagine my horror when I found peanut butter had come from 57 to 69 cents."

Mrs. Waggoner said she had been unable to ascertain whether the prices were legal because of the complex "off-again, on-again" rules on price increases.

Price Commission Chairman C. Jackson Grayson asked the price watchers if they would be willing to accept food rationing as a method of clamping effective controls on all prices.

Perlis replied that anything was preferable to the present system.

"If you have to have a bureaucracy" to run an elaborate price control program, "then, by God, have a bureauacracy," Perlis told the commission.

NMU Members Okay Law Changes

New York—Members of the National Maritime Union have ratified a series of constitutional amendments by wide margins, the Honest Ballot Association announced.

Among the changes were reduction in the number of national vice presidents from six to three and establishment of a five-year term of office instead of the present four-year term. Dropped from the constitution was a requirement that candidates for national office must have served at least one term in a lower-level union post.

Murray-Green Award Presented to Randolph served, "and this is something the White House cannot deal with."

Randolph stressed that the coming presidential election will have overriding significance for the labor-civil rights alliance. "If we don't make the right decision," he warned, the progress of workers and Negroes will be set back for years to come.

But if the nation moves in the right direction in the elections, "we can see great things ahead," he predicted.

Randolph urged the labor movement further to accept responsibility for giving direction to the forces of change.

"We cannot achieve goals with ideas alone," he said, "we must have force also—and that is how great movements are built."

Federation Pres. George Meany recapped Randolph's struggle to improve conditions of the economically and socially oppressed.

"Phil Randolph started many years ago with a set of ideals and principles determined to make life better for many of those at the bottom of the economic ladder," Meany noted.

"It was a lonesome fight for many years. A fight for civil rights. The fight for justice. . . .

"And while Phil Randolph is a great humanitarian, a great civil rights leader, he always has been a great labor leader—a trade unionist.

"He has courageously fought discrimination within the trade union movement itself," Meany pointed out. "We have never made any bones about the fact there was discrimination in the trade union movement—not to the extent, perhaps, that it existed in the community at large, but we never tried to sweep it under the rug. . . .

"It's been a long, hard road but we see progress. Phil has seen many setbacks. A lesser man would have been discouraged. But he never gave up. . . . He never let go of the principles and ideals of equity and human decency that have inspired and motivated him during his entire lifetime."

One of the highlights of the banquet was a reading by Actor Todd Duncan from a collection of Randolph statements and writings. (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Randolph, who turned 83 on Apr. 15, was also presented a massive birthday cake by the Bakery & Confectionery Workers at the award banquet.

No-Fare Buses Urged to Ease Crisis in Cities

Free bus service can help overcome some of the biggest problems of America's cities and metropolitan areas, Transit Union Pres. John M. Elliott told Dept. of Transportation officials.

Elliott urged the government agency to provide matching federal funds for a large-scale tryout of a no-fare transit system—lasting at least two years.

"Such an experiment would demonstrate to our entire nation the feasibility of a permanent system of no-fare operation as a convenient, efficient and effective alternative to the automobile," he said.

Elliott warned that the alternative is a continuation of the cycle of higher fares leading to decreased patronage, cutbacks in service—and city streets clogged and polluted by heavy auto traffic.

In a number of areas, he testified, this has led to the total abandonment of public transportation.

The entire community benefits from transit services, Elliott noted, but virtually the entire cost is born by the users—those who can least afford it.

Under a no-fare system, he said, greater patronage will lead to more frequent service, abolition of the fare-collecting and money-handling functions will reduce operating costs as well as speeding rides, and an equitable tax system would spread the cost of subsidizing transit service among the entire population.

Romney's Pay-Cut Candle Flickered Out Long Ago

George Romney is collecting his full $60,000-a-year paycheck as Secretary of Housing & Urban Development. The sacrificial candle he lit nearly two years ago has flickered out.

Romney made one-day newspaper headlines when he announced that he was returning 25 percent of his salary to the Treasury "as my personal contribution to the battle against cost-push inflation."

He called on others to follow his example, declaring: "I believe we need to light candles of leadership, example and sacrifice."

But no one, it turned out, reached to take the match from his hand. And Romney's office confirmed to the AFL-CIO News that he has since rescinded his unilateral pay cut and is back at full Cabinet pay.

From Administration to Congress:

Meany Asks Shift In Economic Reins

sharp needle instead of the customary polite welcome to the witness.

"You drove a hard bargain before you agreed to serve on the Pay Board," he told Meany. "You insisted that it be tripartite. Many disagreed with you on that . . . the tripartite feature was not the Administration's idea or Congress' idea. It was your idea. And when you walked off the board, you killed it. You strangled your own baby."

Meany vigorously denied having fathered a Pay Board whose so-called "public" members were recruited from business and government. That wasn't his idea of a tripartite board, Meany stressed.

He spoke of his five years service on the War Labor Board, whose public members operated "with no government interference" and whose labor members went along with decisions they didn't like on occasion because the system of reaching the decisions was fair.

He contrasted this with the Pay Board's virtually automatic lineup of 10-5 against labor, of labor's representatives left cooling their heels while the business and so-called public members reached decisions in private caucuses.

And he reminded the senators and congressmen that the same union leaders who joined in the unanimous AFL-CIO Executive Council decision to withdraw from the Pay Board continue to serve on the Construction Industry Stabilization Commission, whose public members are free of control and where there is both genuine cooperation and effective results.

As for labor being worse off outside of the Pay Board, Meany said he couldn't see how it could be "any worse for us."

Sure, he agreed, labor's walkout gives the Administration a chance to make unions the scapegoat. But that's not a new development. The Administration has been trying to make labor the scapegoat for its economic failures all along, he observed.

The thrust of Meany's testimony was, however, the need to control prices. Failure to control food prices, he said, was nonsensical. Decontrol of 85 percent of retail estabishments and nearly all rents made a farce of controls. "The Price Commission seems to decontrol more than they control."

"Bring prices down," Meany demanded, and the pressure for wage increases will be reduced.

"The average consumer and worker, particularly those at the lower rungs of the economic ladder, are bearing the brunt of this mess," Meany charged in his formal statement.

Price controls are riddled with exceptions and the Price Commission is unable to provide effective enforcement for "whatever degree of price controls remain on the books."

The Price Commission's rules "create a field day for accountants and lawyers" but are incomprehensible to anyone else, Meany complained.

Meanwhile, with productivity going up and wages held down, "profits have begun to soar" with the lion's share going to "the big banks, corporations and conglomerate giants."

Earlier, Proxmire had harsh words for the stabilization program when Pay Board Chairman George H. Boldt and Price Commission Chairman Jackson Grayson testified.

Proxmire termed Boldt unqualified for the post, charged that the Pay Board had adopted a policy of "planned and premeditated delay" in approving negotiated increases and termed it "pathetic" that the board has held only five public hearings.

Boldt countered that the board has been "diligent" and said it was "outrageous" that anyone would charge that it had prejudged cases in favor of big business.

Grayson defended the Price Commission's record against Proxmire's charge that the control program has been a "pathetic failure." He acknowledged problems but said he would not want the commission to move into control of food prices except "as a last resort."

One witness before the Joint Economic Committee took a strong leave-things-as-they-are attitude to the Nixon Administration's wage-price controls program.

The president of the National Association of Manufacturers, W. P. Gullander, testified that any major shakeup of the controls system would be "a grave blow to confidence within the business world."

George Baldanzi Dead, Textile Union President

New York—George Baldanzi, president of the United Textile Workers since 1958, died Apr. 16 of an apparent heart attack at his home in Hawthorne, N.J. He was 65.

After working in Pennsylvania coal mines as a teenager, Baldanzi came to Paterson, N.J., to work in the textile mills. He helped organize the Dyers Federation and became its first president in 1933.

The Dyers affiliated with the CIO's Textile Workers Organizing Committee that was formed in 1937 and became a part of the Textile Workers Union of America which was founded in 1939.

Baldanzi was elected executive vice president at the TWUA's first convention in 1939 and was re-elected to that office at subsequent conventions, serving until 1952.

He left the TWUA to join the UTW as director of organization. Baldanzi was on leave from the union in 1953-55 to serve as a regional director of the Teamsters. After returning to the UTW he was elected president in 1958 and re-elected to three additional four-year terms.

In a message of condolence to UTW members and officers, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland cited Baldanzi's "long and dedicated service to his fellow workers, his complete belief in trade unionism and his humanitarianism."

Baldanzi is survived by his wife, Lena, one son and a grandson. Services were held in Hawthorne, Apr. 19.

A new UTW president will be elected at the union's 18th quadrennial convention which opens Apr. 24 in Miami.

Credibility Gap Widens:

New Contradictions Muddle ITT Case

ITT's antitrust troubles may be over—thanks to the giant conglomerate's friends in the Justice Dept. and the White House. But the Nixon Administration's credibility gap continued to grow as the Senate Judiciary Committee concluded six weeks of hearings on the nomination of Richard G. Kleindienst to be Attorney General.

The latest of a parade of witnesses—including a presidential aide the White House initially said wouldn't be allowed to testify—only added more contradictions and changed stories to an already massive record.

Typical was the testimony of the lieutenant-governor of California, Ed Reinecke. True, Reinecke conceded, he had told newsmen that he had informed Atty. Gen. John Mitchell last May of ITT's pledge to help finance the Republican National Convention. That was three months before the Justice Dept. had agreed to ITT's proposal for an out-of-court settlement of the antitrust case.

And that would also have made a liar out of Mitchell, who was Kleindienst's boss at the time and now is in charge of Pres. Nixon's re-election campaign.

But fortunately, Reinecke told the committee, someone called his secretary after the ITT scandal broke and told her that "the attorney general's timetable does not agree with yours."

However, he said, his secretary didn't ask who was calling and he "honestly" doesn't know if the call came from the Justice Dept.

Anyway, sure enough he had been mistaken and he really hadn't told Mitchell about the ITT contribution until the following September, several months after the antitrust settlement.

What confused him was that he had met separately with both Dita Beard, the ITT lobbyist whose memo touched off the whole investigation, and Mitchell on Apr. 26, 1971. But it wasn't until the following day, he insisted, that the idea for holding the convention in San Diego was "hatched."

Sen. Birch Bayh (D-Ind.) told Reinecke bluntly that his testimony had sent his credibility rating to "zero."

And then there was the Wall Street consultant, who had been asked by Presidential Assistant Peter M. Flanigan—an old Wall Street man himself—to analyze the financial consequences of the Justice Dept.'s attempt to force ITT to divest itself of a big insurance company subsidiary.

The consultant, Richard J. Ramsden, said Flanigan had given him an ITT memorandum to help him with his study but had not identified its source.

Ramsden said the memorandum hadn't influenced his decision. And anyway, the conclusions he submitted weren't as strong as Justice Dept. officials indicated when they cited it as "persuasive" evidence that the antitrust case would have a "ripple effect" on the nation's economy.

In fact, Ramsden testified, "I would question whether there would be any significant ripple effect."

Flanigan confirmed giving the unlabeled ITT document to Ramsden.

But he balked at answering several other questions dealing with his relationship with ITT officials. Flanigan insisted they were outside of the limited subject area he had agreed to testify on.

The White House initially said Flanigan would not testify because the President's staff is immune from questioned by Congress. But then backed down—somewhat.

It agreed that Flanigan would answer questions about certain aspects of the case. And Juidiciary Committee Chairman James O. Eastland (D-Miss.) sided with Republicans on the committee in ruling that Flanigan did not have to reply to questions about meetings with ITT officials other than in the two cases he had agreed to discuss.

Flanigan was the last scheduled witness. The committee rejected on a 7-7 vote a Democratic motion to continue the hearings.

A NICKEL WASN'T ENOUGH for these members of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers Local 483. They walked out Feb. 24 from this Fedders Corp. plant at Edison, N.J., after management offered a general wage increase of 5 cents in the final year of a three-year pact. The 2,500 employes were receiving the support of the New Jersey AFL-CIO and the federation's Industrial Union Dept. as the strike neared its eighth week.

Union Vows to Appeal Order for Pay Rollback

George Beall said the action represented the first test of the wage provisions of the Phase 2 economic stabilization program.

The court granted an injunction preventing A & P from paying wage increases of 22 percent and imposed civil fines of $2,500 each on Meat Cutters Local 117 and the A & P management.

Judge Blair said it was not the size of the wage increase itself that violated Pay Board regulations, but the fact that the parties implemented an increase above 5.5 percent without obtaining the board's prior approval. "They were precluded from the implementation of such larger increases without obtaining prior approval of the Pay Board," he said.

Blair stated in his ruling that he had fined both A & P and Local 117 because both "are equally at fault and should be penalized accordingly."

But as AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted in his appearance before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, the government's first suit under wage-price controls fined A & P "not for raising prices, but for raising wages."

And A & P will recover the $2,500 fine many times over from savings that result from the lower wages it will be paying its employes, Meany pointed out.

The Pay Board had issued an order that A & P could pay the employes a wage increase of only 7 percent.

The contract in question was negotiated after an 8-day strike by the 77 members of Local 117 who are employed at a warehouse that distributes meats to 167 Baltimore area A & P stores.

Meat Cutters Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman said the wage increase due the 77 workers was actually a "catch-up" settlement to bring the pay of the warehouse employes up to the area standard.

Local 117 represents some 6,000 workers in the Baltimore-Washington area.

"These working people are not getting rich on their wages and they are not causing any disturbance of economic stability in their community," Gorman said.

"So far as halting inflation is concerned," the government rollback requested by the Justice Dept. "would be about as effective as spraying 77 drops of water on the Sahara Desert."

He noted also that the Pay Board acted against the settlement without asking the union for any evidence or advice.

The A & P statement, issued when the suit was filed, revealed how the largest food store chain in the nation lobbied to get the government into the picture.

When Local 117 demanded what A & P called "excessive payments we resisted by hard bargaining and by attempting to interest the government in prompt enforcement of its guidelines," the statement said.

Wage Levels Held No Factor In Meat Boosts

Wage rates in the meat industry "have had nothing to do with the recent high tide in meat prices," the Meat Cutters told a House subcommittee, and they offered a survey of meat prices in chain stores in three cities to prove their point.

The survey showed that while some chain stores in question paid lower wages than their competitors because of older contract rates, they charged the same or higher prices for various cuts of meat.

Making the presentation before the Livestock & Grain subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee, were Meat Cutters Research Director James Wishart and Legislative Rep. Arnold Mayer.

The union's survey showed the following:

- In Newark, N.J., chuck roast sold for $1.09 a pound in four chains—the A & P, Two Guys, Shop Rite and Food Town. But the second two chains are paying 67.5 cents an hour less in wages than the first two.
- In Dallas, Tex., the Safeway chain was paying its meat cutters 47.5 cents less an hour, but charging nearly the same as the local Shop Rite chain per pound of chuck roast—83 cents.
- In Nashville, Tenn., the A & P was selling steak at 10 cents a pound more than Kroger while paying 30 cents an hour less in wages.

Wishart and Arnold also pointed out that productivity in the meat industry has more than kept pace with increasing wages.

Government figures show, they said, that output per manhour in the packing houses has risen by 83 percent from 1956 to 1971, or from 64.2 pounds of meat per hour to 117.4 pounds.

As a result, the wages received by packinghouse workers per pound of meat remained at 3.3 cents from 1956 to 1969 and had risen to only 3.5 cents per pound produced in 1971.

Under the Administration's economic stabilization program, the prices of processed meats are supposedly controlled. But the price of cattle on the hoof is not, and processors may pass along cost increases as can retailers.

This has led to a skyrocketing rise in the price of most meats which last February were 11.2 percent higher than a year earlier.

The union officials charged that the real culprit in the price situation is a "price control program certain to fail, as part of a total economic policy which can see no difference between the nation's real needs and those of its corporate structures."

High Court Urged to Uphold Access Of Organizers to Plant Parking Lots

A company parking lot can't be put off limits to union organizers when there is no other practical method of reaching all of the workers, the AFL-CIO asserted in a brief to the Supreme Court.

The federation brief backed up the contention of the Retail Clerks, the National Labor Relations Board and a federal appellate court that Central Hardware Co. of Indianapolis illegally interfered with the right of its workers to organize by barring union representatives from the parking lot.

The labor board and appellate court agreed that the right of access is guaranteed under a Supreme Court precedent defining union activity in a privately-owned shopping center that was open to the public as a form of free speech.

Both the NLRB and the court rejected the hardware firm's contention that another Supreme Court precedent was binding—one that upheld the right of an employer to prohibit distribution of union literature on his property if "reasonable efforts by the union" would enable it to communicate with workers by other methods.

The AFL-CIO brief endorsed the free speech precedent, but carried the case one step further.

Even if one assumed just for the sake of argument, the AFL-CIO said, that the employer was correct in citing the precedent he chose as a defense, he still acted illegally in barring the union organizers.

In the case before the court—and in many similar cases—a union does not in fact have any reasonable means of reaching workers directly except in and around company property.

Under present patterns of workers living in scattered areas of a city and its suburbs and driving cars to work, the AFL-CIO noted, neither street meetings nor personal contacts off the job are feasible. The costs of trying to reach one group of workers in a metropolitan area with television, radio and newspaper advertising is likewise unreasonable and impractical.

But the employer suffers no hardship or measurable economic loss if union organizers are permitted to enter a parking lot reserved for employes, the brief continued.

And whatever the theoretical argument may be as to the employers' right to control access to his property for any reason, this must take second place to the right to union organization guaranteed by the National Labor Relations Act.

The AFL-CIO brief acknowledged that the position advocated in its brief "would most probably open company property to unions on many occasions."

But, it stressed, when employers such as Central Hardware seek to isolate their workers from contact with union representatives and cannot demonstrate any overriding business justification for their actions, it is they who are violating the law—and the NLRB was correct in so finding.

The brief was filed for the AFL-CIO by General Counsel J. Albert Woll, Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris and Attorneys Robert C. Mayer and Laurence Gold of the General Counsel's office.

Safety Violations Run Near 80%

Noncompliance with federal job safety and health standards continues to run at nearly 80 percent of work places inspected, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration reported.

OSHA said that in the eight months ended Feb. 29 only 22 percent of the establishments inspected were found to be in compliance with the job safety act.

Federal inspectors discovered 52,244 violations of standards which led to citations to 14,184 employers during the eight-month period. The violations resulted in proposed penalties totaling $1,166,909.

'It's Up to Congress'

THE ORIGINAL Economic Stabilization Act provided the President with a blank check. It did not provide adequate safeguards for equality of sacrifice.

The AFL-CIO made this point in presenting its views on amendments to this legislation to the House Banking & Currency Committee.

We urged the Congress to tighten the substantive provisions of the act, but not to extend the act's authority beyond the original termination date of Apr. 30, 1972. Under such circumstances, the Administration would have been compelled to return to the Congress for further authority, after the stabilization program had been in effect for a reasonable length of time. We said that "such a procedure would underline Congress' determination to provide a continuing oversight."

Unfortunately, the Administration's request for an extension of the legislation was granted. The need for a most careful oversight, however, is all too clear, after five months of the Phase 2 program.

The measures carried out under this legislation have been unjust, unfair and unbalanced. They have not achieved the objective of substantially cutting down the rapid increase of living costs.

PRES. NIXON has been widely quoted as saying "inflation is everyone's fight." We agree. And so we ask why the rules adopted by the Price Commission cannot be understood by everyone. There is no need to create a field day for accountants and lawyers.

If inflation is to be everyone's fight, then everyone must know and understand the rules. It seems ludicrous that the Price Commission cannot know if the price increase on a can of beans was legitimate or not until it reads the quarterly corporate report.

This is like playing a game where only the other team knows the rules and the referees are their friends. It just isn't fair.

That's what we want—fairness. And the full record of the Administration's stabilization measures prove we don't have it now. So there must be substantial revision of the Economic Stabilization Act. And, as we have said time and again, there must be an excess profits tax, as an integral part of a fair and effective stabilization effort.

These oversight hearings are a step in the right direction. However, the AFL-CIO urges you not to drop the matter at the close of these hearings. The American people need a change in the course of national economic policy.

It is up to Congress to provide the required leadership and legislation for an effective and equitable, overall stabilization effort, as well as measures to move the economy to full employment without delay. Certainly, this committee and Congress cannot lose sight of the fact—as the Administration often does—that unemployment continues at an unacceptable plateau of close to 6 percent.

The Administration has proven its incompetence in these areas. It is up to Congress to restore the confidence of the American people in the American economy.

'I Keep Smelling a Noise!'

A Word Edgewise:

Master Political Strategy Is Whatever Happens to Work

By John P. Roche

LAWRENCE O'BRIEN, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, is in a curious position. While virtually every other leading Democrat is running around the country dividing the party, O'Brien sits in Washington and tries to keep it in one piece. By the nature of his job, he cannot take sides in the selection process so he is riding it out, serving as the honest broker between the candidates, and above all trying to raise money and get the machinery geared for the Miami Beach convention.

Since there wasn't much cheerful news to discuss, when I visited Larry we fell to reminiscing. There on the walls of his office were the pictures of O'Brien with all the eminent Democrats of the past generation, but one in particular hit me: a youthful O'Brien with an incredibly boyish John Kennedy. It resembles one I have on my wall and suddenly the time tunnel opened: I was back in Massachusetts in the 1950s trying to help Kennedy drum up academic support. It was tough: Adlai Stevenson, who I was convinced was fundamentally a conservative, had charmed the intellectuals with his admittedly impressive style. And the myth of "Camelot" was yet to be born: Jack Kennedy was just another Irish pol who happened to have a Harvard degree.

Inevitably we got into Kennedy's 1960 drive for the nomination. I recalled Kennedy's description of the Manchester Union Leader and its publisher—an ice-cold tirade that would have made Lyndon Johnson blush. And then Wisconsin. O'Brien was particularly amusing on the 1960 Wisconsin primary: "We thought we had it won, the votes showed that we had won, but then that rascal Humphrey was out there proclaiming that in fact we had lost because we hadn't gotten all the votes!"

Humphrey did such an effective job that Kennedy had to put his stack into the West Virginia primary, one that for obvious reasons he had originally hoped to duck. When O'Brien arrived in West Virginia to set up the big push, the first thing he had to do was explain to his own troops that Humphrey had not won in Wisconsin!

Kennedy's 1960 strategy was almost the direct opposite of Muskie's in 1972. He picked his primaries very carefully, avoided the California bloodbath by accepting a "favorite son," and after West Virginia simply cruised, beating Wayne Morse in Oregon. He could then go to the convention and state that he had fought the primaries from coast to coast.

Actually George McGovern is doing the same sort of careful selection: since he refused to fight in Florida, though his name was on the ballot, he did not "lose" there. Similarly he is setting his sights on Massachusetts, while Humphrey and Muskie fight it out in Pennsylvania. Both Muskie and Humphrey thus stand to lose in Massachusetts if McGovern gets a plurality on Apr. 25, but McGovern won't lose in Pennsylvania, no matter how few votes he gets.

THE POINT THAT O'Brien was most jocular about was the notion that candidates have a master strategy.

"You know, you start a campaign with a plan, with everything laid out, and then 'Bang'—something you never dreamed of happens. Within a month nobody but Teddy White remembers that you had a plan."

After the fact, he said, everyone came around and congratulated Kennedy on his courage in tackling West Virginia, on the wisdom of winning in a solidly Protestant state. "Actually if anyone had urged Jack to go in West Virginia, he should have been thrown down the stairs . . . we were trapped."

"A master political strategist," he concluded, "is somebody who wins an election—even if he doesn't know how he did it. He can then read the columns and find out the secret of his success."

Having learned what my function in life is, I rose to go. As I stopped by the door to look again at the picture of Larry and Jack Kennedy, and to meditate a moment on the political convulsions of the last 15 years, the chairman was already back at his work: organizing a fund-raiser to keep the store open, to provide the nuts and bolts of political organization.

'I See a World . . .'

Randolph Retains His Vision Of Freedom, Equality, Peace

At the dinner marking the presentation of the Murray-Green Award to A. Philip Randolph, Todd Duncan, famed actor and singer, read to the audience from Randolph's own writings and speeches. This is a part of Duncan's reading:

"I SEE A WORLD where thrones have crumbled and kings are dust, where the aristocracy of idleness have perished from the earth. I see a world without a slave. Man at last is free. Nature's forces have by science been enslaved—lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the subtle forces of earth and air are the tireless toilers of the human race.

"I see a world at peace, adorned with all forms of art with music's myriad voices thrilled, while lips are rich with words of truth and love. I see a world where no exile sighs, no prisoner mourns, where work and worth go hand in hand, where the poor girl trying to make bread with a needle, the needle which has been called the asp for the breast of the poor, is not driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, of suicide or shame.

"I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless stony stare, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn, the piteous wail of want.

"I see a race happy and fair, devoid of disease of flesh or brain, married harmony of form and function, and as I look, life lengthens, joy deepens, and over all in the great dome, shines the eternal star of human hope."

Thus, more than 30 years ago, tonight's honoree—A. Philip Randolph—outlined his vision of a world of equality, freedom and peace.

Throughout his long career, when others exhorted the Negro to revolution, revolt and separatism, Randolph called for reform within America's democratic system:

"One must always remember that the progress made by the American Negro has been accomplished within the framework of democratic institutions. Such tools as freedom of speech, press, and assembly are powerful and necessary weapons to a people plagued by continuous Jim Crow practices. Neither fascism on the right nor communism on the left can offer to the Negro any hope of economic, political or social freedom. . . .

"Democracy with all its illnesses offers the only real source for adjusting the political, economic, and social problems of an oppressed people.

"Admittedly very incomplete and with maladjustments all around us, the job is big. But the task is not hopeless. It is rather encouraging. To those of us who have dedicated our lives to the unfinished work of democracy there can be no more noble undertaking."

A. Philip Randolph spoke most eloquently, however, of the need to strengthen the historic Negro-labor alliance he helped to forge.

Speaking to his fellow delegates at the 1963 AFL-CIO convention, he said:

"Let each of us individually and unequivocally embrace the Negro's struggle for freedom, and the labor movement will rise to its full moral stature. Let us do this, and when labor's rights are threatened, you will see an outpouring of black Americans into the streets in defense of those rights, as they have taken to the streets in defense of their own rights.

"Let us so implement this resolution that the day will come and not be far off when the white steelworkers of Birmingham will take the hands of black children in the crusade to redeem the South.

"Let us so implement this resolution that the mill workers of Danville will join the struggle for civil rights in that beleaguered city—so that white unemployed miners in West Virginia and Tennessee will march arm-in-arm with their black brothers to transform their bleak hills into flourishing countrysides.

"In the last analysis, my brothers and sisters, the essence of trade unionism is social uplift. The labor movement traditionally has been the only haven for the dispossessed, the despised, the neglected, the downtrodden, and the poor. We must pledge our lives to the social revolution which will bring all of them into labor's crusading fold—into the pale of dignity and economic well-being.

"This is labor's ultimate faith. This is the basis of labor's program. This is the challenge before us. This is the task to which we must now rededicate ourselves."

LOOKING BACK over a long and dynamic career, Randolph told the guests at his 80th birthday celebration:

"In my life I have tried to abide by the principles of democracy, nonviolence and integration, but there are some today, particularly among our black youth, who would question the validity of these principles in our on-going struggle. I urge them to reconsider their position and to engage with me in a reaffirmation of these fundamental principles. We must reject confrontation, and together reaffirm the necessity for democratic means of political protest. We must reject violence, and together reaffirm the power and the wisdom of nonviolence. And we must reject racial separatism and together, with the conviction that one day our nation can cease to be divided within itself, reaffirm our abiding faith in integration. We cannot reject these principles without also denying ourselves the possibility of freedom.

"Salvation for the Negro masses must come from within. Freedom is never granted; it is won. Justice is never given; it is exacted. But in our struggle we must draw for strength upon something that far transcends the boundaries of race. We must draw upon the capacity of human beings to act with humanity towards one another. We must draw upon the human potential for kindness and decency. And we must have faith that this society, divided by race and by class, and subject to profound social pressures, can one day become a nation of equals, and banish white racism and black racism and anti-semitism to the limbo of oblivion from which they shall never emerge."

The voice, as you've heard, is mine, but the words are the words of A. Philip Randolph. They are the words of hope, and like Phil, they belong to all Americans.

By Press Associates, Inc.

MORE THAN three years ago, Joseph Barr, then Secretary of the Treasury, who went out of office when the Nixon Administration came in, warned Congress that a "taxpayers' revolt" was in the making.

Congress more or less took heed of what he said and gave the country tax relief that eased the burden on the lowest brackets, threw some crumbs to the middle brackets and barely, if at all, tightened the strings on the upper brackets. The "revolt" pretty much faded.

Now, all of a sudden, taxpayers are up in arms again, and with good reason. At the very moment that the Nixon Administration talks of new tax relief for corporations to "stimulate" job-creating industry in the best "trickle-down" tradition, the average taxpayer is being hit harder than ever.

The average American shudders when he thinks of what may lie ahead as the federal government, the states, and local communities, each in its own way, sounds ominous warnings that new tax sources must be found to meet the costs of government.

The District of Columbia, for example, is thinking of charging automobile commuters a dollar a day, not only to cut down on pollution and traffic jams but to add to its needed revenues. The Nixon Administration is talking about a "value-added" tax, really a regressive sales tax, in an effort to meet the deficit that faces the Treasury.

Yet, all the while, the most unjust of tax "loopholes," which cost the Treasury billions of dollars each year, go merrily on their way.

Suddenly, some of the presidential hopefuls are beginning to sense that perhaps a worthwhile campaign issue, in addition to busing and Vietnam and unemployment, lies in the tax issue. Members of Congress also have sensed the new 1972 "taxpayers' revolt" and have bluntly warned the President that tax reform is needed.

Moves are in the works to tack a tax reform amendment to the Nixon revenue sharing bill or to tack one on the debt limit legislation that will come up in June. The President himself is supposedly flirting with a tax reform measure. Tax experts fear that whatever comes out of the White House is likely to be strong on rhetoric and weak on substance.

BUT THE NEED is clearly there. The story of tax loopholes is as old as the tax laws themselves, but every so often a new and shocking example crops up to shock the public. Rep. Charles A. Vanik, Ohio Democrat, dug through the 1971 report of U.S. Steel and came up with the following:

"The largest dollar value steel-manufacturing company in the world carried on a total business of almost $5 billion, had a net income of $154,515,754 and paid absolutely not one penny of federal income tax in 1971."

Latest statistics from the Internal Revenue Service report that some 40 percent of U.S. corporations escape income taxes either because of claimed business losses or through loopholes. The reasons? Of those with income, major items enabling them to escape taxes were: investment tax credits, credits for foreign taxes, accelerated depreciation, losses from previous years, dividends received from other corporations, dividends on certain preferred stock and income from certain businesses operating outside the United States, but within Canada and Latin America.

The statistics show that more than half of the nation's mining firms paid no income tax at all because of domestic investment and foreign tax credits; that almost half of petroleum and natural gas firms paid no taxes for the same reasons.

American labor has tirelessly fought for the closing of tax loopholes and a fair break for the low and middle-income taxpayer. Year after year the original progressive foundation of the American income tax system has been eroded away.

Chesser Hits Mismanagement:

Nationalization of Penn Central Held Needed to Protect Public

THE PRESIDENT of the nation's largest operating rail union said in a network radio interview that "financial manipulations" and mismanagement have left the Penn Central Railroad in such a shambles that the only "remedy is nationalization to protect the public."

Al H. Chesser, president of the United Transportation Union, charged that while the Penn Central trustees plead for federal money to make the line "a viable carrier," they are laying plans to "cripple their plant by dismantling 11,000 miles of the line" and laying off six to seven thousand workers.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Chesser conceded that nationalization of a carrier that has been under the free enterprise system and has gone bankrupt needs a great deal of study.

Chesser stressed that in addition to its grave financial woes, Penn Central has "probably the worst" record in the rail industry in safety and labor-management relations. He said that the line has been cited for "more than 3,000 violations" of safety rules in the past two years.

The UTU president turned aside the contention that nationalization of the Penn Central would have a "cascading effect that might eventually lead to nationalization of the whole system."

"It could happen, but I seriously doubt it will," he said, pointing out that many other lines have gone through bankruptcy without resorting "to the tactics that Penn Central has used. They're still operating," he added, and "some of them are doing a little better."

The AFL-CIO produced interview program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

ONLY NATIONALIZATION can remedy the shambles of the Penn Central Railroad left in the wake of financial manipulations and mismanagement, United Transportation Union Pres. Al H. Chesser, center, said on Labor News Conference. Reporters questioning the AFL-CIO vice president were Duane Emme, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Donald Finley of United Press International. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Federal Role Stressed in Public Works

The AFL-CIO endorsed the goals of a Senate bill to create and finance a network of regional public works development programs, but stressed the need for a strong federal role to ensure its effectiveness.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller also urged a Senate Public Works subcommittee to launch a new effort to enact an accelerated public works bill that would provide immediate jobs on needed projects that are ready to start as soon as money is available.

Pres. Nixon vetoed such a bill last year, Biemiller noted. But since his veto, the jobless rate has gone up and 103 additional labor market areas have been added to the substantial unemployment list.

Biemiller's testimony was presented by AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Howard McGuigan, who was accompanied by Economist Arnold Cantor. Subcommittee Chairman Joseph M. Montoya (D-N.M.) introduced the economic development bill. It is co-sponsored by both the chairman of the full committee, Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), and the senior minority member, Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R-Ky.).

The AFL-CIO testimony expressed labor's strong support of "a greater federal commitment to jobs and public investments" and termed the national-regional structure of the Montoya bill "an imaginative and innovative framework within which to meet these goals."

But it warned also against spreading available funds too thinly with the risk of "providing funds to areas that are not in need at the expense of those that are."

To ensure that priorities are upheld, that labor standards and anti-pirating provisions of the bill are enforced, a centralized federal development office is essential, the AFL-CIO said.

South Dakota Labor Scores In Legislature

Pierre, S.D.—Labor-backed legislation passed by the 1972 session of the South Dakota legislature and signed into law increased workmen's compensation and unemployment benefits and liberalized eligibility requirements.

Another law supported by the South Dakota AFL-CIO provides an exemption from real property taxes on the first $1,000 of assessed valuation of single dwelling homes for those 65 years or older with limited taxable incomes.

Workmen's compensation was increased to a maximum of $60 weekly, up from $56, and the minimum was raised from $27 to $30. The waiting period for an injured worker was reduced to seven calendar days as opposed to seven days of lost wages.

Unemployment insurance benefits were increased from $47 to $55 weekly.

The state central body also won passage of a bill providing that 10,000 public employes will get Fridays off when legal holidays fall on a Saturday.

A health insurance plan was initiated for public employes who are not currently covered by one, and another law backed by the South Dakota AFL-CIO provides for a comprehensive study of the state's Public Employes' Retirement System with a view to making it more adequate.

A FUTILE EFFORT by a fire fighter to revive a three-year-old girl who was overcome by smoke inhalation was recorded in this winning photo in the Fire Fighters 1972 International Awards competition for newsmen. The picture was made by Richard F. Owens of the Worcester, Mass., Evening Gazette. Seven top prize winners were selected from the more than 300 contest entries.

Fire Fighters Awards Cite Coverage by Media

Seven top winners were selected in the Fire Fighters' annual news media awards contests for stories, pictures and broadcasts depicting the professionalism and hazardous duty of IAFF members.

Overall, 25 newsmen from the United States and Canada were cited for prizes and special awards from the more than 300 entries submitted for competition.

IAFF Pres. William H. McClennan noted that both the U.S. and Canadian news media "are genuinely interested in helping the public to understand both the dedication and expertise of modern fighters."

The competition was divided into six major categories. First place winners in each category receive $500 and second place winners $250. All entries were nominated by local IAFF affiliates.

Judges in the 1972 IAFF contest were Frank Swoboda of McGraw-Hill publications; Saul Miller, AFL-CIO publications director, and Warren Y. Kimball, formerly with the National Fire Protection Association.

A special citation was awarded to Elliot Carlson of the Wall Street Journal for an in-depth look at the hazards of modern-day fire fighting and an examination of the attitudes of fire fighters toward their working conditions.

The top prize winners are:

- Jerry Howard, Wayland, Mass., Town Crier, for a story describing the team effort of fire fighters to save a large structure. The article, submitted by IAFF Local 1978, was judged the best among newspapers of less than 100,000 circulation.
- Steve Higgins, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, for an investigative story on a sharp increase in arson cases that led to criminal indictments, as well as the formation of an arson squad in the St. Louis Fire Dept. It was judged the best effort in the more than 100,000 circulation category. Local 73 submitted the entry.
- Richard F. Owens, Worcester, Mass., Evening Gazette, for a photo showing a fire fighter attempting to revive a three-year-old girl who was overcome by smoke inhalation. Local 1009 made the entry for newspapers with less than 100,000 circulation.
- Carl D. Harris, Baltimore Sun, for a picture showing an injured fire fighter being assisted by other members of his fire company. The entry, submitted by Locals 734 and 964, was selected as the best in the more than 100,000 circulation newspapers.
- Robert Brandon, TV station KPRC in Houston, for coverage of a derailment and explosion of railroad tank cars in which one fire fighter was killed and 46 other fire fighters and newsmen were injured. Local 341 submitted the entry.
- Bob Fitzsimmons, radio station WHN in New York City, for a documentary titled "The Work Day of Engine 41." The entry was submitted by Local 854.

Second place awards were won by Virginia McDaniels of the Newark, Ohio, Advocate, Phil Santora and Roy Morsch of the New York Sunday News, Lee Bernard of the Huntington, W. Va., Herald-Dispatch, John White of the Chicago Daily News, Newton B. Carter of WWL-TV, New Orleans, and George R. Norton of radio station WPRO, Providence, R.I.

Rail Mediator Benedict Dies in Vermont Fire

Fair Haven, Vt.—Peter C. Benedict, a member of the National Mediation Board since last August, died in a fire that destroyed his family home here Apr. 12. He was 45.

Benedict had previously served as minority counsel on the labor subcommittee of the Senate Labor & Public Welfare Committee. From 1954 to 1965, he was on the staff of the National Labor Relations Board.

At Internists' Meeting:

Doctors' Goals Tied To Health Security

Atlantic City, N.J.—The American Society of Internal Medicine and organized labor are in basic agreement on the need to bring a system of comprehensive health care to the people, Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock told the society at its annual meeting.

Woodcock, who is chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance, said the program that best meets that goal and the needs of the country is the Kennedy-Griffiths Health Security plan.

"Health Security comes the closest to the ideals you yourselves set for a national health insurance plan," he noted. "The Health Security bill is the only one before Congress that measures up to your own standards."

Woodcock's points on health Security were underscored by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, who appeared as a panelist at the conference.

Seidman stressed that Health Security is distinguished from rival proposals because it would provide universal coverage and comprehensive care for the entire population.

Other programs will not allow the medical profession to achieve the common objectives that doctors and the labor movement are striving for, he said. Health Security, Seidman pointed out, would permit doctors to practice medicine at its best while bringing a better-managed delivery system to all that need it.

Reviewing the society's testimony before Congress last November, Woodcock said the alternative proposals of the Nixon Administration and the American Medical Association fall short of the internists' goals.

He pointed out that health care problems are high on the list of labor's concerns. Union members, he said, are deeply troubled by difficulties in obtaining health care services, by the fragmented programs and the lack of continuity, by the uncertain quality of services and the sky-rocketing costs in recent years.

"It will take more than palliatives to meet the problems that this nation faces in health care," he stressed. "It will take strong medicine—but it need not be distasteful to the medical profession. It can be both strong and beneficial."

Woodcock predicted that practicing physicians will undoubtedly cooperate to assure the success of national health insurance, just as they have in the 60 other countries where such programs are in operation.

Speaking earlier at a health care conference for workers in Claremont, N.H., Seidman explained what labor hopes to achieve through enactment of the Health Security measure.

The key goals are quite simple, he stressed. They include programs not only to treat sickness and to preserve health, but also to assure that every member of the family has access to quality health care.

Seidman noted that while unions negotiate health insurance plans in labor-management contracts, even the best of these plans cover less than half of family medical care costs.

Bill Would Allow Unions To Bargain on Legal Aid

Legislation to amend federal labor laws to allow collective bargaining on prepaid group legal plans has been introduced in Congress.

The amendment is necessary for the legal plans to become a topic of collective bargaining since the Taft-Hartley Act spells out what fringe benefits may be financed by trust funds set up in bargaining between labor and management.

The act was similarly amended as recently as 1969 to permit bargaining on scholarships for workers' children and on day care centers.

The current bill, introduced in the Senate by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.) and in the House by Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., (D-N.J.), would permit the establishment of a joint labor-management trust fund to fiannce group legal plans.

Although a comparatively new idea, some prepaid group legal plans are already functioning. They include plans set up by Laborers local unions in Shreveport, La., and Columbus, O., the United Transportation Union in Michigan, the Clothing Workers in Chicago and a number of others.

The new bill would allow for the establishment of a permanent vehicle for financing them.

The potential of such plans to put quality legal aid within the reach of workers was emphasized by Jules Bernstein, associate general counsel of the Laborers, at a luncheon in New York sponsored jointly by the League for Industrial Democracy and the New School for Social Research.

The "mom and pop approach" to legal practice is no longer adequate, Bernstein said, since "the 19th Century legal system is simply not equipped to handle the legal problems of the middle-income workers of the 20th Century."

Bernstein noted that the wealthy have always had adequate legal aid and in recent years an attempt has been made to provide some service to the very poor.

But the great mass of Americans in between have never been able to take advantage of the "preventive" aspects of having access to an attorney for routine needs, thus avoiding more expensive legal service later.

Interest in prepaid group legal plans has grown since recent court decisions removed restrictions against them. Judicial codes of ethics had held it a conflict of interest for an attorney to represent an entire group instead of an individual client.

Bar associations are now expressing growing interest in the group plans, Bernstein said. He noted that the American Bar Association is sponsoring a national conference on them in Washington, D.C., Apr. 27-29. Several union attorneys will address that conference.

LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCES held by the Communications Workers and the Sheet Metal Workers brought more than 700 trade unionists from across the country to Washington, D.C., where they made organized labor's views known on Capitol Hill and received briefings from congressional leaders. At left, CWA Pres. Josph A. Beirne welcomes members, and at right Sheet Metal Workers Pres. Edward J. Carlough addresses session.

N.Y. Unions Explore Needs of Community

New York—"Labor leads the community forward" was the theme as 1,200 trade unionists joined with representatives of 20 health and social agencies in the 20th annual community services institute of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Social and economic ills affecting the community and efforts to correct them were considered in the day-long sessions. Subjects included runaway prices, problems of drug abuse and alcoholism, the battle for decent housing and quality education, health care, welfare, child care and care of the aged.

Indifference and incompetence at top levels of government, mainly the Administration in Washington, were exposed as major sources of difficulty as panelists and union delegates worked on the issues.

Nat Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, accused the Nixon Administration of seeking to achieve a "massive shift in income distribution, taking from the low and middle-income groups for the benefit of corporations, banks and conglomerates."

This, he charged, is being done through tax giveaways and phony operation of Phase 2 controls. He warned that the proposed "value-added" tax, a national federal sales tax scheme, could well be enacted if Pres. Nixon is re-elected.

Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., president of the city central labor council, called for a national war on unemployment which, he said, organized labor will have to lead.

"No man or woman in this country should be subjected to unemployment or the fear of unemployment," he said. "This country must mobilize as for war to rid the nation of the scourge of unemployment."

The achievement of full employment "must be a prime responsibility of any administration elected to public office," Van Arsdale declared. "And any administration that fails to achieve full employment must be held accountable."

Thomas R. Donahue, vice president of the Service Employes, told the conference that new times and new challenges have changed labor's program but not its basic role.

"Samuel Gompers expressed the challenge organized labor faced at that time when he summed up the unions' goal as, simply, 'more.' Today, we say we want more and better."

The conference also heard from Harold Ostroff, executive vice president of the United Housing Foundation, on skyrocketing housing costs; Harry Fleischman, executive secretary of the National Alliance for Shaping Safer Cities; Queens County District Attorney Thomas Mackell; John H. Williams, director of industrial programs of the Alcoholism Recovery Institute, and Paul Mendenhall of AFL-CIO Community Services.

Thomas J. Perry, chairman of the central labor council's community services committee, presented certificates to 100 graduates of the union counsellor training program. He also presented three awards to union and agency officials for outstanding contributions of community betterment. These went to Patrick Mulrooney, president of Steelworkers Local 5640, for the union's assistance to a neighborhood hospital in distress; Dr. Frank Herzlin, medical director of Freeport Hospital, for its work in developing alcoholism recovery programs, and Armand D'Angelo, chairman of the Joint Industry Board of the Electrical Industry, for his development of educational and cultural programs for union members.

Dockers' Suit Seeks Escrow Of Denied Pay

San Francisco—The Longshoremen & Warehousemen filed suit in U.S. District Court here in an attempt to force the Pay Board to permit the pay increases it disallowed to be set aside in a special escrow fund.

The suit was scheduled for a hearing Apr. 26.

The ILWU won a settlement of about 20 percent after a 135-day strike against West Coast shippers and stevedore companies, but the Pay Board pared this increase back to 14.9 percent.

The suit said the Pay Board's action would cost some 15,000 dockers about $20 million in lost wages and termed the board's reduction of the settlement "arbitrary and capricious."

The union told the court that it had asked the PMA to place the money in escrow until such time and under such conditions as payment would meet with approval of the Pay Board or until wage controls are lifted, but the PMA replied that the board already had disapproved any such agreement.

The suit asks the court for an order setting aside "any advice, information or direction" on this matter given the PMA by the Pay Board.

Ninth Convention Proceedings Issued

Two publications dealing with the federation's Ninth Convention are now available from the AFL-CIO.

The proceedings of the November 1971 sessions are contained in a single volume that includes also the Report of the Executive Council and the federation's Constitution. The volume is priced at $5.

A 96-page booklet contains the text of policy resolutions adopted at the Ninth Convention. A single copy is free; additional copies are 85 cents, or $75 for 100.

Both publications can be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Labor Readies Colorado Voter Law Challenge

Denver—The 1972 Colorado AFL-CIO interim convention—replacing the labor council's COPE conventions of former years—kept the focus on political action.

Delegates called for a court challenge of Colorado's restrictive election laws after endorsing the findings of a pre-convention hearing which concluded that current regulations make it extremely difficult for qualified persons to register and vote.

The hearing was conducted by Dean Robert Yegge of the University of Denver Law College. The State AFL-CIO subsequently announced it will seek a court-ordered state system to expand registration through door-to-door canvasses, at plants and worksites and in schools.

Pres. Herrick S. Roth said the suit is expected to be filed by mid-May. Roth also noted that the suit will ask the court to extend registration deadlines to 10 days before elections rather than current 30-day cutoff preceding elections.

In other action, the 279 delegates also called for reforms of the state workmen's compensation system to remove fixed ceilings on weekly benefits and to provide coverage for all workers.

The two-day convention was recessed during one period to allow delegates to meet with Sen. George McGovern (D-N.D.), who made a brief stop at the Denver airport on his presidential campaign swing. Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty also made a visit to the convention.

Legislative Conferences Draw 700 to Washington

Two major AFL-CIO unions—the Communications Workers and the Sheet Metal Workers—brought upwards of 700 delegates to Washington for legislative conferences aimed toward making organized labor's views known on Capitol Hill and their own members aware of what's happening in Congress.

More than 400 local CWA officials participated in a 5-day legislative conference, dividing their time equally between legislative briefings and visits with their senators and congressmen.

"In an election year, all legislators are politicians," CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne told the delegates.

"They understand numbers, and the more calls you make in person, the better your chances that they will hear and understand what organized labor wants."

Beirne said that "this session of Congress faces some of the most controversial and important issues in many years, and we're going to make sure that every member of Congress is made aware of CWA's views."

High on the CWA agenda were matters related to the nation's economy, especially the need for tax reform. Other subjects were National Health Security, no-fault auto insurance, and labor's all-out effort to defeat the Administration's so-called crippling strikes legislation which would ban strikes in the transportation industry and impose settlements by a form of compulsory arbitration.

Meanwhile, more than 300 Sheet Metal Workers at that union's legislative conference heard Pres. Edward J. Carlough describe the purpose of the meeting as making sure "our members know what is happening on Capitol Hill" and "to show that many of the programs of the Nixon Admanistration have promoted economic instability, inflation and unemployment."

Each of the congressional leaders who addressed the Sheet Metal Workers was presented a union report urging the government to start a multi-million dollar building program to aid the economy as well as meet the growing public needs for public facilities.

The Sheet Metal Workers heard Kenneth Young, AFL-CIO assistant legislative director, charge that the Nixon Administration has launched a strenuous attack against organized labor to cover up its own glaring deficiencies.

Young also said the reason corporate profits are soaring at a time when 1.5 million have dropped below the poverty-income level in the past two years is because a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans in Congress have failed to close tax loopholes and enact needed reforms to aid low-income families.

Newspaper Guild Names New Counsel

The Newspaper Guild has appointed the Washington law firm of Bredhoff, Barr, Gottesman, Cohen & Peer as the union's legal counsel, Pres. Charles A Perlik announced.

Irving Leuchter, who handled the Guild's legal affairs for 25 years, died last August.

Senate Unit Urged to Bar Delay on 'No-Fault' Plan

The AFL-CIO strongly urged members of the Senate Commerce Committee to reject a move to delay consideration of the no-fault auto insurance bill until next year and "to report this legislation out of the committee in order that it might be considered by the full Senate."

"We can see no justification for further delays in enacting this vitally needed consumer legislation," said AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller in a letter to committee members.

Biemiller noted that the committee was scheduled to consider a motion to postpone action on the bill until after the start of the 93rd Congress.

"We in organized labor," Biemiller said, "are firmly convinced that this legislation, which utilizes a coordinated federal approach to auto insurance reform, is the only viable means to eliminate the abuses which have incessantly plagued the accident victim, policyholder and consumer."

Meany Vows All-Out Fight:

Forced Arbitration Plan Hit As Disguised Anti-Unionism

remote from the realities of collective bargaining, this proposal is."

And Meany warned senators supporting the legislation that it is a "delusion" that any form of compulsory arbitration will bring industrial peace.

Among workers affected, he testified, "there is a natural resistance to purported solutions handed down from on high, as opposed to solutions which emerge from a process in which those affected play an active role and which they therefore regard as legitimate."

Meany termed the "one-sided approach" of the proposed legislation typical of "the overall pro-employers, anti-labor thrust of this Administration."

The bills "show a lively concern for pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for employers who face strong unions." Meany contrasted this with the "benign neglect" of underpaid workers facing powerful employers such as J. P. Stevens in the textile industry.

And he warned employers that the political winds that make compulsory arbitration seem attractive under the Nixon Administration can change. Would the U.S. Chamber of Commerce be supporting a government-dictated settlement if a John Kennedy was in the White House and an Arthur Goldberg was Secretary of Labor? Meany wondered.

Time and again, Meany stressed his belief that strikes represent a failure of collective bargaining, that voluntary agreements to submit issues in dispute to arbitration display "admirable maturity and deserve approval and emulation."

He noted that a panel of AFL-CIO officials has been working with the American Arbitration Association in an exploration of a major expansion of voluntary arbitration.

But, Meany insisted, "strikes are the modest price we pay for the priceless advantage of free collective bargaining." And when strikes inconvenience the public, that too is part of the price of a free society.

Meany spelled out the facts of economic life to the Senate panel:

"In a free enterprise system, employes are hired and paid to produce goods and services people want. By definition, a successful strike is one that cuts off production or services that customers desire to utilize. The pressure that causes employers to compromise is lost sales. And every lost sale represents a third person who is damaged by being unable to buy what he wants to buy. The only strike that doesn't affect outsiders at all is a strike which doesn't cut off the employer's production. That, of course, is a losing strike."

In the rare cases where a strike actually threatens a national emergency, Meany said, "it is our view that the proper approach for Congress is to regulate the right to strike in a manner which will assure that sufficient goods and services are provided so that the strike's side effects will be limited to an acceptable level from the standpoint of safeguarding national health and safety."

That, he noted, is the approach adopted in the "selective strike" bill introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D-N.J.), who is chairman of both the full Senate Labor Committee and the subcommittee dealing with the legislation.

The Williams bill, backed by all of the railroad unions, would outlaw the present tactic by railroads of forcing a nationwide shutdown and congressional intervention whenever a union seeks to strike a single carrier.

Repeatedly, Meany rejected suggestions by senators that some of the procedures he advocated on a voluntary basis be written into legislation.

"If a man doesn't have a legal right to stop working," Meany insisted, "then he has no rights."

And "the right to negotiate with management is an empty promise without the right to strike." Employers, he said, "are not philanthropists" and rarely, if ever, comply with their employes' demands simply because they are just. By and large, employers pay no more than their employes' bargaining power requires them to."

While it is true that strikes demonstrate that the collective bargaining system is "imperfect," Meany stressed that "peace at any price is never an improvement on freedom."

GNP Inflation Rate Skyrockets to 6.2%

Inflation during the first three months of the year skyrocketed to an annual rate of 6.2 percent in terms of the Gross National Product, the Commerce Dept. reported.

The GNP, the dollar value of the nation's total output of goods and services, grew by $30.3 million, or 11.8 percent. But inflation accounted for most of the increase and was nearly triple the 1.7 percent annual rate posted during the final quarter of 1971.

The 6.2 percent pace for the first quarter was more than double the Nixon Administration's goal of 3 percent, or lower, by the end of 1972.

Abel Warns of Parallels To Pre-Depression Era

cies that assist this trend with complete disregard for possible effects on the cost of living."

Interest rates are high, with no visible effort to moderate them, and inflation persists with no serious effort on the part of the Administration "to take the steps needed to curb irresponsible decisions on the part of private business," Abel observed.

Most disturbing of all, he said, "there is little Administration interest on the two most alarming and fundamental economic trends now visible."

"The first of these is failure to make a dent in the unemployment total, which continues at the totally unacceptable level of 5 million persons unemployed and additional millions underemployed.

"The second is a trend toward movement of more and more of our national wealth from the average-income majority of the nation's population and the poor to the hands of the very rich and the big corporations, aided by discriminatory tax policies" promoted by the Nixon Administration

The consequence of these trends could be national economic disaster, Abel said, noting that those in power seem to have forgotten the lessons of the depression.

For a time, he noted, it seemed that the nation had learned its depression lesson as national economic policy engineered an encouraging shift of national income from the rich to the middle and lower-income classes during World War II.

"We managed to hold on to those gains for several decades," he said. "Now we are frittering them away, to the blithe tunes of 'The Game Plan March.' "

During the two-day session, the area of foreign trade and multinational corporations was of special concern to the IUD, which includes 60 unions representing more than 6 million workers.

A resolution adopted by the committee declared that "the American people cannot, in our own-self-interest, permit" the export of U.S. jobs and techonology "without regulation and remedial legislation. To do so is to threaten the jobs and living standards of millions of American workers."

The resolution called for swift passage of the Burke-Hartke Foreign Trade & Investment Act as a "realistic and workable means of improving our international trade balance."

Among other things, the bill would reform the rules of taxation of foreign operations by U.S. corporations to make them consistent with domestic tax regulations and eliminate the enticement of a foreign tax dodge.

The IUD committee also passed resolutions calling for tax reform, increasing the minimum wage to $2.50 hourly, more federal spending on public services and public works, and more equitable measures to combat inflation.

Minority Youths Prove Ability as Apprentices

The continued success of apprenticeship training programs during the past two years proves the ability of minority youngsters to make the grade without lowering apprenticeship standards, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Donald Slaiman declared.

Speaking at the 13th National Apprenticeship & Training Directors Conference, Slaiman noted that the percentage of youths from minority groups participating in building trades programs is larger than their percentage in the overall population.

He pointed out that their drop-out rate is less than that of whites and below the college drop-out rate. The progress of the program, Slaiman said, further dispels the myths that ghetto youngsters can't make it as apprentices and that standards should be lowered for their benefit, Slaiman said.

He noted that emphasis in the AFL-CIO Apprenticeship Outreach program has shifted to the trades that were least penetrated a decade ago.

"We're not concentrating on the trowel trades which used to have the most minorities, but the higher paying skilled trades—the iron workers, carpenters, sheet metal workers, elevator constructors, plumbers and electricians," Slaiman said.

These crafts have shown the largest increase in minority apprentices in recent years, Slaiman observed. As an example, he pointed out that of the 20,000 apprentices the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has in training, 2,000 are from minority groups.

The two-day conference was attended by 150 labor and management delegates. The conference is held annually in cooperation with the Manpower Administration's Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training.

Other speakers included Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson, Pres. Kenneth J. Brown of the Lithographers & Photoengravers and Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the Auto Workers.

Hodgson reported that minorities made up 9.8 percent of the 194,543 apprentices in training programs serviced by the Manpower Administration as of last July 1.

In the building and construction trades, which account for more than half of all apprentices, 10.8 percent were from the minorities. The number of minority apprentices in the building trades increased from 6,603 in January 1969 to 11,934 in July 1971.

National Issues Keyed to IUE Election Drive

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers announced a nationwide "Remember November" educational campaign to get every IUE member to the polls in the presidential election.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings told a news conference that the re-election of Nixon would be "a disaster for the nation" and that his visits with IUE locals around the country convinced him that union members thoroughly share that view.

Jennings said the Number 1 sentiment is "for getting that fellow out of the White House" and the Number 1 issue of concern is "the shambles he has made of the economy."

At 20 central locations, Jennings said, IUE local officers and stewards will take part in "Remember November" rallies—and carry the message into the shops and plants.

Nixon Health Bill Tied to Big Insurors

Meany Says Firms Wrote Own Benefits

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged that major insurance companies are the real authors of Pres. Nixon's health care proposal, and that they wrote it with their own benefits in mind—not those of the health consumer.

"There isn't one thing in the Administration bill that the insurance companies can't live with and get fat on," he told the 500 delegates to the Steelworkers Health Care Conference in Washington.

Meany said the entire labor movement is united behind the National Health Security measure introduced by Rep. Martha W. Griffiths (D-Mich.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) because it will bring American families the kind of care they need and can afford.

It is the only bill, he stressed, that meets the tests of providing quality care for all with cost controls, while emphasizing preventive medicine and reorganizing the existing wasteful system into a better coordinated program.

Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, who opened the two-day conference, said Health Security is an inevitable solution to the nation's health dilemma.

Private health insurance can no longer do the job, Abel stressed, because "it's too costly . . . wasteful. It does not provide preventive care and it ignores the poor."

Meany noted that another aspect of Health Security is the elimination of the "costly middleman—the insurance companies with their gluttonous profits, and their policies that only an attorney can read, and their high expenses for advertising, executive salaries and commissions."

Turning to the Nixon proposal, Meany said "there is real cause for concern when people like Clement Stone . . . are called in to help write a federal health insurance program."

He commented that Stone's father, W. Clement Stone, "has two claims to fame: He boasts about contributing a million dollars to Republican candidates, and secondly, his insurance company—Combined Insurance Co.—is notorious for writing policies that are long on profits and short on benefits."

Typical City Family Needs $10,971 to Live 'Modestly'

Hatch Act's Political Bar Called Unjust

Millions of Americans are being stripped of "their most basic democratic rights" because they work for government agencies, the AFL-CIO said in Senate testimony.

Thomas E. Harris, the federation's associate general counsel, urged major amendment of the Hatch Act, which bars federal employes and large numbers of local and state workers from active participation in most political activities.

He told the Senate Post Office & Service Committee that labor favors retaining and strengthening laws prohibiting government officials from misusing their positions for political purposes or "coercing" their subordinates to engage in political activities.

Actually, Harris said, "the main problem here is not the wording of the existing laws, but lack of enforcement. It is always the administration in office that violates these statutes, and no administration is zealous to prosecute itself."

But there is no justification for cutting off millions of ordinary government employes from political participation, Harris stressed.

"It is an imperative necessity for a democracy to have as large a percentage of its citizens take an active role in politics as can be induced to do so," Harris contended. "When

BLS Budgets Far Exceed Average Pay

The "typical" American urban family needs an above-average income to make ends meet, according to the Labor Dept.'s latest series of city family budgets.

As of last autumn—disregarding substantial price hikes since then—a family of four needed a $10,971 a year paycheck to maintain a moderate standard of living.

A more comfortable "higher" budget—still a long way from luxury living—carried a $15,905 price tag.

And the lowest of the three budgets—the one that the Bureau of Labor Statistics used to describe as "austere"—has risen to $7,214.

That's $365 more than the average factory production worker earns if he is fully employed 52 weeks a year, according to another set of BLS statistics.

The gap between average earnings and even a bare-bones standard of living indicates "what the pressures are on the average American family," AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger commented.

On a percentage basis, the 1971 budgets rose less than half of the 6.3 percent rise in the Consumer Price Index since the BLS last updated its budgets in the spring of 1970.

The percentage rise was highest for the lowest budget, and lowest for the high budget. On a dollar basis, the comparable 1970 budgets were priced at $6,960 for the low budget, $10,664 for the intermediate budget and $15,511 for the higher level.

The BLS cited two factors for the slower rise in the budget—a drop in personal income taxes (al-

In First 3 Months of '72:

Corporation Profits Surge to New High

American corporations earned more money in the first quarter of 1972 than in any previous three-month period in the nation's history, according to Business Week magazine which reported "a massive upsurge in corporate profits."

First-quarter profits were up 13 percent at General Electric, 22 percent at IBM, 27 percent at Westinghouse and by 29 percent at International Paper, just to name a few.

The magazine listed Chrysler's first-quarter profits at $36 million on record sales of $2.2 billion—a "smashing 231 percent increase in profits over the first three months of 1971."

The magazine quoted Republic Steel Pres. W. B. Boyer as saving his company was encouraged by first-quarter reports and then noted that Boyer made "what may be the understatement of the year" because Republic Steel posted first-quarter profits of 22 percent.

When the Commerce Dept. makes its official report of first-quarter earnings a month from now, Business Week predicted that it will probably be able to report that after taxes "U.S. business earned money at better than a $52 billion annual rate in the first quarter—up at least 15 percent from the first quarter of 1971, and more than $2 billion higher than the $49.8 billion rate of the final quarter of 1971.

"In other words, corporate profits are finally running ahead of the record pace of 1966, when earnings for the year hit $49.9 billion."

Probe Uncovers Bias In Rural Job Service

By David L. Perlman

The Labor Dept. acknowledged that its Rural Manpower Service is geared to the interests and prejudices of employers and too often has failed in its obligations to migrants and other farm workers.

Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson ordered a major shakeup to remedy widespread violations of law and policy confirmed by department investigators on inspection visits to 73 local offices in 18 states.

The investigation was touched off by formal charges made last year by the Migrant Legal Action Program in behalf of 16 organizations and 398 individual farm workers who documented 1,500 pages of complaints.

They contended that the present program is so discriminatory and employer-dominated that it does more harm than good and perpetuates "peonage."

While the Labor Dept. report did not concede a "conspiratorial pattern" of anti-worker actions, it acknowledged that even at best the rural manpower program "often works to the detriment of the long-term interests of the worker." And where mistakes are made through violations of policy, "it errs in favor

Trade Adjustment Aid No Substitute for Jobs

American workers don't consider trade adjustment assistance a substitute for lost jobs, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller termed the adjustment assistance program written into the 1962 Trade Expansion Act "an idea whose time has passed."

He told a House subcommittee dealing with foreign economic policy that the program "was designed as a stopgap for a small group of workers adversely affected by foreign competition, not for the critical onslaught we are suffering in which whole industries are being wiped out, often at the hand of the American corporations themselves."

Under the adjustment assistance program, which the Administration is seeking to expand as an alternative to the labor-supported Burke-Hartke trade bill, temporary benefits are available to workers whose

Meany Calls Health Security Vital, Ties Nixon Bill to Insurance Firms

Other insurance company executive got in on the writing act too, Meany charged.

"The big boys—Aetna, Occidental, Mutual of Omaha—want to make sure that they get a big piece of the national health insurance pie.

"And the Nixon Administration took care of them. Its health insurance bill reads like an insurance policy: deductibles, co-insurance, exclusions, limitations, high risks, low risks. In other words, business as usual, and the health consumer pays the bill."

Yet, he said, these same "respectable" companies who were called in to write the Administration's health care proposal are the ones who undermined Medicare.

Meany charged that the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare is "covering up" the full story on how companies squandered millions of dollars, padded expense accounts and payrolls, failed to check on fraud and "in general, have tried to ruin a program to help the nation's senior citizens."

He said Aetna was found to have made an estimated $3.2 million in duplicate payments in 28 months, and to have paid out another $1.3 million in Medicare funds that exceeded reasonable charges.

When those facts were first revealed, Meany said, the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare quickly reassured the public that the "errors" had been corrected.

"But no refunds were made," he said. "The overcharges were not returned to Medicare. Instead, the overcharges helped force an increase in the premiums and deductibles paid by the elderly."

Mutual of Omaha, Meany said spent nearly $1 million in cost over-runs and came up short about $5 million in overpayments to nursing homes and hospitals.

Occidental paid out about $3.2 million, he said, "to certain physicians and medical groups with past histories of defrauding Medicare, or who were under investigation for possible fraud, or had past histories of irregular billing practices."

He cited four other findings against Occidental that ran to hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Although these cases—and others—add up to millions of dollars, Meany observed, "the Administration bill would rely on insurance companies which have proven themselves incapable of administering even a limited national health program like Medicare."

Abel charged that the foes of real health security "seek only to continue to enrich themselves." And the defenders of the present medical system say that America has the best available, "but I say it is only available to part of American society"—not to all.

He said the vicious cycle of rising costs under the existing health insurance system will only cause higher premium payments.

And he pointed out that even now many Steelworkers cannot take advantage of early retirement programs because the current cost of medical insurance conversion is so high it reduces the retiree's ability to buy housing and food.

Abel noted that there are a number of alternative proposals to Health Security before Congress—all claimed by their backers as the right answer to the health care problem.

"But they are not," he stressed. Only Health Security will meet the needs of all Americans, he said.

Other speakers scheduled to address the delegates included Sen. Kennedy, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller and Max Fine, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance.

Unions at California U. Swell Protest to 3,000

Berkeley, Calif.—Nearly 3,000 University of California employes are protesting the university's refusal to bargain on contracts and a move to cut wages of some workers.

The massive protest was touched off Apr. 14 as about 600 building trades craftsmen left their jobs at the Berkeley Campus and the Livermore Radiation Laboratories. By Apr. 17, about 1,200 members of several other unions joined the picket lines. The protest swelled to 3,000 Apr. 20 as 1,000 workers at the university's San Francisco medical center also went out.

More than two dozen local unions are now involved.

The Alameda County Building Trades Council and the Central Labor Council said the protest centers on four key issues:

- The university's refusal to match prevailing wages, although it has a long-standing agreement on such matters.
- Its refusal to agree to simple grievance procedures with neutral arbitration.
- An attempt to cut wages of building trades members about 50 percent by means of a special rate for "maintenance" work.
- Refusal to sign contracts with the unions.

Although Alameda County Superior Judge Robert Bostick issued an anti-picketing injunction against the unions, the protest has continued at the Berkeley and Livermore installations.

The Alameda AFL-CIO, in an effort to head off the confrontation, called on state and university officials who have power to make decisions in the dispute to take part in public negotiations in an open meeting at the Berkeley campus.

But Gov. Ronald Reagan, University Pres. Hitch and university regents failed to make an appearance. Berkeley Chancellor Albert H. Bowker, who was present, admitted that he had no authority to act on a settlement.

Members of the building trades earlier had unanimously rejected the university's proposal which would have seperated them into "maintenance" and construction worker classifications with lower pay for "maintenance" workers.

Oakland Athletics Won't Cross Lines

Oakland, Calif.—The Oakland Athletics baseball team, which had an exhibition game scheduled on the University of California Berkeley campus, refused to cross a picket line set up by university employes.

The Associated Press reported the game with the university's Golden Bears was switched to the Oakland Coliseum at the request of the Athletics, who themselves had been involved in a dispute with major league owners over pension funding.

At Department Convention:

Rail Shopcrafts Set Key Contract Goals

Chicago—Officers of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. representing six shopcraft unions were directed by the department's 15th convention to seek a 30 percent wage increase in the next round of bargaining.

The nearly 200 delegates to the three-day meeting also called for a 25 percent night work differential. They set long-range bargaining goals for the department to include a four-day, 32-hour work week at 40 hours pay, more paid holidays and improved vacations of up to eight weeks after 25 years of service. The goals also include a 13-week paid vacation every fifth year.

President James E. Yost and Sec.-Treas. Paul J. Marnell were elected to their first full four-year terms without opposition. They assumed office in October 1969 following the retirement of Michael Fox as president and Howard Pickett as secretary-treasurer.

In a series of resolutions, the delegates:

- Urged improvements in the railroad retirement system.
- Opposed the Nixon Administration's bill to impose compulsory arbitration on the transportation industry.
- Supported the AFL-CIO stand against the Administration's economic controls program and the AFL-CIO resignation of four labor representatives from the Pay Board.

One resolution pledged the Railway Employes Dept. to give "vigorous and absolute support" to any program to defeat the re-election bid of Pres. Nixon.

In an address to the delegates, James C. Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, lashed out at the White House economic program's failures and at the mismanagement of the nation's railroads by their owners.

"The railroads need attention from the roadbed up," Gildea said, "and their labor policies and practices need an overhaul more than anything else."

He said the AFL-CIO intends to fight attempts to pass compulsory arbitration legislation every step of the way.

Gildea reviewed the wage freeze, Phase 2 and labor's withdrawal from the Pay Board and said:

"In the months ahead, labor will be mounting the greatest voter education and voter registration program in history.

"If we do our work well, we can get this nation back on the tracks and take up the job of building a free and just society where it was dropped when Mr. Nixon took office."

Another speaker, Assistant Labor Sec. W. J. Usery, Jr., said that "nobody wants compulsory arbitration, but it's coming down the track unless labor and management work hard to avoid it" through responsible collective bargaining.

'No-Fault' Insurance Clears First Hurdle

Supporters of "no-fault" auto insurance won an important first round in the Senate Commerce Committee as opponents abandoned an effort to sidetrack the legislation for at least another year.

The labor-backed bill, sponsored by Senators Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) and Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.), still faces a gauntlet of amendments—and the opposition of a strong lobby made up of lawyers who handle accident and injury cases.

But it passed its initial hurdle with ease.

The committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Norris Cotton (N.H.), had introduced a motion to postpone action on the Hart-Magnuson bill until the 93rd Congress. The showdown vote was set for Apr. 26.

Meanwhile, labor and consumer groups worked to defeat the Cotton maneuver.

"We can see no justification for further delays in enacting this vitally needed consumer legislation," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller wrote members of the Commerce Committee.

A federal law that would compensate victims of auto accidents promptly and equitably "is the only viable means to eliminate the abuses which have incessantly plagued the accident victim, policyholder and consumer," he declared.

As the committee members filed into the room, informed observers were predicting 14 votes against the Cotton amendment on the 18-member committee.

But it never came to a vote. Cotton withdrew his delaying amendment and the committee prepared to move ahead with the mark-up stage of the bill.

In other congressional developments:

- The House approved a catch-all supplemental appropriations bill that includes funds for military and civilian pay raises previously voted by Congress.

It also includes a $7.7 million appropriation to enable the United States to maintain its good standing in the International Labor Organization. The amount covers a year of back payments that Congress had withheld last year.

- The Senate opened debate on a fair credit billing law that had been so distorted in committee that its original sponsor, Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), disowned it as a bill to aid banks, not consumers. A series of amendments were pending in an effort to remedy major defects.
- The House Ethics Committee approved a resolution aimed at stripping Rep. John Dowdy (D-Tex.) of his congressional voting rights.

Dowdy was convicted of taking a bribe and is appealing his 18-month sentence and $25,000 fine.

The resolution, which must still be cleared by the Rules Committee, expresses the "sense of the House" that a member convicted of a serious crime should abstain from participating in committees or voting on the House floor. Dowdy, a member of the conservative bloc in the House, is not running for re-election but his wife is entered in the May 6 Texas primary in a bid to succeed him.

At Operating Engineers Convention:

Construction Industry Panel Draws Praise from Wharton

By Tom Castor

Operating Engineers Pres. Hunter P. Wharton praised the actions of the Construction Industry Stabilization Commission in his keynote address to the union's 75th anniversary convention, but told the more than 900 delegates that the Price Commission has been "ineffective" and the Pay Board "most unfair."

"We are pleased to this date that the CISC is still functioning" despite efforts "to eliminate its independent status," Wharton said.

But he stressed that the CISC, which rules on wage settlements in the construction industry, had succeeded because Pres. Nixon "appointed construction people to handle construction problems."

"I think therein lies the secret of many of the boards and panels that are appointed. They appoint people who have no relationship whatsoever to the problems that they have to make decisions on," he said.

In contrast to the CISC, Wharton said the Price Commission does not work and the Pay Board has "made rulings most unfair to those whose wage negotiations" required its approval.

Wharton was elected to his fourth, full four-year term as head of the IUOE which has grown to a membership of more than 400,000 craftsmen.

He was re-elected by acclamation along with Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman and 10 vice presidents.

An 11th vice presidency—created by the delegates through constitutional amendment — was won by Rowland G. Hill of Toronto, the first Canadian to serve on the executive board.

The IUOE represents 27,000 Canadian workers and the 11th vice presidency was created specifically to give Canadian members a greater opportunity for election to top posts.

Delegates gave their approval to the first increase in per capita payments to the international since 1964 — the second in 42 years.

The per capita was $1.50, of which the international union received 95 cents for the general fund and the defense fund. Effective this July, it will be increased 25 cents with the international receiving 15 cents of the increase and the remaining 10 cents to be paid into the general pension fund. The constitutional amendment also calls for an additional 15-cent increase in July of 1974 which will be distributed as needed by the executive board.

Speaking on behalf of the per capita proposal, Wharton said that "when you review the increases in activity of your international union, I believe you can only agree that much has been accomplished at a minimum cost."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, addressing the delegates during the first day of the four-day session, focused on the economic crisis confronting the nation and declared that "you're not going to have anything that resembles prosperity in this country" until the workers get their fair share of what they produce.

"Prosperity for the big corporations does not spell prosperity for the 200 million people of America," Meany said, adding that organized labor doesn't feel that increases in the Gross National Product and billion-dollar profits are "a very good measure" of prosperity in a democracy.

"It's the old theory that prosperity begins at the top. And if you keep the corporations wealthy everything is going to be OK.

"Well, we have another way of measuring the wealth of America. We in the trade union movement have always used the human measuring rod—that the wealth of a country is determined by the conditions of life of the great mass of the people in the country. . .

"And in the final analysis, that's the factor that determines wealth: Mass purchasing power in the hands of the great mass of the people."

Meany said the objectives of the labor movement are the same today as when that movement was founded. He said organized labor believes in production, profits and a return on investment capital and that—in essence—it believes in the system.

"But we want a fair share of the wealth that that system produces," Meany said.

Wharton, in his keynote address, also offered some criticism of the building trades, including the Operating Engineers, charging that failure of productivity to keep pace with wages actually was aiding the growth of non-union construction.

But he added, that in his judgment, it is not too late "to recover our position."

"Labor must rededicate itself to pride of workmanship—a fair day's work for a fair day's pay," he said.

Wharton emphasized that he was not singling out local leaders but rather talking about the construction trades as a whole.

"I know many of you leaders here today are extremely proud of your achievements over the past few years in your negotiation of agreements.

"The large increases you gained for your respective memberships was a fine job done, but I wonder how we received those increases and what they do to our future," he said. And he maintained that in many instances, contractors agreed to union demands simply because they had no alternative.

Pres. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. also warned delegates that non-union construction has become a matter of growing concern.

He said non-union contractors appear to be in a position to outbid union jobbers "no matter how well established."

The BCTD has been trying to combat the non-union contractor by putting the union contractor in a better position to compete, Bonadio said, citing the recent agreement between the department and the National Contractors Association to seek reasonable work rules.

The agreement is to be the subject of "recommendation to the local unions for inclusion in the local agreements."

"The relationship between the contractor and the union should not be the same as that between a bull and a toreador," Bonadio said.

In other action, the delegates reelected three trustees of the international and created position for two additional trustees.

Elected to the new posts were Joseph L. Hadley of Charleston, W.Va., and J. A. McMahon of Houston.

OPERATING ENGINEERS Pres. Hunter P. Wharton delivers keynote address to his union's 29th convention which brought more than 900 delegates to Washington. It was the largest convention in the history of the 75-year-old craft union.

Prices Continue Rise, Quirk Keeps CPI Even

An apparent statistical quirk left the Consumer Price Index unchanged in March—after seasonal adjustment—but AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pointed out that "it's the price tag, not a statistical quirk that counts."

On an unadjusted basis, the index rose by two-tenths of 1 percent, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The unadjusted rise represents actual price increases consumers must pay.

"With price increases registered for every major component of consumer prices, every shopper knows that every day, in every way, it's costing more to live," Meany said.

The BLS report for March showed that the Consumer Price Index rose to 124.0, meaning that consumers were paying $12.40 for the same goods and services that cost them $10 in 1967. In terms of 1957-59 dollars, it now costs $14.43 for the same market basket that cost $10 then.

The prices of meat, poultry and fish continued to rise, increasing four-tenths of 1 percent during March, following February's increase of 4.6 percent—which caused grocery store prices to post their largest one-month increase in 14 years.

The absence of any increase in the adjusted CPI marked the first time it had not gone up since November 1966.

But this appeared to be due to a statistical aberration since the index's three component categories—food, other commodities and services—all showed increases.

The cost of services as well as the cost of food went up two-tenths of 1 percent, and other commodities rose at a rate of three-tenths of 1 percent.

BLS officials explained the seeming contradiction by noting that the so-called all-items index is computed separately from the three component indexes, and the absence of change in the overall CPI while the three components rose was the result of rounding off figures.

The BLS said that after seasonal adjustment, the CPI showed an annual rate of increase of 3.7 percent for the first four full months since the wage-price freeze as against 4.1 percent during the six months preceding the freeze.

The BLS said that more than 40 percent of the three-tenths of 1 percent increase for commodities other than food was attributable to higher prices for clothing and footwear, especially in spring apparel.

Real spendable earnings for the average worker with three dependents rose 54 cents a week during March to a level of $94.84.

According to the BLS, real spendable earnings were 3.7 percent higher than a year ago and represented "the largest year-to-year increase . . . for any March since the series became available on a monthly basis in 1964."

But the bureau noted that part of this rise "stems from reductions in the federal income tax liability for 1972."

N.Y. Telephone Pact Approved By Pay Board

The Pay Board approved a 15.3 percent wage increase in the first year of a three-year contract for 38,000 New York Telephone Co. employes who are represented by 23 Communications Workers local unions.

The full board approved the raise on the grounds that vetoing it would result in a "gross inequity." Although the increase exceeds Phase 2 guidelines, it is similar to an increase provided in a nationwide telephone workers' settlement that took effect just before the wage-price freeze began Aug. 15.

The board's approval came after it had held up the increase for further study. The Pay Board's three-man subcommittee earlier had approved the 15.3 percent raise, but the settlement was challenged by other members of the board.

The New York workers won their agreement after a seven-month strike which began July 14.

Last February, the strikers agreed to a pact providing a 33.5 percent increase in base pay over three years, bringing senior craftsmen to $259 weekly in the final year.

The Haves and Have-Nots

ONE OF THE FIRST STEPS toward the nullification of democracy—toward keeping the control of their economic destinies out of the hands of the many and in the hands of the few—began a long time ago when economics was made into a profession; that is, a mystery understood only by a few witch doctors, complicated by numerology, equations and other magical symbols.

This created a new elite—the Friedmans, the Burnses, the Galbraiths, the Gordons, the Hellers, the Okuns and the Steins—the professors who never talk to students; who do their stretches in the government and then sell their eminence to business or its foundations; who preach wage controls, then raise their own lecture fees from one thousand to twenty-five hundred a shot for the same old canned speeches.

Each has his own bag of spells and nostrums and they agree on nothing except that wages must be restrained, profits must rise and capital must accumulate. They attach themselves to the captains and the kings, to rising politicians and to the princes of industry.

You don't really have to be a great pundit or soothsayer to understand the economics of political power today. It is still the same as it has been for centuries and it is very simple and basic. It is still the age-old conflict between the many and the few, the haves and the have-nots. The haves want more and they will use the power of the government to help them get it and keep it and they will use their economic stooges and their control of the press to justify it and to declare it good and a contribution to the public interest. They will use that power to keep labor down, to keep the outsiders out, and the minorities minor, and to sow division in the ranks of the opposition.

What is going on today at the hands of the Nixon Administration is a massive redistribution of wealth and resources, away from those who need it most, away from public programs of the highest social priority, and into the hands of big business and the most affluent elements of our society.

IN BUSINESS for himself, we have George Wallace. He is making some hay of his own with the economic issue. He is combing his hair differently, shining his shoes, polishing up his accent and his language and acting like the kindest, gentlest Massa a black man ever had. He is talking about taxes and welfare and the problems of the little man.

Many, if not most of the problems of the cities of the North, of New York and Washington and Chicago and Detroit, are the legacy of the cruelties and the injustices of the Wallaces of Alabama and Mississippi.

Poverty, unemployment, bad housing and their consequences in the ghettos of the North exist in large part because those Southern states denied their duty to their black citizens—because they drove them from the land and from their housing and denied them jobs or a decent measure of relief, or freedom or justice or dignity in the place where they were born and raised, and might otherwise have preferred to live.

The George Wallaces of this country are the real culprits, the real authors of all the social and economic problems of the poor black populations of the cities of the North—they and all of those politicians of every part of the country who have failed to provide and enforce uniform minimum standards of concern and justice and decency and human dignity and freedom in all parts of this nation.

Harrisburg Trial New Proof Of Conspiracy Law's Futility

By John P. Roche

ASIDE FROM ITS IMPACT on J. Edgar Hoover's ego—which will hardly keep anyone else awake nights—the outcome of the Berrigan trial in Harrisburg provided a clear lesson to those concerned with the vitality of American democracy.

It demonstrated the good sense of the average American jury, particularly when confronted with the legal flypaper known as the law of conspiracy.

Those who have survived this column over the past years will recall my repeated condemnation of the conspiracy indictments against Dr. Spock, the Chicago seven, and various other troublesome characters, including the Trotskyites and Communists earlier brought to ground by the Smith Act.

For taking this position, I have received a good deal of criticism as being "soft on subversion." The difficulty is that the critics simply don't know what they are talking about.

The Communist leadership, for example, was not indicted for trying to overthrow the government of the United States. The grand jury brought its membership up for "conspiring to teach and advocate" the forceful overthrow of the government.

Any time the Communists, the Minutemen or any other group actually want to try to overthrow the government, you arrest them for criminal attempt. Not for conspiracy, but for committing an overt, felonious act.

Conspiracy is a lazy prosecutor's rap. Many years ago, for example, a group of alleged Mafiosi were attending a birthday party in upstate New York. The police descended, arrested them and inquired what they had been discussing besides birthday presents. Each one invoked the Fifth Amendment's guarantee against self-incrimination. They were then indicted, tried and convicted for conspiring to commit unknown crimes—the proof being that they had all taken the Fifth. Fortunately this judicial monstrosity was overruled at the appellate level.

The evidence in the Berrigan case was hardly much better. I have been teaching constitutional law for over 20 years, and I confess that I have never been so utterly baffled at the alleged linkages that presumably brought these seven people into the conspiracy net.

Indeed, when a group of students asked me to explain what was going on, to elucidate the whole notion of "vicarious guilt," I ended up covering a blackboard with dotted lines—and I still couldn't fit Eqbal Ahmad into the picture. (Interestingly enough, after the Harrisburg jurors had been out a while, they sent for a blackboard!)

POLITICALLY SPEAKING, the defendants at Harrisburg are on a different wave length from me. But that is irrelevant to the point. For months they have been harassed by the United States government and have had to raise money to defend themselves against a patently bum rap.

All we have left to show for it is the conviction of Father Phil and Sister Elizabeth for bootlegging letters out of prison—via an FBI plant, who struck me as a prize provocateur.

Which leads me to three recommendations to the President of the United States, who I hope shares my concern with this outrageous demeaning of the judicial process.

First, exercise executive clemency and let Father Philip Berrigan and Sister Elizabeth McAlister out of jail: compassion is in order.

Second, direct the Dept. of Justice to put the conspiracy statutes into the museum of common law aberrations, where they richly belong.

And, third, retire J. Edgar Hoover before he gets the machinery wound up for another ego-trip to conspiracy-land.

Meany Letter to Times:

Record Proves Nixon Policy Favors Profits, Hurts Worker

The following letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appeared in the Apr. 21, 1972, New York Times in answer to a story published by the Times on wage-price statistics.

YOUR APR. 8 story about the recent trend of wage increases reports that "wages have risen 3 percent in the four months since the wage-price freeze ended, or at an annual rate of 9 percent, the Labor Department reported." This interpretation is a distortion of the actual record.

The story is based on a new index of hourly earnings for production and nonsupervisory employes in private, nonfarm employment, prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The index is far from precise. It tends to overstate increases in wage rates.

In its description of the index, BLS states that "it is not a pure measure of wage-rate change, since it is affected by such factors as fluctuations of earnings under incentive plans, changes in the proportion of low- and high-paid workers within establishments, and overtime variations outside of manufacturing."

Nevertheless, let us examine the trend, shown by this index.

In the six months from February 1971 to August 1971, the month the wage freeze was installed, the index rose 3.5 percent or an annual rate of 7 percent. During the three-month freeze, August to November, this index increased five-tenths of 1 percent or a yearly rate of 2 percent. In this period, deferred wage increases, under previously negotiated agreements could not be put into effect. Wage increases in newly negotiated settlements also had to be postponed.

In the month following the freeze, both deferred increases and newly negotiated settlements began to go into effect. As a result, the rise in the index from November to December was 1.4 percent or a yearly rate of 16.8 percent. This was a one-month wage "bulge," following a three-month freeze.

Since December, the index shows that wages have actually been held down, within range of the Pay Board's 5.5 percent wage control standard. In the three months, December 1971 to March 1972, the index rose only 1.5 percent, a yearly rate of 6 percent.

This record is substantially different from your politically tilted story of a 9 percent yearly rate of wage increases. It shows that wages are under rather effective control. This record of controlled wages is in sharp contrast with the record on prices and profits.

In the three months, December to March, when wage increases were kept within range of the Pay Board's control standard, the Wholesale Price Index rose at an annual rate of 5.1 percent according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. That is twice as fast as the Administration's 2.5 percent price-increase standard for its so-called price control program. Although the March figure for the Consumer Price Index is not yet available, the increase in consumer prices in the three months up to February was 4.9 percent, also twice the rate of the price-increase standard.

WHILE INCREASES in average hourly earnings of workers are being effectively held down, productivity is now rising again at a rather rapid pace. In the fourth quarter of 1971, output per manhour in the private economy rose at a yearly rate of 3.4 percent. In the first quarter of this year, it probably continued to rise at a somewhat comparable rate.

Unit labor costs have been increasing slowly—although down one-third to one-half from the rate of 1969 and 1970. But prices continue to rise at a fast clip. This is an important factor in the very sharp rise of profits, which your own financial pages report.

So the record substantiates the AFL-CIO case. Wage increases are being held down close to the Administration's wage-control standard. But prices are not effectively controlled; they are rising about twice as fast as the government's price-control standard. And profits have begun to soar, without even the pretense of controls.

The Administration's policy is heavily loaded against the worker and consumer, in favor of business profits, particularly the profits of the huge corporations and conglomerate giants. The proof is in the record.

Phase 2 Failure:

Consumer Frustration Grows Over Lack of Price Controls

THE STEADY RISE of living costs during eight months of so-called price controls has created a great credibility gap and growing frustration among consumers as they realize retail prices are not controlled, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis declared.

The Administration should have told "the Amercan people right off the bat that there simply were . . . no retail price controls," Perlis said, rather than lead consumers to believe that there were. He said that with pressures building among union members and consumer groups all over the country, picketing and demonstrations like those recently in New York City may well spread to other cities.

Perlis, who heads organized labor's nationwide price monitoring effort, said the AFL-CIO has no plans to organize protests in reaction to the failure of Phase 2 price controls, but stressed that "when people have had it up to here . . . they're going to express those feelings in their own fashion."

"I think a great credibility gap has developed in this country in that people have been misled into believing that there are retail price controls," Perlis said.

Although there may be profit margin controls, Perlis emphasized that these are "vastly different from retail price controls," and that all a consumer need do is go into a supermarket or drug store to see that "there are no retail price controls."

As an example, Perlis cited a recent AFL-CIO survey in a Washington, D.C. supermarket of 50 processed food items—items that supposedly are subject to controls.

All but two of the items had increased in price, some by as much as 20 cents, Perlis said, emphasizing again that "it's not only raw items that have gone up—meats, vegetables, fruits—but also, controlled items—food items—have gone up."

"From a social point of view," Perlis said, the Administration's so-called price control program "has been a total disaster. You have a lack of equilibrium, unfairness" and "a lack of firmness. You have a program that is balanced in favor of big business and against the average consumer . . ."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Perlis said that union price-watchers "have registered thousands and thousands of complaints with the Internal Revenue Service." But, he noted, he hasn't found a single case where the IRS informed the monitors that a complaint was really justified, despite repeated attempts to find out the disposition of such complaints.

"THE WHOLE OPERATION is so shrouded in mystery that people simply don't have any access to specifics," he asserted, adding that "there is no freedom of information, as far as Phase 2 is concerned."

Perlis said the Price Commission has been assigned "an incredible job," but hasn't been given "the tools" to carry it out. He said that while he is sure that Chairman C. Jackson Grayson's "motivations are sound . . . he is like Willie Loman the salesman, who has taken to the road with a shoddy product, and therefore his pitch is not credible."

LABOR ECONOMISTS are not at all happy over the course that has been followed by the Nixon Administration in its handling of statistics that are vital not only to workers but to the country as a whole.

The first public break in the historical handling of these figures by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which was founded in 1884, came last year when traditional briefings for the press on unemployment were abruptly halted. Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson and the BLS briefing spokesman differed in their interpretations of the figures.

The BLS spokesman expressed the opinion that they were not exactly encouraging; Hodgson at the same moment was telling the press at the White House that they were proof of how successful Administration policies were. The proof of the pudding, of course, is that a year later the unemployment rate, which was then 5.8 percent, is now 5.9 percent.

There have also been other changes in the handling of these vital statistics that have become a source of deep concern to the labor movement in general and the Labor Research Advisory Committee to the BLS in particular.

The latest development that is making labor "uneasy," as the April issue of the IBEW Journal of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers makes clear, is a change in the format for collecting and interpreting the Consumer Price Index and the Consumer Expenditure Surveys which are the bases for the widely known —and used—low-, middle-, and upper-income family budgets.

These budgets report on the quantities and kinds of goods and services required to maintain a family of four on a certain standard of living. They have been invaluable in setting income standards in collective bargaining and so are of immense importance to all workers, union or otherwise. Businessmen don't like them. Any tampering with the long-established way of handling these statistics—how they are gathered and how they are interpreted—obviously must cause "uneasiness" to labor.

The latest action of the Nixon Administration is to shift the gathering on these statistics from the BLS to the Census Bureau under a program worked out by the Office of Management & Budget. The Administration claims that the move is in the interest of economy. It says that now that the 1970 Census is over, there are many staff people who will have to be discharged, that the Census Bureau has the machinery to do the job, and that money will be saved.

These claims are far from convincing in the view of the Labor Research Advisory Committee, which was set up many years ago to advise on the methodology of the BLS in gathering and analyzing government statistics.

LABOR OBJECTIONS were based on a number of factors. As expressed in a thorough-going analysis in the IBEW Journal and in further analysis by members of the Advisory Committee, there is no sound reason for splitting the Consumer Expenditure Survey into two functions. The BLS, it is pointed out, has specialized knowledge of the field and has demonstrated over the years its capacity to make necessary changes in its methodology and its interpretation of the statistics it has gathered.

There is great labor concern over the accuracy of future Census figures; that not enough time will be devoted to gathering of the statistics; that continuity of gathering the statistics will be lost; that the Census Bureau does not have he "know-how" to make needed changes in the new types of information that are important and that the whole process of statistical reporting by the government will be seriously undermined.

"The accuracy of one of the nation's most important economic indicators and the financial fair health of millions of U.S. workers are at stake," the IBEW Journal says.

CONSUMER FRUSTRATION is mounting as the Administration's "great credibility gap" on Phase 2 price controls widens, AFL-CIO Community Services Director Leo Perlis, center, declared on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Dale McFeatters, left, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Frank Swoboda of Business Week magazine. The program is aired Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

BLS Budgets Exceed Average Pay:

City Family of Four Needs $10,971 to Live 'Modestly'

though in the case of the low-budget family, the rise in social security taxes offset this), and the fact that most of the possessions of the model families were assumed to have been bought some years ago when prices were lower.

Ironically, this resulted in a proportionately heavier bite out of the paycheck of the lower-budget family.

Its rent costs rose, while housing costs of the two higher-budget families showed less of an increase since they were assumed to already own their homes. And the costs of public transportation used by the lower-level family went up higher than for families who had purchased a car when prices were lower.

All of the budgets assume a family made up of a 38-year-old husband working full time, a nonworking wife, a son of 13 and a daughter of 8.

The figures cited are for the national city average, but the actual cost figures vary widely. Thus, the low budget is 153 percent of the national average in Anchorage, Alaska, but only 87 percent of the average in southern towns of 2,500 to 50,000 population.

For a worker receiving the federal minimum wage of $1.60 an hour, there was an ever-widening gap between his annual full-time earnings of $3,328 a year and the low-level family budget.

The lag was under $2,700 when the $1.60 wage floor went into effect, $3,215 in the spring of 1969 —and $3,885 as of last autumn.

The Nixon Administration has been increasingly embarrassed at the gap between its family budget needs and average worker earnings—to say nothing of the vastly wider chasm separating the minimum wage level.

As a result, this may be the last BLS updating of its city worker family budgets—at least in present form.

BLS Commissioner Geoffrey H. Moore last year told advisory groups that his agency "proposed" to scrap the budget series and replace it with data showing how families at different income levels in different cites actually spend ther money.

Members of the trade union advisory committee to the BLS strongly opposed such a change and charged that the proposal appeared to be politically motivated.

The Bureau of National Affairs, an authoritative news service, undertook to update the budget figures to reflect price changes since last autumn when the BLS survey was compiled.

Using the same ratio of "consumption items" as the Labor Dept. budgets, and applying the cost-of-living figures for last month, the intermediate "modest but adequate" budget would require an $11,000 annual income, the higher budget would be priced at $16,100 and the low budget would come to $7,300.

For the middle-level intermediate budget, as of last autumn, the four-person family would be spending $2,532 for food, $2,638 for housing, $964 for transportation, $1,196 for clothing and personal care, $612 for medical care, and $684 for other consumption items. Taxes would take up the largest portion of the remainder.

Families in metropolitan areas would need an average of 14 percent more income than families in smaller cities. And in larger cities, even leaving out such high cost areas as Anchorage and Honolulu, the middle-level budget ranged from $9,408 in Austin, Tex., to $12,819 in Boston.

Industrial Engineering Institutes Slated in July

Three specialized areas of instruction will be offered at the 1972 AFL-CIO Union Industrial Engineering Institutes at the University of Wisconsin in Madison, July 17-28.

Each of the two-week courses is designed to provide an opportunity for contiuing study in the complex field of industrial engineering and its relationship to collective bargaining.

The three institutes are on Establishing Work Standards, Job Evaluation and Related Problems, and Collective Bargaining of Work Measurement Problems.

The institutes are sponsored jointly by the federation's Dept. of Research and the University of Wisconsin School for Workers. The registration deadline is June 19.

The Institute on Establishing Work Standards will cover the theories, assumption and applications of stop watch time study, standard data, work sampling and predetermined motion systems and their relationship to wage incentives.

In the course on Job Evaluation and Related Problems, students will receive instruction on various types of job evaluation, focusing primarily on systems commonly used in industry.

The Institute on Collective Bargaining of Work Measurement Problems is an advanced course for union representatives who have completed the Work Standards institute. Persons who have completed two former courses—Time Study and Wage Incentives or Synthetic Standard System—are also qualified for the advanced institute.

Tuition for each course is $90. It includes the costs of instruction, textbooks and other materials.

Additional information is available from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research or the University of Wisconsin School for Workers.

Louisiana Labor Fights Move to Limit Lobbying

Baton Rouge, La.—Delegates to the 17th annual convention of the Louisiana AFL-CIO voiced strong opposition to a proposal to remove lobbyists from the chambers of the state legislature.

State Pres. Victor Bussie said the campaign to bar lobbyists was mounted because the Louisiana AFL-CIO "has represented the working men and women of the state too well in the halls of the legislature."

Bussie made a 15-minute plea for passage of the resolution opposing the move, and the 500 delegates gave it unanimous approval.

The resolution contained a warning to legislators noting "we do not feel that any legislator can be considered a friend of labor who votes to remove the voters from the chamber of the legislature or votes to change the area of House or Senate chambers which is accessible to the voters, or restricts the right of voters to confer with legislators in the chambers of the House or Senate except for the area within the present existing rulings."

"This right to confer with legislators during legislative sessions has been exercised by thousands of Louisiana voters throughout the years and has been beneficial to the legislators as well as voters," the resolution stated.

"It has not interfered with orderly legislative process as some have claimed but has instead caused it to be more democratic and representative of the views of the people."

In other action, delegates reelected Bussie and Sec.-Treas. Emile J. Bourg and passed other resolutions putting delegates on record as:

- Opposing any attempt to abolish teacher tenure.
- Condemning of the Nixon Administration's economic policies.
- Calling for legislation that would require that Louisiana labor and materials be used to construct any facility granted a 10-year tax exemption.

Among the speakers at the four-day convention was presidential hopeful Hubert Humphrey who told delegates that the Nixon Administration's mismanagement of the American economy had made the nation second rate.

Humphrey charged that Nixon "has cost the people $150 billion in lost income."

Last year, he said, $30 billion left the country and went overseas where it was used by foreign subsidiaries of American corporations to produce goods to be sold in America.

"They've stolen your money and left America with 5.5 million unemployed," Humphrey declared.

Strikes Increase Under Compulsory Arbitration

Victoria, B.C. — Ernest Hall, New Democratic Party member for Surrey, told the British Columbia legislature here that compulsory arbitration causes more strikes than it prevents.

Taking the figures from four countries over the last 13 years—Britain, Sweden, Canada, and Australia—he cited statistics that the number of days lost per worker through strike action was highest in Australia where there are labor courts and compulsory arbitration.

Trade Act Adjustment Aid Viewed As 'Idea Whose Time Has Passed'

jobs are abolished because of higher imports resulting from U.S. tariff concessions.

If the Tariff Commission certifies that trade concessions are in fact the cause of the layoffs—and union witnesses noted that for the first seven years of the law's existence every petition for relief was denied—workers are entitled to partial pay for up to one year of unemployment, coupled with retraining.

But, Biemiller emphasized, the massive job loss problems of the present era do not stem from competition but from "a substitution of foreign production" and "wholesale removal of entire industries, with no comparable job replacement."

Multinational firms, he noted, may manufacture components in one nation, assemble them in another "where labor is 12 cents an hour" and then sell them in the United States under an American brand name.

Biemiller spelled out the key provisions of the Burke-Hartke bill which, he said, "can provide both immediate remedies and long-term answers to the inrush of imports, the outflow of capital and technology."

He stressed its emphasis on closing tax loopholes that have encouraged U.S. corporations and multinationals to produce goods in other countries.

The quota provisions of the legislation, Biemiller said, establish a "sliding door" approach to imports that would "replace the wide open door that is currently periling the United States as a manufacturing nation and would be a healthy alternative to the closed door of the early Thirties."

Steelworkers Legislative Director Jack Sheehan and the union's international affairs director, Meyer Bernstein, followed Biemiller to the witness table and added specific criticisms of the trade adjustment program.

Sheehan told the subcommittee that even a more effective trade adjustment assistance program "cannot be an adequate substitute for an effective trade policy—no more than can a federal unemployment compensation system be substituted for a vigorous economy."

Bernstein told the House panel that the Tariff Commission in acting on requests for adjustment assistance "moves in a mysterious way its labor to perform."

Until Nov. 1, 1969, he noted, it rejected every single petition for relief that was filed.

Of subsequent petitions filed by the Steelworkers, "those which were considered by the commission in 1970 were approved; and those which it received in 1971 were, for the most part, rejected."

Yet, he contended, "the workers on whose behalf we filed petitions in 1971 were just as entitled to benefits as those who were fortunate enough to have suffered earlier. The only change is in the interpretations by the commission."

Berstein expressed the view that "the commission got frightened by the prospect of an upsurge of petitions and decided to clamp down lest it be accused of squandering government money."

Succeeds Baldanzi:

Schaufenbil Elected As UTW President

Miami Beach—The 18th convention of the United Textile Workers elected Francis Schaufenbil as the union's new president, succeeding George Baldanzi, who died a week before the convention opened.

Schaufenbil, formerly secretary-treasurer of the UTW, had been named interim president by the Executive Council after Baldanzi's death. He was formally elected by the delegates on the closing day of the convention. Philip Salem was elected as the new secretary-treasurer.

The opening session was packed with emotion as the officers and 330 delegates paid a memorial tribute to Baldanzi and rededicated themselves to the realization of the goals he sought for the UTW.

Those goals will not be easy to attain, Schaufenbil warned. Even though the union has organized thousands of new members, he said, "the total membership of our union . . . will show very little increase."

UTW has had to work hard just to be able to stand still, he said. It added 1,200 new members since its last convention—but the net gain has been only about 250.

He spelled out these reasons:

- "The liquidation of hundreds of plants in the textile industry. And unfortunately, many were plants that we had under contract.
- "Tragic losses in jobs and job security . . . inflicted on us because of the misguided, open-ended trade policies that are only now coming under serious review by our nation's leaders."

Schaufenbil suggested that these problems could be alleviated through the creation of an apparel department within the AFL-CIO that would coordinate the activities of various groups of unions, similar to the Building Trades, Metal Trades and Maritime Trades Departments.

Unions that would participate in the proposed department, Schaufenbil said, might include in addition to the UTW, the Textile Workers Union of America, Ladies' Garment Workers, Clothing Workers, Hat Workers, Boot & Shoe Workers, United Shoe Workers, Leather Workers, and the Jewelry Workers.

"Each of these national or international unions is individually carrying on its campaign in the import fight and in other economic arenas. United in an AFL-CIO apparel department, their effectiveness in these fields would be immeasurably increased," the UTW president said.

Schaufenbil said the textile and apparel industries have grown 3 percent a year—with a work force that has shrunk by 100,000 persons—while imports have grown at a rate of 77 percent annually.

"And while we hear the Administration say that quotas have stemmed the tide of joblessness in textiles, we have yet to see whether these quota agreements are strict enough, or widespread enough to break the stranglehold that foreign producers have on the American market," he said.

"Frankly, we are skeptical," he added. "In both December and January, textile and apparel products were shipped into our market at record-breaking levels, capturing the sales of American management, and the jobs of American workers."

Things have gone so far, Schaufenbil reported, that now even Japanese workers are seeing their own jobs exported.

"Japan, for example, is now operating two textile plants in Ethiopia in the relentless search for low wage costs. The Ethiopian workers are being paid as low as four cents an hour.

"The materials produced by the Ethiopian plants under the control of Japanese interests, can be exported to the U.S. free of any quota restrictions," he said..

Raftery Joins Board Of Housing Partnership

Pres. S. Frank Raftery of the Painters has been elected to a three-year term on the board of directors of the National Corp. for Housing Partnership. He replaces AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland as the labor representative on the board.

The NCHP, created by the Housing & Urban Development Act of 1968, represents a joint effort of labor, business and government to help solve the nation's critical shortage of low- and middle-income housing.

CONGRESS IS URGED BY AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to take over the guidance of the nation's economy from an Administration that "has proven its incompetence." With him at hearings held by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress are Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, left, and Research Director Nat Goldfinger.

U.S. Flag Ships Urged for Oil, Gas Imports

Oil and gas imported into the United States should be carried in American-flag vessels, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. urged in a statement to the Senate Interior Committee.

MTD Administrator O. William Moody, Jr., cited these major benefits that would flow from such a policy:

- It would lessen the nation's dependence on other countries, since reliance on a third party for transportation doubles the risk of the United States being cut off from needed supplies.
- It would lessen the risk of oil spills and pollution since stricter controls and licensing standards "will assure that these potentially dangerous and polluting cargoes will be carried in the safest, most ecologically conscious manner possible."
- It would improve the U.S. balance of payments since the transportation cost would not result in a drain of U.S. dollars.
- It would provide thousands of jobs—in shipyards building a fleet of modern tankers and for seamen manning these ships. The payrolls would stimulate the economy. "State and local governments would receive personal and corporate tax revenues as opposed to paying welfare and unemployment compensation," Moody observed.

Federal Aid Called Vital To Reverse Arts Decline

The nation's cultural resources are in danger of drying up just as the demand for them is the greatest, organized labor told Congress.

Appropriation of the full $80 million authorization for the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities for Fiscal 1973 was urged by Jack Golodner, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes council, in testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee.

"Unwilling to raise prices and unable to cut costs, art institutions are condemned to undertake increasing deficits," Golodner said. "They simply cannot pay their way without government assistance."

And while the art institutions have managed thus far to keep price increases below the national average for other items, the dwindling of resources has been particularly hard on the artists in the field.

"The average workweek finds 74 percent of the membership of Actors Equity unemployed," Golodner pointed out, "and earnings from the theater are less than $2,500 per year for three-fourths of Equity's members, while only 5 percent have earnings above $10,000."

The same is true for dancers, musicians and other performers, Golodner said, and the net result is a great waste of talent as the performers drift away from the arts to make a living.

"By all accounts the situation will worsen," he predicted, noting that the job market for actors and actresses will be 900 per year for each year of the 1970s, while in 1972 alone, 10,000 young people will graduate from college with degrees in theater arts.

It was to avoid this situation that the national endowment for the arts was established in 1965, Golodner said, but without the full appropriation for fiscal 1973, the decline will continue.

The demand for cultural activities is at an all-time high, Golodner said, citing recent surveys which show the nation has more piano players than fishermen and a bigger audience at art institutions than at professional sports.

Since the labor movement has played a dominant role in providing the opportunity for more leisure time through shorter work schedules and earlier retirement, unions also have a stake in seeing that the nation provides workers with cultural opportunities, Golodner said.

Besides the resources to avert a decline in available talent and institutions, the endowment also backs programs to improve the arts, Golodner said, and "they establish benchmarks of quality which are badly needed."

William B. Welsh Named Wurf Aide

William B. Welsh, former executive director of the Democratic National Committee, has been named assistant to the president of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

AFSCME Pres. Jerry Wurf said Welsh will coordinate the work of the union's political action and legislative departments.

Metropolitan Agents Ratify 3-Year Pact

The Insurance Workers ratified a new three-year agreement with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. by better than a 3-to-1 margin, according to reports from 104 of 126 locals voting on the contract.

Pres. William A. Gillen of the IWIU said that returns showed voting members approved the contract 2,992 to 825. He reported that 92 locals ratified the agreement, 10 rejected it, and the result was a tie in two locals.

The union values the increase in wages and fringe benefits for the Metropolitan agents over the three years at $25.79 a week, with $13.90 coming in the first year.

Gillen said the first-year increase is weighted at 6.3 percent, consistent with the Pay Board's guideline of 6.2 percent to cover wages, fringes, catch-up pay and productivity gains.

With fringes included, the IWIU said the average agent will benefit by $3,364 over the three years. The contract provides for improvements in health and retirement plans, vacation allowances, account service commissions and in the company's savings and investment program.

Gillen noted that the outstanding ballots are not sufficient to change the outcome of the voting. The union has about 6,000 members working for Metropolitan.

Hatch Act's Ban on Political Activity Held Violation of Democratic Rights

we bar a large and growing group of citizens from active participation in politics, as the Hatch Act does, we weaken the whole fiber of our democratic system."

Harris conceded that there are some valid arguments for insulating a limited number of high-level career civil servants from politics.

But he stressed that this does not require applying the Hatch Act to "the large proportion of government employes . . . who have nothing whatever to do with either making or effectuating policy."

And even the minority of policy-affecting employes, he suggested, "should be free to engage in political activities involving governments other than that in which they are employed." For example, he said, "federal employes should be free to run for local office, such as the city council or school board, regardless of whether they run as Democrats or Republicans or independents.

Harris proposed a solution based on the British system. He told the committee that in Britain "two-thirds of the whole civil service is completely free from any restrictions on political activities. About one-quarter are free to take part in any political activities except parliamentary candidacy, while one-sixth may not take part in any political activities except local activities not conducted through the same party organizations as national politics."

Harris voiced "considerable doubt" as to the constitutionality of the Hatch Act, noting that it was upheld by the Supreme Court in 1947 by a slim 4-3 margin and "since that time, the court has greatly broadened the protections accorded free speech under the First Amendment."

He noted also that the expansion of federal grants-in-aid programs have vastly extended the law's prohibitions to state and local employes. Not even the Civil Service Commission, Harris said, knows how many of the 14 million local and state employes are covered.

In any amendment of the Hatch Act, Harris urged, unions representing government employes should be freed from the current hazard of technical violations of the law. Government employes should be able to speak up in union meetings on endorsement of candidates or to urge voluntary contributions to COPE.

Harris said bills introduced by Senators Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) and Frank E. Moss (D-Utah) "go part way" towards accomplishing the AFL-CIO's objectives and would be an improvement over present law.

Hodgson Orders Shakeup:

Rural Manpower Offices Seen as Arm of Employers

of the employer to the detriment of the worker."

The report noted that 95 percent of the migrant workers are members of minority groups—Spanish-speaking or blacks.

Testing, counseling and training services available at regular employment offices were seldom available at the rural service facilities, the report noted, and Mexican-Americans were often shunted automatically to farm employment without being considered for other jobs.

In direct violation of the Civil Rights Act, employers were often permitted to request male or female workers, or workers who "must speak English" or "must speak Spanish."

The federal law barring discrimination on the basis of age against workers between 40 and 65 was widely violated with the cooperation of the Labor Dept. office, the report noted. Most staff members were found to have only "a vague knowledge of the law."

Although the wages of foreign workers admitted for harvest work are supposed to be at least as high as those paid domestic workers, "there is evidence that foreign workers do depress earnings."

The "fear of repatriations" is used to keep foreign workers docile, the investigators noted.

"A self-reinforcing cycle is thus created," the report said. "Foreign workers tend to depress wages, depressed wages discourage domestic workers from taking the jobs and inability to recruit domestic workers is used to justify the use of foreign workers. The result is a continuation and expansion of the use of foreign workers despite an oversupply of domestic workers."

Inspection teams also noted widespread failures of migrant crew leaders and growers to pay the social security payroll tax, even when the money is deducted from the workers' pay.

To illustrate the massive violations of even the substandard minimum wage law applicable to workers on large farms, the report noted that wage-hour investigations of only 692 agricultural employers—a mere 3 percent of employers—found 6,236 farm workers had been cheated of $914,000 in wages during the 1971 fiscal year alone.

Not only was there seldom any effort by the employment service to check if minimum wage laws were being followed, the report said, but many orders were being filled by sending workers to employers who did not even specify the rate they would pay workers.

Workers would sometimes be sent long distances to report for work with no guarantee of work available. Thus, several job orders in Ohio stated merely: "Work hours will be 0 to 6 days per week and 0 to 10 hours per day depending on weather and conditions of crops."

One so-called "guarantee" by an employer read: "Mr. ——— also will guarantee, in case of bad weather for a week, an advance of $5 per worker, over 14 years of age, for groceries to be deducted from their wages once they start working."

Staffs of the Labor Dept. offices were often found to be uninformed about applicable minimum wage laws.

The report cites this example in a state that had a state minimum wage law that applied only to women and children:

"The hourly wages due children under this law were less than the federal minimum for children. The hourly wages due women under the state law were higher than the federal minimum. Negotiation statements showed that wages were collected on the basis of the state law for women and children and the federal law for men. The Equal Pay Amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act would have increased the amount due men at least up to the amount required to be paid women doing the same type of work."

But because of lack of knowledge or effort by the staff, "both men and children remained partially underpaid."

While rejecting blanket accusations against the staff of the local farm employment offices, the report noted that there were numerous examples of staff persons owning farms. And it cited the case of a Rural Manpower Service official who had "a second job as a rent collector in areas where blacks had to pay high rentals for rundown dwellings, some of which were owned by growers."

The report found that some states with large numbers of Spanish-speaking migrants had employment offices with no bilingual staff.

In a number of areas, the report conceded the legitimacy of complaints about poor housing, dangerous pesticides in fields, lack of toilet facilities and unsafe transportation. But it noted that in the absence of violations of state and federal laws, there is little the Labor Dept. can do.

Hodgson said the Labor Dept. has endeavored to upgrade its services to rural workers but "it is clear to us that our corrective measures have not been strong enough and in some cases have not been fully carried out."

He ordered a 13-point program aimed at correcting the weaknesses uncovered by the department's investigation and directed that it "be implemented in an expeditious manner."

'Massive Upsurge' Sets New Record for Profits

The Business Week report was buttressed by a survey issued by the First National City Bank of New York which found that the net profits of 669 corporations were up 12 percent in the first three months of the year over the comparable period of 1971.

The profits increase was so dramatic that C. Jackson Grayson, chairman of the Administration's Price Commission, was prompted to forecast "hundreds of millions of dollars" in price reductions as the commission enforces regulations on profit margins.

This will result, he told a New York luncheon audience, from disclosures in first-quarter reports now flowing into his agency. The reports are due May 15 from 2,500 of the nation's corporate giants.

So far, according to Grayson, 500 of these companies have filed their reports. Half of these have been sent back because they were not properly filed, and of the remaining 250, some 120 exceeded base profit margins. Half of the companies have been asked to justify their excesses.

Under government regulations, companies are allowed to increase prices to cover costs, but these increases may not lift profit margins above the average for the best two of the past three years.

Grayson noted that the commission has ordered some rollbacks.

It directed a Seattle-based lumber firm, the Simpson Timber Co., to roll back prices on certain products, declaring that the company had raised its prices in excess of what the commission authorized in February.

The firm was ordered to reduce prices within 24 hours and to refund overpayments to customers within 90 days.

A spokesman for the lumber firm indicated that the commission's original order had been misunderstood and that Simpson would comply.

And the F. W. Woolworth Co. was told to reduce its prices at lunch counters in its variety stores.

Although Woolworth had reported proposed increases to the commission as required, the commission considers the chain's food operation a service industry as opposed to a retail operation.

The commission ordered a refund of sorts. It told Woolworth it must lower the lunch counter prices below the base period of the 90-day freeze until such time as it has returned "to consumers in the form of lower prices the revenues derived" from the increases.

In other action, the Price Commission turned down a request from Sonesta International Hotels to raise prices at four of its hotels.

And it turned down a request from the Ford Motor Co. to raise prices on automotive goods by 4.45 percent. The commission said it was concerned with the effect such an increase would have on Ford's profit margin.

Hefty Salary Boosts for Executives Expose Double Standard of Controls

The Pay Board may be doing an excellent job of holding down the wage increases of rank-and-file workers to 5.5 percent or less, but a different set of rules for the top executives of large corporations allows them to receive salary increases of nearly 200 percent.

This facet of the Administration's wage stabilization program was reported both in Congress and by a private financial newsletter, the Gallagher Presidents' Report, which listed the average pay hike of top officers of 47 leading U.S. manufacturers at 14.4 percent.

Highest pay increases, according to the Gallagher Report, were for Dow Chemical Pres. Charles Branch—196.2 percent to $305,089—Bendix Chairman A. P. Fontaine — 130.4 percent to $280,664 — and General Motors Pres. Ed Cole—121.1 percent to $497,534.

And while trade unions have made futile efforts to defend wage increases before the Pay Board on the basis of productivity gains, some executives have been allowed large increases in salaries despite drastic drops in company profits.

The Gallagher newsletter reported that an executive of Boise Cascade received a salary increase of 13.2 percent in 1971 even though the company suffered a loss of $85 million in pre-tax profits.

Sen. William Proxmire, (D-Wis.) called the situation "shocking" after hearing Richard T. McNamar, director of the Pay Board's office of economic policy, tell the Joint Economic Committee of Congress how it was possible for an executive to receive a salary increase of 100 percent or more.

"If the base year was high enough, and the proportion of the incentive was high enough and the company had a good year, that would be possible," McNamar said.

"This gives them a very big happy break," Proxmire said, adding that the Pay Board did not do the same for the "average working stiff."

McNamar did say that the Pay Board's enforcement agency, the Internal Revenue Service, was scrutinizing hefty executive compensation boosts at the Ford Motor Co., where Henry Ford II received an increase of 37.8 percent last year to $689,000, and Pres. Lee A. Iacocca received a 48.4 percent increase to $675,000.

Another investigation was to get underway at Chrysler Corp. where board chairman Lynn Townsend was raised from $200,000 to $225,000, and Pres. John Riccardo received an increase from $175,000 to $200,000.

The highest paid executive in the nation during 1971 was Harold S. Geneen, chairman and president of International Telephone & Telegraph, who received $812,494—an increase of 6 percent over the previous year.

But the Pay Board's crackdown on workers continued. The latest report from the board showed that the combined average weighted increase for 6.6 million workers in large plants had been held to 4.2 percent.

During April, the increase for nearly 2 million rank-and-file workers in plants employing 5,000 or more workers, was held to 2.5 percent by the Pay Board, including new contracts, deferred raises and retroactive pay boosts.

Steelworkers Editors Elect William Scoggins

COPE Film Views Wallace Candidacy

A brief film on the presidential candidacy of George Wallace is available from the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

"When Wallace Got the Vote," the title of the film says, "Richard Nixon got the White House." The 4½-minute film shows Wallace explaining how his 1968 candidacy was instrumental in the defeat of Hubert Humphrey.

The color film can be purchased from COPE for $35 a print or rented through the AFL-CIO Film Division for $3 per showing.

COPE also has a cassette tape of a lively new song, "The Nixon Freeze," which was written and recorded by Woody Woodruff, president of a Rubber Workers' local in Evansville, Ind. The tape can be purchased for $1.50.

Task Force to Spur Drive To Halt Exportation of Jobs

House Hikes Health Plan Contribution

The House ignored veto threats and voted 238-110 approval of a labor-backed bill raising the government's contribution to the cost of health insurance for federal employes.

Under present law, government workers pay an average of 60 percent of their group health insurance premiums with the agencies that employ them picking up only 40 percent of the cost.

The House bill would raise the government's contribution as an employer to 55 percent of the premium cost immediately, with its share rising 5 percent a year until it reaches 75 percent.

An Administration-backed amendment to substitute a permanent 50-50 sharing of the cost was beaten, 219-124.

The hottest debate came over a successful amendment by Rep. Jerome R. Waldie (D-Calif.) to include the nation's nearly 740,000 postal workers in the bill.

Postal workers, now employes of the semi-autonomous U.S. Postal Service, are covered by the same health benefits program as other federal workers. But postal management and the Administration argued that they should be excluded from any legislated improvements because they have the right to bargain on fringe benefits.

Postal unions, backed by other affiliates of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council, led a strong drive for inclusion in the bill, and the Waldie amendment was adopted by a 197-148 vote.

The legislation now moves over to the Senate.

Non-Union Shops Exempted:

Kirkland Attacks New Decontrol Rule

The Cost of Living Council has compounded inequity by lifting wage-price controls from millions of non-union small business firms while keeping organized workers under stringent wage curbs, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged.

Kirkland termed the partial decontrol action "exactly what we we have come to expect from the Nixon Administration."

As explained by the director of the Cost of Living Council, Donald Rumsfeld, some 5 million firms with 60 or fewer employes will be exempt from controls to enable the government to concentrate on large unions and companies.

But if the firms—no matter how small—are parties to a master union contract such as a citywide agreement, the controls stay on. And if a firm has fewer than half its employes covered by a master contract, wages remain controlled but prices are free to rise.

The effect of the new ruling, Kirkland noted, is that "most organized workers in even the smallest workplace continue under government wage controls" even though similar establishments that are unorganized are free of restrictions.

Also, he stressed, "price controls are weakened, thus further eroding protection for these consumers who need it most—the poor and the middle-income groups."

"The government's alibi, that these actions are taken to insure greater efficiency in policing controls, is outrageous. If controls are to be effective, they must be uniform, adequately policed and fairly administered," Kirkland said.

Council Presses Burke-Hartke Bill

By Saul Miller

A special task force to mount a vigorous campaign for passage of the Burke-Hartke bill to prevent the exportation of American jobs has been established by the AFL-CIO.

The action by the federation's Executive Council will touch off a major educational and lobbying campaign for the Foreign Trade Investment Act, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said.

Creation of the task force was a highlight of the one-day spring meeting of the council in Washington at which it adopted policy statements on the upcoming Nixon trip to Moscow, tyranny in Haiti, the ITT hearings and legislation on welfare reform, compulsory arbitration, minimum wage, veterans and prepaid legal services.

The council accepted the resignations of two members, Vice Presidents Maurice A. Hutcheson and Peter T. Schoemann, and elected Carpenters Pres. William Sidell and Plumbers and Pipe Fitters Pres. Martin J. Ward to fill the vacancies. (Story, Page 2.)

The task force for Burke-Hartke, Meany announced, will be adequately financed, adequately staffed and have the complete support of the AFL-CIO headquarters and field staffs as well as the full cooperation of the staffs of major affiliated unions both in Washington and the field.

The administrative functions of the task force will be directed by the executive officers of the AFL-CIO. The council named the following committee to advise the task force:

Pres. I. W. Abel, Steelworkers; Pres. Peter A. Bommarito, Rubber Workers; Pres. Joseph Curran, National Maritime Union; Pres. Paul Hall, Seafarers; Pres. Paul Jennings, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; Pres.-Emeritus Lee W. Minton, Glass Bottle Blowers; Pres. Charles H. Pillard, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Pres. William Pollock, Textile Workers Union of America; Pres. Jacob Potofsky, Clothing Workers; Pres. Floyd E. Smith, Machinists; Pres. Louis Stulberg, Ladies' Garment Workers, and Pres. Richard Walsh, Theatrical Stage Employes.

Howard P. Chester, executive secretary of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee, will be executive director of the task force. Chester is a former president of the Window Glass Cutters and has been an active trade unionist for the past 33 years.

Forced Arbitration Called 'Totalitarian' Proposal

The Nixon Administration's bill to impose compulsory arbitration in transportation disputes was branded "totalitarian" by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

A council statement warned employers supporting the bill that "once compulsory arbitration is imposed on a particular industry it will be extended to others, that compulsory arbitration is incompatible with private enterprise, and that government fixing of the terms and conditions of employment will lead inexorably to price fixing, profit fixing and other permanent government controls."

The council reaffirmed labor's belief "in collective bargaining, not in government dictation of contract terms."

It called on "every legislator who values the American system of free labor" to oppose all bills substituting compulsory arbitration for the right to strike.

Nixon Urged to Be Wary Of Summit Talk Pitfalls

The AFL-CIO advised Pres. Nixon to view the summit meeting with the Soviet Union in Moscow later this month "without illusions and with full awareness of the great difficulties at hand."

The Executive Council expressed its hopes that the meeting will help reduce world tensions and improve the outlook for peace. But it said the Kremlin meeting will take place "under circumstances hardly favorable to the cause of peace and freedom."

The council's resolution said that despite the "enormous difficulties in the path of detente, our country should strive for improved relations with the USSR."

It urged the President "to make the following moves" at the Moscow summit:

- Seek agreement on effective limitations on strategic arms. Limitations on offensive and defensive weapons "must be simultaneously enforced, equally comprehensive and binding in international law," with manned on-site international inspection, supervision and control used to supplement satellite observation.

- Expansion of trade and other economic relations with the USSR should be fostered only if the USSR "stops aiding Hanoi's aggression, urges North Vietnam to cease all military operations and pull back its forces to positions above the DMZ," and helps secure the Council Backs Group Legal Service Plans

Legislation to allow unions to establish group legal service plans through collective bargaining was strongly urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council specifically supported bills introduced by Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) and Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., (D-N.J.) which would permit establishment of joint labor-management trust funds to finance such plans.

The statement noted the growing concern over providing high quality legal services to workers and their families at prices they can afford and the recent establishment of a number of prepaid group legal service plans by unions and others.

While the concept is not new and the AFL-CIO has been involved in a legal struggle with bar associations on the matter, a recent Supreme Court decision has cleared the way for the establishment of such plans, the council said. It stressed:

"Legal services for union members and their families can best be provided through union or community sponsored prepaid group legal service plans. The alternative, open ended fee-for-service arrangements, permits no effective cost controls and would lead to the same kind of runaway cost escalation many unions have suffered in fee-for-service medical programs."

Ward, Sidell Elected As Council Members

The presidents of two major AFL-CIO unions were elected to the federation's Executive Council to fill vacancies left by the resignations of their predecessors.

The new council members, who become vice presidents of the AFL-CIO, are Martin J. Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and William Sidell, president of the Carpenters.

The council received the resignations of Peter T. Schoemann, president-emeritus of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, and Maurice A. Hutcheson, president-emeritus of the Carpenters, and selected Ward and Sidell to replace them. Schoemann and Hutcheson will become AFL-CIO vice presidents-emeritus.

Ward, 53, became president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters in July 1971. A native of Chicago, he rose through the ranks to become business manager of Local 597 in Chicago and assumed an active role in apprenticeship training. He had served as assistant to the union's general secretary-treasurer, was elected secretary-treasurer in 1966 and was appointed assistant to Schoemann in 1969.

Sidell, 56, who became president of the Carpenters in March 1972, rose through the ranks of the union in the Los Angeles area to the top positions in Local 721. He moved on to key leadership posts with the county, state and national divisions of the union, becoming a member of the national Carpenters executive board in 1962. In April 1970 he became first general vice president, taking on responsibilities for apprenticeship and training.

In ITT Manipulations:

New Hearings Urged On Kleindienst Role

The Senate was urged to dig deeper into the relationship between the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. and the Nixon Administration before voting on confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as Attorney General.

"Substantial questions" remain unanswered, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

It asked that the nomination be sent back to the Judiciary Committee for further hearings, "unfettered by restrictions."

The Judiciary Committee voted 11-4 to recommend approval of the nomination after having narrowly voted to cut off the hearings with a final appearance by Kleindienst.

Kleindienst was called back to the witness table after a White House aide, Peter M. Flanigan, had acknowledged a series of calls and meetings with Kleindienst concerning settlement of the Justice Dept. antitrust suit against ITT, one of the world's biggest conglomerates.

Kleindienst was then deputy attorney general and has been acting head of the Justice Dept. since the resignation of John Mitchell to manage Pres. Nixon's re-election campaign.

Asked to explain the contradiction between Flanigan's statement and his previous denial of any such conversations, Kleindienst pleaded poor memory and said the episodes didn't make any impression on him because they were "insignificant."

Flanigan earlier told the Judiciary Committee that he would not answer a number of questions about meetings with ITT officials because it would invade the separation of powers between Congress and the White House.

Calling on the Senate "not to whitewash the ITT controversy," the Executive Council statement concluded:

"Until the truth is known, doubts will remain in the minds of the American people as to the propriety of Administration actions involving ITT."

Among the witnesses never heard by the committee was Mrs. Dita Beard, the ITT lobbyist whose confidential memo touched off the investigation after it was printed in Jack Anderson's syndicated newspaper column.

The memo linked the settlement of the multi-billion dollar ITT case on terms acceptable to the corporation to a pledge of financial support to bring the Republican National Convention to San Diego.

The corporation alternated between trying to discredit Mrs. Beard and claiming the memo was a forgery—even after FBI tests proved that it had been written as dated, and not months afterwards as ITT had asserted.

Throughout the weeks of hearings, prominent witnesses contradicated each other, denied statements they had made in press interviews and developed either convenient lapses of memory or equally convenient recollections of events they had previously forgotten or overlooked.

Meanwhile, the Republican National Committee prepared to take the path of discretion and abandon San Diego as the site of the GOP presidential convention.

The reason it gave for shifting to Miami Beach was the lack of hotel facilities in San Diego and the high cost of preparing the privately-owned arena for the convention.

When San Diego was initially selected, it was widely reported that the choice was dictated by Pres. Nixon's desires But the White House and Republican officials now insist that the President never wanted the convention held there. His real preference, it is confided, was Kansas City.

Political Ads Prohibited In Central Body Papers

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has amended the rules governing state and local central bodies to prohibit paid political advertising in their publications and end their ties with "advertising boards," yearbooks and directories that accept commercial advertising.

The council acted on the recommendations of the Advisory Committee to the Dept. of State & Local Central Bodies composed of representatives of these AFL-CIO units.

The resolution also officially requested that the various trade and industrial departments of the AFL-CIO adopt the same policy with respect to the state and local councils chartered by these departments.

The resolution amends the rule governing publications and advertising to read that "no state (or local) central body shall be associated in any way with a so-called advertising board, or with a yearbook or labor directory when such yearbook or labor directory accepts commercial advertising of any kind." It says further, "No state (or local) central body shall authorize or permit such publication [owned, endorsed or authorized] to accept paid political advertising."

The council action came after a presentation of the views of the Advisory Committee on problems affecting publications. The International Labor Press Association was praised for assuring that its members maintain high standards on advertising, but the committee said only the federation could act on these continuing abuses.

The advertising board, it said, is used to "shake down the town's merchants to buy a space on a display board in the union hall." The yearbook and labor directory follow the same pattern.

On paid political advertising the view of the Advisory Committee, concurred in by national COPE, is that the appearance of an advertisement for a candidate not supported by labor tends to confuse members and intimates official support.

The advisory committee urged that the same rules be extended to publications of bodies chartered by trade and industrial departments of the federation to achieve a uniform approach.

CONVENTION

The Kentucky AFL-CIO has scheduled its 1972 convention for Louisville, Oct. 22-25.

Anniversary of Safety Law Marred By Sparse Budget, Enforcement

The first anniversary of the federal job safety act was no occasion for America's workers to celebrate because the Nixon Administration has compromised the goals of the law, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

It cited the lack of adequate funds and enforcement, in addition to Administration efforts to turn the Occupational Safety & Health Act program over to the states.

"The President and the Secretary of Labor gave this program the highest priority in words, but then fed it a starvation budget," the council said.

The statement also noted that the act has been interpreted by the Administration so as to soften the impact of its enforcement provisions on business.

And the highest priority from the outset, the council stressed, "has been to let the states do it—the states whose historical failure to protect the health and safety of workers on the job led Congress to pass the 1970 act."

Congress intended the act "to right the wrong suffered by generations of workers," the statement continued, but it now "is in the hands of an Administration which does not believe in the law's philosophy or purpose—despite White House rhetoric. So workers continue to be needlessly killed, injured or made ill on the job."

In testimony before a House Appropriations subcommittee, the federation termed the Administration's budget request for fiscal year 1973 woefully inadequate to effectively enforce the job safety law.

George H. R. Taylor, secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, said that Congress should increase the appropriations for the coming fiscal year to $166 million—$75 million more than the Administration is requesting—to better protect the 57 million workers covered by the law.

Taylor illustrated the need for the increased appropriations by comparing the spending for job safety by two federal agencies in the 1972 fiscal year. The Bureau of Mines provides $309.54 in enforcement dollars per worker, while the Labor Dept. allots 41 cents per worker, he pointed out.

The AFL-CIO proposal also calls for a $60 million appropriation to the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, an increase of $37.8 million over the Administration's budget.

Part of the increase would provide for at least tripling the number of criteria and recommended standards covering toxic substances that workers are exposed to on the job.

A major objective of labor's proposal to expand appropriations for occupational safety, would be to enlarge the government's staff of compliance officers from the present 407 to 2,500 and to increase the number of industrial hygienists from 40 to 115 in the coming year.

The federation said it could see no need for more than $10 million for state safety programs since only a few states are likely to submit satisfactory proposals before the end of the coming fiscal year.

IUD Criticizes Enforcement of Job Health Act

Failure of the Labor Dept. to ban the use of cancer-producing substances on the job continues to jeopardize the health of a vast number of workers, the Industrial Union Dept. declared.

This emerged as a major concern in the IUD's appraisal of the Labor Dept.'s performance in enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act on its first anniversary.

Peter Bommarito, chairman of the IUD Safety & Health Committee, attributed the health hazard to "half-hearted enforcement policies."

Bommarito, who is president of the Rubber Workers, said "we have become particularly concerned that these lackadaisical policies of the department have permitted many American workers . . . to have needless and highly dangerous contact with cancer-producing substances"

He listed nine carcinogenic substances that were declared unsafe by the American Conference of Industrial Hygienists in 1968, but are still in general use in industry.

He charged that the Labor Dept. has done nothing to prevent the manufacture or use of the substances, although it has had full authority to do so since the job safety act went into effect on Apr. 28, 1971.

Not only did the department fail to act under the general duty provision of the act, Bommarito stressed, "but it consciously did not adopt standards for the control of these compounds."

Council Launches Drive for Trade Bill

Sets Up Task Force to Campaign For Curbs on Exportation of Jobs

The council took note of international problems in two other actions:

- Advised Pres. Nixon to view the summit meeting with the Soviet Union without illusions and suggested a number of proposals that he put before the Soviets to help ease world tensions. (Story, Page 1).
- Called on the U.S. government and international agencies to impose strict economic sanctions against Haiti until the regime there ends its denial of human rights and freedom. (Story, Page 7.)

On legislative issues the council:

- Denounced as a "cruel exploitation" at starvation pay the proposal for a $1.20-an-hour forced work plan for mothers receiving welfare assistance as part of the welfare reform bill. (Story, this page.)
- Called on the House to pass without change the committee approved amendments to the minimum wage law to raise the pay floor to $2 an hour and cover millions of public workers and household domestics. (Story, this page.)
- Urged the Senate to dig deeper into the relationship between the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. and the Nixon Administration before confirming Richard G. Kleindienst as attroney general. (Story, Page 2.)
- Endorsed legislation to permit unions to establish group legal service plans through collective barbaining by allowing the establishment of joint labor-management trust funds. (Story, Page 2.)
- Branded as "totalitarian" the Nixon Administration's bill to impose compulsory arbitration in transportation disputes. (Story, Page 1.)
- Called on Congress to improve educational benefits for Vietnam veterans, provide more jobs programs for those not going to school and improve hospitalization and rehabilitation facilities for those wounded or injured. (Story, this page.)
- Charged that the Administration's policies had compromised the goals of the Occupational Safety & Health Act as the law entered its second year short of adequate funds for enforcement. (Story, Page 2.)

On internal matters the council voiced its support for the strike of the Elevator Constructors and took these other actions:

- Set up a council subcommittee to work with the Advisory Committee to the Dept. of State and Local Central Bodies to develop a program for increasing local union affiliations with local bodies. Vice Presidents Hunter P. Wharton, Peter Bommarito and George Hardy will comprise the committee.
- Amended the rules governing state and local central bodies to prohibit paid political advertising in their publications and end their ties with advertising boards, yearbooks and directories that accept commercial advertising. (Story, Page 2.)
- Adopted a resolution referred to it by the convention calling for prison reform keyed to programs dealing with the real needs of the inmates and helping prepare them for productive lives. (Story, Page 6.)
- Revised the structure of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education to bring it in line with the new federal laws on campaign expenditures and reporting and to allow contributors to COPE to take advantage of new tax laws on political contributions.
- Voted to continue its financial contributions to the A. Philip Randolph Institute and to approve the projected 1972-73 budget for the AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center.
- Set the next meeting of the council for Aug. 28-29 in Chicago and the session of the General Board to act on a national political endorsement for Aug. 30 in the same city.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland presided at the council meeting in the absence of Federation Pres. George Meany, who was ill with a cold.

A statement issued by Meany on the creation of the task force for Burke-Hartke stressed the importance the AFL-CIO attaches to the measure. He said:

"It can provide both immediate remedies and long-term answers to the inrush of imports, the outflow of capital and technology and provide the Congress with the kind of help it now seeks in solving one of the major problems in the last third of the 20th Century: How can the United States have healthy, productive, fully-employed citizens and higher living standards in a modern world of nations?

"The Burke-Hartke bill is a positive program for American taxpayers, consumers and workers."

Outlining the dimensions of the problem, Meany cited these statistics:

"Nine out of 10 radios sold in the United States are made abroad. Also made abroad are one out of six new cars, seven out of 10 sweaters, 19 out of 20 motorcycles, one out of two nails and staples, nine out of 10 baseball mitts."

American workers, he said, "can no longer be deceived that the loss of their jobs helps benefit the American consumer by the purchase of imports. These workers do not want a handout from the government, paid for by their taxes, as a substitute for jobs shipped abroad by giant firms for the stockholders' advantage.

"The United States is in trouble. Taxpayers are fed up. The AFL-CIO is against the use of tax money to support private greed at public expense.

"We are not isolationists. We reject the doctrine of isolationism.

"We are realists. We believe there is no such thing as 'free trade' in the world today in the traditional meaning of that term.

"We insist there must be fair trade and that America must face up to that need.

"America needs realistic action for the present and future, not a return to the ideas of the past.

"Burke-Hartke would meet that need."

'What Are You Waiting For?'

Welfare Work Proposal Assailed as Exploitation

A $1.20-an-hour forced work plan for mothers receiving welfare assistance was sharply denounced by the AFL-CIO as "cruel exploitation" at "starvation pay."

Target of the Executive Council blast was the Senate Finance Committee, which is midway through a rewriting of a House-passed family assistance and social security bill.

The Senate panel voted to force needy mothers of children over the age of 6 to work for wages as low as $1.20 an hour—for private employers if jobs are available; otherwise in "make-work" public employment.

If they hired out to private employers, the government would add a subsidy equal to three-fourths of the difference between their pay and the $1.60 minimum wage.

But if they were forced to take the public jobs at $1.20 an hour, there woud be no pay supplement. A 40-hour workweek would bring a $48 weekly paycheck.

And, the council statement noted, "not just the adults but the children too would be cut off from all support if the adults in the family refused to submit to such oppression. At present, there is no assurance whatsoever of adequate care for the children of mothers forced to work."

The AFL-CIO charged that the Finance Committee scheme "would effectively subsidize the most unscrupulous employers, those paying less than the legal minimum wage. The plan would impose the most cruel exploitation on millions of poor Americans. If enacted, it would postpone the chance of genuine welfare reform for years to come."

Instead of "this Neanderthal approach to the welfare problem," the AFL-CIO said, the Senate should enact the amendment proposed by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) to the House-passed bill.

The council termed the Ribicoff amendment humane and realistic and noted that it would:

- Establish a federal minimum basic family assistance payment of $3,000 for a family of four with automatic increases to no less than the poverty level within a few years.
- Protect all recipients against any reductions in present payments.
- Prohibit referral to jobs paying sub-minimum wages.
- Assure adequate day care for children of mothers referred to a job or training.
- Protect the job rights and employment conditions of state and local employes administering welfare when the federal government takes over the program.

The Senate Finance Committee action, which was backed by all committee Repulicans and opposed only by four northern Democrats, was also denounced by Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Elliot L. Richardson and Labor Sec. James D. Hodgson as "a step backward."

Expanded Aid Pressed For Vietnam Veterans

The United States must return to its long tradition of providing the best possible benefits and opportunities to the nation's veterans, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation's Executive Council declared that the Vietnam veterans are returning home to find an indifference to their need for jobs, education aid and hospital care.

On education, the council pointed out that the GI Bill has not kept pace with soaring education and living costs and that the proposed increase voted by the House and the more-limited Nixon Administration proposal are not sufficient. The council urged support for the Hartke Bill to increase GI benefits, supplemented by a tuition-loan program.

On jobs, the council called on the government to sharply increase its veterans employment programs, charging that the Administration's approach is "little more than a public relations gimmick." The council noted, in contrast, the success of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute in obtaining jobs for veterans and pledged to continue those efforts.

The council called also for a "more effective accreditation procedure by the Veterans Administration" to eliminate fraudulent fly-by-night schools selling "marketable skills."

On veterans hospitals, the council pointed out that the "rehabilitation and therapeutic needs of veterans continue to be shortchanged" and that VA hospitals continue to receive short shrift from governmental budgetmakers, are understaffed, outdated and over-crowded.

"There was a time," the council said, "when American veterans received the best of care, the best of benefits and the gratitude of a nation. The AFL-CIO believes that time must return."

House Urged to Reject Lower Pay for Youth

The AFL-CIO called on the House to pass "without change" committee-approved amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act that would raise the minimum wage to $2 an hour and cover millions of public employes and household domestic workers.

An executive council statement termed the legislation "of vital importance to millions of workers."

It strongly urged the House to reject the substitute bill that will be proposed by Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.) when the legislation reaches the floor, probably within a week.

While it includes a $2 minimum wage, the Erlenborn substitute would impose a sub-minimum wage for youth—at 80 percent of the adult rate.

"Such a sub-minimum wage will not expand employment opportunities for youth," the council warned. "It will cause unscrupulous employers to fire older workers and replace them with cheaper labor."

The council statement said it would be "intolerable" for Congress to further delay action on minimum wage legislation. A $2 minimum, it noted, "will do little more than update the $1.60 minimum enacted in 1966." And the added coverage will bring "needed protection to several million workers who have been getting second-class treatment because of their exclusion from the protection of the Fair Labor Standards Act."

The council statement noted that the lowest of the city family budgets drawn up by the Bureau of Labor Statistics requires an income of more than $7,200 a year for a family of four—substantially more than even a $2 minimum wage would bring in.

Glass Union Settles Toiletries Strike

The Glass Bottle Blowers announced settlement of a strike by 100 members of its Local 243 against a Moosic, Pa., manufacturer of toiletries and cosmetics. Terms of the settlement were not immediately available.

The strike began Mar. 4 and the agreement was reached only hours after the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted a statement supporting the strikers and a boycott of products of the company, Jacqueline Cochran, a subsidiary of Shulton, Inc.

The Needs of Vietnam Veterans

FOR THE FIRST TIME in American history, men and women who served in the armed forces are returning home to find indifference—indifference from their government, indifference in the job market and indifference from the educational system.

The G.I. Bill, which helped thousands of World War II and Korean War veterans and veterans of the Cold War get training and education, has not kept pace with soaring education and living costs. As a result, many veterans who would like to continue their education have been forced into a job market already overburdened by widespread unemployment.

While G.I. Bill benefits have dropped sharply below a level comparable to those enacted in 1948, the Administration has proposed an utterly inadequate 8.6 percent increase in benefits and has threatened to veto any bill increasing benefits more than 14 percent—the level in the House-passed bill. Neither increase is sufficient.

Veterans must have substantial increases in G.I. benefits, such as those in S. 2161 introduced by Senator Vance Hartke, or many will be unable to continue their education. In addition, the benefits should be supplemented with a tuition-loan program to enable veterans to attend the college of their choice.

For those veterans who do not desire to further their education the government must, at a minimum, double its veterans employment programs. The efforts of the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute have been successful in obtaining jobs for veterans, and we pledge to continue those efforts. In contrast, the Administration's program is little more than a public relations gimmick. It is obvious from the Administration's dismal performance that the needs of 400,000 unemployed veterans cannot be met by empty advertising promises.

MANY VETERANS have fallen prey to fly-by-night so-called "approved for veterans" schools purporting to teach them a marketable skill. Yet upon entering the job market the veteran often finds no use for the skills which have often cost him hundreds of dollars to learn or he finds that these skills cannot get him the promotions promised. While there are many reputable trade schools, a more effective accreditation procedure by the Veterans Administration is necessary if fraudulent practices are to be eliminated.

The rehabilitation and therapeutic needs of veterans continue to be shortchanged. Many veterans have returned home with physical and psychological wounds which must be treated. But V.A. hospitals continue to receive short shrift from governmental budgetmakers. Many of these hospitals are under-staffed, outdated and over-crowded. And inadequate rehabilitation services are provided for the physically disabled and the victims of drug abuse.

There was a time when American veterans received the best of care, the best of benefits and the gratitude of a nation. The AFL-CIO believes that time must return.

A Word Edgewise:

Far-Out Academic Innovations Seen as Educational Swindles

By John P. Roche

EVERY GENERATION gets trapped in its own time capsule. As a teacher of history and politics, I have the task of trying to bridge—at least at the intellectual level—the gap between the present and the past.

Obviously I, too, am a product of my generation and doubtless have a number of responses that seem eccentric to my students, but I am aware of it and put my cards on the table. My students are blissfully unaware of their insulation: with dedication and a certain amount of disdain, they march out to reinvent the wheel.

This is not said in any spirit of meanness; I behaved in precisely the same fashion at their age. It is raised because I get a good deal of mail accusing me of being an academic dinosaur, an antique reactionary who wants to turn the clock back to McGuffey's Reader and the college-as-prison.

In particular I am attacked for opposing the bold new innovations that have "liberated" the universities and colleges from the formalism, the rigid curriculum, the lack of experimentalism that formerly dominated the academic ethos.

I have not bothered to defend myself against these attacks, believing, egotistically, I suppose, that my life-long reputation as an anti-formalist in educational matters provided an adequate defense. However, the folly of this attitude came home to me with a vengeance over the past couple of weeks.

Two episodes: first, a group of students arguing about the various Democratic presidential candidates. As I listened, a young woman said with the authority of Moses on Sinai: "After all, Hubert Humphrey has never done a thing for civil rights." I waited, but nobody even argued the point. Automatically I said, "Don't you remember the Democratic convention of 1948?" Startled, she replied: "I was born in 1953."

Second, I received what might be considered the ultimate historical put-down. After class a freshman came up to me and asked: "It must have been interesting to work in the White House. What is Pres. Nixon like to work for?"

With this in mind, I think it wise to say a few words about my views on education. The critics of what has occurred in the academy over the last decade can be divided into two general categories: the conservatives who want to return to a "golden age" and liberals who believe in educational innovation but are convinced that most of the programs that have claimed this label are fakes, are in fact academic swindles of which the students are victims.

The classic statement of the conservative position was Robert Nisbet's "Degradation of the Academic Dogma," a book in which he persuasively presented the case for an ideal college, one that would never have admitted me or most of my friends. To summarize, the conservative argument insists that the problems in American higher education have arisen from the erroneous notion that the masses have a right—if qualified—to go to college. It is at root profoundly anti-egalitarian.

AT THE OTHER END, there are those of us who have spent our academic lives trying to eliminate the stupid rigidities of college standards without simultaneously destroying standards. Over the years, I confess, I have broken every rule in the book.

For example, a senior doing a paper with me simply froze in his last semester; he just couldn't write a sentence, though his research had been enormous. I should have flunked him, preventing his graduation and acceptance of a foreign scholarship. I passed him with the understanding that he would write the paper over the summer. He did and in fact it was published in a scholarly journal.

The point is I knew that student, as I have known perhaps a thousand others who have done senior theses or research with me. Once they have demonstrated the right to be taken seriously, I couldn't care less about the formalities. But this is a very different thing from the current efforts to bureaucratize flexibility, to institutionalize a spontaneous personal relationship between teacher and student (which in the cases I am describing becomes virtually a collegial relationship).

One professor I know had an "independent readings" course with 150 students. Harsh as it may sound, this is a racket, not an innovation. It makes a bad joke out of real standards, which are the main concern of the liberal academician.

An Editor's Tribute:

Strong Labor Movement Called Key to Health of Social Order

The following tribute to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the American labor movement was delivered at the 67th annual award luncheon of the League for Industrial Democracy in New York City, Apr. 29, 1972, by Midge Decter. Miss Decter is the managing editor of World magazine, former managing editor of Harpers magazine and author of many articles on social and politcal issues.

IT IS PERHAPS a breach of proper manners for me to begin my remarks on an occasion of a celebration such as this with a reference to the unhappy—I will not say unredeemed—decade through which this nation has just passed. Tributes ought to have a different relation to the past than that with which I have come here today—a tribute to you, Mr. Meany, less than to the principle it has been given you to embody and the movement it has been given you to lead.

A proper tribute should speak of the past in order to survey a great field of triumph—it should speak of great purposes defined and great ends achieved and should offer up some kind of collective congratulation.

Thus I must begin in what I am afraid is a somewhat socially inappropriate tone. For I mean to mention the recent past not in terms of its triumphs but in terms of its tribulations (nor have these tribulations departed the flesh of our body politic yet). I mean to speak not of high purposes enunciated but rather of ordinary purposes sundered by and in confusion.

These past five years have not been happy years for the labor movement; they cannot have been altogether happy years for you either, Mr. Meany. I presume to make such a judgment, though I am of course a stranger to the daily work and circumstance which must in the end be the true life of the labor movement. Indeed, I claim a kind of primary right to make such a judgment—because as an intellectual and a working journalist I have been living for these same years disquietingly close (one might say in the very heartlands) of the source of that unhappiness. I mean, of course, the question of the place of the labor movement in fashionable political opinion—and most particularly, and particularly unhappily, in fashionable advanced liberal opinion.

Those who had once been labor's most natural allies, namely, the reformist intellectuals and the seemingly most vocal of my colleagues in the liberal press, had abandoned the labor movement for a rapid succession of self-styled and, alas, infinitely more romantic proletariats: glamorous swashbucklers among the heralds of racial revolution; students; women.

I need not go through the whole sodden history here. What is important to note is that beneath the particular details of the ever-lengthening indictment of labor being brought by its erstwhile and now so-fickle allies among the intellectuals and liberal journalists ran a single unbroken and unspoken thread of attitude. The labor movement was being charged with having had the bad taste and graceless temerity to achieve a wholesome number of its purposes.

The success of the labor movement—that very success it would have been so much more appropriate for me simply to celebrate this afternoon—in having established its now-inalienable right to live and grow and pursue the ordinary daily interests of its constituency is what, I am afraid, has brought about the alienation of our noisy intelligentsia from this movement.

There are, no doubt, several reasons for this. One might point to the spiritual quirk among so many intellectuals by which they are enslaved to the love of those who cannot live and grow and recognize the simple outlines of their own best interest but rather must continue to suffer in futile and grandiose hopelessness. One might suggest of such intellectuals and leftist journalists that they tend to a romantically brutal disdain for the terms and limitations of everyday existence—including, I might add, even their own.

In essence, though, I think the most important account of this recent alienation is the simplest: that is, that in the success of the labor movement lies the indispensable guarantee of the success of the American social order itself.

A weak labor movement, embodying and symbolizing the inability of American institutions and social processes to accommodate the basic needs of the majority of its citizenry—such a weak labor movement could have remained the object of deepest piety.

The labor movement we actually have, however—which, despite the long road it has yet to travel in the establishment of economic justice, has yet become the single most powerful vindication of the American social order—was bound on that very account to have become instead the object of hostility.

AMERICA'S MOST richly rewarded intellectuals do not wish to see the American social order succeed. They wish to see it fail. Its failure, of course, would sap the roots of the existence of these intellectuals as much as it would those of any other Americans.

But it is the luxury of the stability that you and your movement, Mr. Meany, have brought to the American social order—and will continue to maintain on its, and on all our, behalf—which makes it possible for the free-thinking, free-speaking, comfortable and secure enemies of that order to continue in the plying of their reckless trade.

As the nations of Western Europe—secure under the American nuclear umbrella, liberated from the palling economic necessities of their own defense—were freed thereby to become heedless critics of American foreign policy, so have my colleagues—under the umbrella of the success of American pluralist society in general, and of the labor movement in particular—been freed to deplore, as recklessly and self-servingly as they wish, the fruits of both our political liberty and our economic achievement.

Some of us beneath that umbrella, however, do remember that it is here and stop from time to time—as we do here this afternoon—to bless our fate.

Administration Proposal Hit:

Sub-Minimum Wage No Cure For High Teenage Joblessness

A SUBSTANDARD minimum wage the Nixon Administration is proposing for teenagers would neither create new jobs for young workers nor spur the economy toward expanded job opportunities to cut high unemployment, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald declared.

"Jobs are created by demand in the economy," not by cutting the minimum wage, Oswald stressed. He noted that the below-par wage for teenagers urged by Administration spokesmen would have no effect on "teenage employment and unemployment"—a fact borne out by a "detailed, year-long study . . . the Labor Dept. itself commissioned."

A much more effective approach, he said, would be a higher minimum wage for all those at the lowest end of the economy, which would give them more purchasing power and spur demand for goods and services.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Oswald renewed organized labor's call for long-overdue improvement and expansion of the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. He pointed out that low-wage workers who get raises only when the law is updated have had no improvement since 1966—a six-year period during which "inflation has been eating away at everyone's paycheck."

Oswald said the AFL-CIO is working for passage of minimum wage improvement and expansion measures sponsored by Rep. John Dent (D-Pa.) and Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.). Both measures, he said, would extend the law's coverage to millions of the nation's lowest-paid workers, such as employes of state and local governments and household domestics, who are now denied the badly needed protection.

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE COMMONEST ARGUMENTS by editorial writers and the Nixon Administration is that no matter how many American jobs are lost, "free trade" is essential. Yet few of them take the trouble to examine today's international trade world to determine whether "free trade" is a shibboleth or a reality.

That "free trade" as a goal is desirable, few will question. But, today's reality is that there has been a tremendous change in trade patterns since the United States abandoned its old high tariff policies of the early century. After more than 20 years of export of American capital and technology, the United States for the first time in almost a century now finds itself on the short end of the trade stick.

While we talk of "free trade," how much actual "free trade" exists?

The answer is that foreign doors to American imports are being shut off by a great number of schemes that businessmen abroad have helped devise for their own advantage.

The Administration itself is the best witness to that fact. Take one example:

Henry Kearns, president of the U.S. Export-Import Bank, made a speech the other day before the American Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong—that center of cheap-labor competition for the American textile and other industries.

Kearns speech was a paean of praise for the success of the businessmen of Hong Kong and their "willing"—if low-paid—workers to build up an astonishing export business with the United States including "labor-intensive clothing, textiles, electronics and other industries" that exceeded $1 billion last year.

"It is truly amazing," Kearns continued, "to note that this tiny area is a major trading partner of the United States. Our trade with you far exceeds the amount we do with all but a handful of major industrialized nations and it has an imbalance that is more than 2 to 1 in your favor. In other words, we sell less than half as much to you as we buy from you. We take 42 percent of all your exports. You take less than 1 percent of ours. This is a one-sided partnership by any measure."

Or, take another speech, this one made by Eugene T. Rossides, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of enforcement of tariff and trade affairs, before the Italy-America Chamber of Commerce in New York.

Rossides made a speech in favor of Nixon policies and fair and free trade, but he, too, painted a picture of one-sided trade policies by other nations. Rossides said:

"When our foreign friends complained about the temporary 10 percent additional duty adopted as part of the President's new economic program, they did not mention in their complaints the barriers they maintain against U.S. exports to their countries.

"Those barriers take various forms—quotas no longer justified by economic factors, discriminating taxes such as progressive taxes on horsepower directed at the export of U.S. automobiles, discriminatory tariff arrangements such as the Common Market preferences and reverse preferences, which established a lower tariff on the exports of Common Market members than on those of the U.S. and others into third markets, both in developing and developed countries. These were not wiped out by the Smithsonian Agreement. We have a long way to go in order to achieve for American industry a fair break in international trade."

Where does this leave a true "free trade" policy that the United States adheres to and Europe's most industrialized nations do not?

"We have a long way to go . . . ," Rossides said.

These are key words of tremendous import to American workers who are losing their jobs. "Free trade . . . fair trade . . . fair competition . . ." these are desirable goals. But until they are achieved American workers have a right to expect that today's trade realities will be faced and the slogans of the past re-examined for their truth.

THE SUB-MINIMUM WAGE for young workers the Nixon Administration is pushing in Congress would neither create new jobs nor spur expanded job opportunities to stem high unemployment, AFL-CIO Economist Rudolph Oswald, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Michael Posner, left, of Reuters news service and Ronald Sarro of the Washington Evening Star. The program is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

AT EXECUTIVE COUNCIL session, AFL-CIO Vice Presidents George Hardy and Matthew Guinan discuss a resolution. Hardy, left, is president of the Service Employes; Guinan heads the Transport Workers.

Job Safety Law Keyed To Strict Enforcement

A call for strict federal enforcement of job safety standards was issued by the more than 900 delegates to the 29th convention of the Operating Engineers in Washington, D.C.

The convention urged Congress to double appropriations for field inspectors charged with enforcing the Occupational Health & Safety Act. It asked Congress to bring the number of field inspectors to at least 3,000. Currently, there are only 350.

A related resolution called on the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health to expand its number and rate of hazard evaluation surveys.

In other action, delegates charged that tens of thousands of steam and water boilers in the nation are entrusted to untrained personnel at great risk to workers as well as the public.

A resolution on the situation asked that the Labor Dept. develop federal standards for the training of workers who operate and maintain boilers.

Other resolutions urged enactment of the National Health Security program, opposed the Nixon Administration's proposed national sales tax and called for investigation of the concentration of economic and financial power in the United States—especially "the interlocking relationships between . . . corporations and banks, their control of key parts of America's economy and their impact on free democratic institutions such as collective bargaining. . . ."

The IUOE convention, which marked the 75th anniversary of the union, also went on record as favoring the right to strike for all public employes and the enactment of legislation on the federal, state and local levels to guarantee workers in the public sector the right to self-organization and collective bargaining.

IUOE Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman and 10 international vice presidents were re-elected by acclamation.

And delegates amended the union's constitution to add an 11th vice president's seat on the executive board to give Canadian members a greater opportunity for election to international offices.

Another constitutional amendment raised the salary of the president from $75,000 to $90,000, of the secretary treasurer from $60,000 to $63,500, and of international vice presidents from $22,500 to $25,000.

Constitutional age limits for union office holders also were modified by an amendment which provides that an officer who reaches the age of 70 may serve out his term, but that members already 70 may not be nominated or elected to international or local offices.

Funds, Staff Called Key to Prison Reform

The AFL-CIO supports programs to make correctional institutions into places dealing with the real needs of inmates and helping prepare them for productive lives as they re-enter society.

To achieve this goal a firm commitment to finance and train manpower is necessary, the federation's Executive Council said in concurring with a resolution referred to it by the last AFL-CIO convention.

The resolution introduced by the Industrial Union Dept. said that a racially integrated staff, decent pay, adequate equipment, effective training, a good retirement plan and reasonable working conditions are all involved in programs to improve prisons and other correctional institutions.

The council deferred action, sent to various AFL-CIO committees for further study and non-concurred in other resolutions referred to it by the convention.

D.C. Broadens $2.25 Pay Floor

The minimum wage for 43,000 service trade workers in the District of Columbia will rise from the present $1.60 level to $2.25 an hour on June 13.

The union-sought increase was unanimously approved by the D.C. minimum wage board for a group that includes all employes of hotels, restaurants and apartment houses, along with food service employes of schools, hospitals and retail stores.

A $2.25 pay floor has been in effect since last August for clerical and semi-technical workers in the nation's capital, including nurses' aides and medical and dental assistants. Other groups, including manufacturing workers, are still at the $1.60 level.

To Restore Political Rights:

Government Unions Press For Revision Of Hatch Act

Unions representing government workers called on Congress to overhaul the Hatch Act and restore the political rights of millions of public employes.

Testimony by AFL-CIO affiliates at hearings held by the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee stressed that the original intent of the 1939 law was to protect federal workers from being forced to contribute to or work for political candidates in order to keep their jobs.

That intent can be preserved, the union witnesses said, without the present limitations on the right of government employes to take an active part in political activities voluntarily.

Following are excerpts from testimony during the two days of Senate hearings:

● John A. McCart, operations director, AFL-CIO Government Employes Council: "Federal employes have the impression, justified or not, that existing limitations on their political rights can be best observed by remaining completely apolitical. The current law and its administration have induced an attitude on the part of many workers that the safest course is to take no part whatsoever in the political life of the community."

● John F. Griner, president, American Federation of Government Employes: "Government employes won't be first class citizens until they are free to run for any elective office they desire and to participate fully in every other political action which is lawful for other citizens. The only legislation which is needed is legislation which protects government employes in their rights to freedom in the political area without fear of reprisal."

● Patrick J. Nilan, legislative director, American Postal Workers Union: "The Hatch Act constitutes an outstanding example of legislative overkill. To correct some existing evils, many of the most fundamental constitutional rights of all federal and many state and local employes are completely denied to them. The exercise of these rights by these employes can cost them their livelihood and even possibly subject them to criminal penalties."

● W. H. Ryan, coordinator of Machinists Government Employes Dept., testifying for AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.: "It is our contention that all citizens—irrespective of race, color, religion, national origin or employment status—should be encouraged and protected in the exercise of their full citizenship responsibilities. Protection should be maintained against coercion and intimidation against any employe. . . . This protection could be afforded by the establishment of a tripartite independent board of three persons to investigate and make decisions on such charges."

● James H. Rademacher, president, Letter Carriers: "We urge that all prohibitions on voluntary political activity be repealed. The right of government employes to status as first-class citizens may not have been widely recognized in 1939 when the Hatch Act was passed, or in 1947, when its constitutionality was upheld by the Supreme Court in a 4-3 vote, but it certainly is the law today."

● Jack A. Waller, legislative representative, Fire Fighters: "Each time the federal government makes grants to state and local governments for the hiring or the assistance in hiring of people to fill local government jobs, another group of people is covered by the Hatch Act. . . . Freedom of speech and freedom of association are two of the most important concepts in a democracy. We cannot and should not compromise an individual's constitutional rights because of passé legislation such as the Hatch Act."

● Henry Wilson, legislative director to Federal-Public Service Division of the Laborers: "The trade union movement, because its very existence and future depend on policies established by Acts of Congress, must be an active political body in endorsing candidates and supporting those who act most favorably in the legislative interests of organized workers. Public employes of necessity, because of the peculiar nature of bargaining in the public sector, must be active politically. Public employe unions should have at least the ability to function in the political arena in the same way that the unions have in the private sector."

Meany Refutes Claim Of Fast-Rising Wages

A Washington Post story indicating that wages rose at a faster pace than prices during the first three months of 1972 "presents a distorted picture of the actual record," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany charged in a letter to the newspaper.

The story was based on a Bureau of Labor Statistics report that compensation per hour, in the January-March quarter of this year, rose at an 8.6 percent yearly rate, as against the last quarter of 1971.

"The actual record of recent wage trends, however, is quite different from your politically slanted story, which is presented as a refutation of the AFL-CIO's views," Meany said.

The BLS record shows, Meany noted, that the average hourly earnings of production and nonsupervisory employes in the private non-farm economy were $3.57 in March. They were up only 2 cents from February and merely 3 cents from January.

"These facts hardly square with your story's account of a very great rise in wages.

"Moreover, had your reporter carefully examined the BLS report on hourly compensation, he would have found the following statement: 'The large increases in hourly compensation (reported in the January-March quarter) not only reflected the expected bulge following the Phase I freeze period, but also reflected retroactive wage payments and the impact of increased employer contributions to social security,' " Meany said.

After accounting for the impact of backpay for the August-November freeze period and increased social security payments, the rise in wages and fringe benefits in the January-March quarter was at a yearly rate of 6 percent—close to the Pay Board's 5.5 percent wage control standard.

"While increases in wages have been held down, close to the Pay Board's 5.5 percent standard, prices have been rising far out of line with the Price Commission's 2.5 percent control standard," Meany observed.

"That helps to explain the soaring profits in recent months reported in your financial pages.

"So the record substantiates the AFL-CIO's case," Meany's letter said. "Wage increases are being controlled, within range of the Administration's wage control standard. But prices are rising much faster than the government's price control standard. And profits have begun to soar, without even the pretense of controls."

Rail Board's Proposal Disappointing to Union

Leaders of the Sheet Metal Workers on railroads met to decide their next course of action in the aftermath of a "very disappointing" presidential emergency board report on the union's 18-month dispute with the carriers.

Meanwhile, another emergency board investigating a dispute over crew sizes involving the United Transportation Union and the Penn Central Railroad was scheduled to submit its report by May 15 if it does not succeed in mediating efforts.

Sheet Metal Workers Vice Pres. W. J. O'Brien, who heads the union's rail membership, offered the initial reaction to the board's recommendations in the wage-rules disputes.

He said the union's general chairmen would study the proposal further and seek additional meetings with the carriers before accepting or rejecting it. Under the Railway Labor Act, the 6,000 Sheet Metal Workers on the railroads will be free to strike May 31.

The board, appointed by Pres. Nixon to head off a possible earlier strike even though the union had not threatened one, recommended that the union accept a 42 percent wage increase over a 42-month period, which has been the pattern of previous rail union settlements.

The Sheet Metal Workers are seeking larger increases on the basis of skills, cost-of-living adjustments and abolishment of a controversial rule imposed by Congress in 1970 to permit crossing of union craft lines in some cases. The board recommended some changes in the rule but refused to propose its elimination.

In final arguments before its board, the UTU urged it to order further bargaining on Penn Central's demands for crew reductions.

The carrier also asked the board to propose further negotiations but wants the bargaining to be terminated by compulsory arbitration.

Meanwhile, both sides agreed to give the Board an extension from May 1 to May 15 on its deadline for reporting. This means the parties must maintain the "status quo" until June 15.

League for Industrial Democracy:

Meany Honored as Worker Spokesman

By Rex Hardesty

New York—The League for Industrial Democracy presented its 67th annual award to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in recognition of "his blunt and outspoken defense of the rights of workers."

In accepting, Meany continued to speak out for workers and attacked the Nixon Administration as a machine designed for redistributing the wealth through massive tax giveaways to business while wages are effectively controlled.

Meany cited recent White House statements on school busing and crime in Washington, D.C., as examples of the art of deception "as practiced by the best talent Madison Avenue can provide."

He observed that Pres. Nixon sounded good on television, outlining his plan for a moratorium on busing while committing the nation to a massive investment in quality education.

But, Meany said, the recommendation on busing was patently unconstitutional, and every cent of the $2.75 billion to aid education was money already budgeted.

The Nixon plan to curb crime, Meany said, needs a television camera "and a Rose Garden also helps." First you pick the highest crime month in history, November 1969, and you bide your time watching for a low month—"preferably a short month."

Then you call the chief of police into the Rose Garden, Meany said, and announce the crime problem is solved, using the figures from the two months.

Meany's free-wheeling presentation to the audience of about 1,100 included alternate readings from "The Thoughts of Chairman Mao" and the texts from Nixon's 1968 campaign speeches.

In arraying new arguments for the election year, Meany suggested, the Administration might try the truth—"except that it would cause massive cardiac failure."

The two-day conference, titled "72 and Beyond" featured two panel discussions. In the panel on the economy, AFL-CIO Research Director Nat Goldfinger termed the Nixon economic policy of shifting income to the wealthy a "violation of social ethics." Yale Prof. Henry Wallich, a member of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Eisenhower administration, said "labor's chances for increasing its income by absorbing a larger part of the total are limited, because it already has so large a part of that total."

The other panel, on politics and race, included Don Slaiman, AFL-CIO Director of Civil Rights, Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; and Ben Wattenberg, co-author of the 1970 book, "The Real Majority," and a campaign aide to Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.).

The nation still faces many civil rights problems, the panel agreed, with the most important in the economic arena. Thus when economic issues are stressed in the 1972 elections, this will work to the benefit of pro-civil rights, liberal forces, the panelists said, whereas emphasis on social issues will tend to help the anti-civil rights candidates.

In the program honoring Meany:

Rustin described the AFL-CIO president as a man who speaks his mind and shuns "the cliches, rhetoric and press agentry" that go into building a favorable "image."

Penn Kemble, director of the Frontlash youth voter project, noted that only Meany and COPE answered the call for help to register "the less affluent youngsters who don't belong to the elite campus clubs" after the Frontlash idea had been rejected by the foundations and others.

Albert Shanker, president of Local 2 of the American Federation of Teachers, recited the growth and strength of the labor movement among white-collar workers, minorities and the young under Meany's leadership.

EXPENDITURES FOR HEALTH CARE under National Health Security will be far lower than under the present delivery system, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) tells the 500 delegates to the Steelworkers National Health Care Conference in Washington.

Strict Sanctions Sought Against Regime in Haiti

The AFL-CIO called on the U.S. government and international agencies to impose "strict economic sanctions against Haiti" until the new regime on the island ends its "despotic denial of all human rights and freedoms."

The "mere promises" of a "youthful tyrant" are not sufficient "to right the terrible wrongs inflicted upon the Haitian people by a government universally condemned for its savage rule," the federation's Executive Council declared.

The council statement called on the Administration, in addition, to spare no effort to have the new regime permit the Organization of American States, the International Commission of Jurists and the International Labor Organization to send observers to Haiti to assemble the facts on the status of human rights and social justice. It urged also that representatives of the AFL-CIO and ORIT be allowed to visit the country to determine the conditions under which Haitian workers and peasants live and work.

The AFL-CIO called also for the U.S. Dept. of Commerce to stop acting as a "promoter of joblessness for American workers and miserably low wages for Haitian workers" by touting the island's low wages and poor conditions to American firms.

The council traced the long opposition of the AFL-CIO to the "outrageous excesses" of the tyrannical regime of the late "Papa Doc" Duvalier and the U.S. government's support of the "gangster regime" despite labor protests. The succession of Duvalier's son Jean Claude and the dispatch of a "good will commission" to the United States earlier this year to sell the new "enlightenment" is open to grave doubts, the council added.

The only way to determine the situation is to allow an inspection by responsible bodies of actual conditions in Haiti, the council stressed, urging also that the United Nations demand unconditional amnesty for all exiles and freedom for all political prisoners in Haiti.

Nixon Urged To Be Wary at Moscow Talks

release of American prisoners of war.

- Refuse to accept the status quo in Central and Eastern Europe as legitimate and final, a key Soviet goal, because it would aggravate present tensions by "legitimizing the fruits of aggression."
- Obtain assurances from the Soviet Union of the right of citizens of Jewish origin to emigrate from the USSR and go to Israel or any other country of their choice.
- Gain Soviet support for the position that peace between Israel and the Arabs "can be based only on an agreement between the parties and that agreement can be achieved only through negotiations between them."
- Secure permission to allow a United Nations commission to visit the Soviet zone and East Berlin to determine the feasibility of holding free elections throughout all of Germany.

The council statement concluded:

"Obviously, world tension can be reduced and eliminated only when its causes are reduced or removed. In this realization we offer our proposals for presentation by Pres. Nixon at the summit in Moscow. Relations with the USSR are of the highest importance in our country's efforts to assure our national security and the maintenance of world peace. We are confident that the peoples of the Soviet Union as well as the American people long for the day when both great countries can live in peace and harmony."

TWUA Wins Vote At Carolina Mill

Johnsonville, S.C.—Employes of Wellman Industries here chose to be represented by the Textile Workers Union of America in a second election ordered by the National Labor Relations Board because of the company's anti-union tactics in a previous organizing campaign.

Of 1,156 employes eligible to vote, 557 voted for the TWUA and 466 voted for no union. There were 46 challenged ballots, and 3 were declared void.

Wellman Industries, a wool-combing and synthetic fiber firm, was the subject of an article by author Bill Moyers for Harpers magazine in which he described the "feudalistic" atmosphere created in this city by Wellman management.

Overhaul Prescribed For Ailing Health Care

The faltering health care system needs a complete overhaul to provide the services Americans require and can afford, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy told the Steelworkers National Health Care Conference.

The Massachusetts Democrat, who is the chief sponsor of National Health Security in the Senate, said that health care users are now paying twice as much as they should for services.

"You've got a system that puts the doctors and hospitals first," while the patients get second class service, he stressed, adding that the existing health care program "is the fastest growing failing business in the country."

He termed the continued deterioration of the health care one of the great failures of the Nixon Administration. He classed it with Pres. Nixon's other broken promises on the economy, job safety and the war.

National Health Security, Kennedy told the 500 conference delegates, is the only proposal before Congress that would bring comprehensive reform to the existing delivery system to provide enough doctors and facilities to meet the nation's needs.

These goals can be achieved through Health Security without the nation spending any new money, but by making better use of existing expenditures for health care, Kennedy stressed.

He said alternative proposals to Health Security were not written with the best interest of the health care user in mind. Doctors, hospitals and insurance companies would be the prime beneficiaries, he charged.

Kennedy singled out the Nixon health care proposal in particular, describting it as the "Insurance Industry Act of 1972."

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller acknowledged that the labor-supported Health Security bill is not likely to clear Congress this year. But despite the stiff fight it faces Biemiller predicted that the measure will eventually be adopted.

He warned, however, that congressional backers of the bill would need the cooperation of working people and urged the conference delegates to take the health care issue back to their members.

Biemiller recalled long legislative battles for the enactment of Medicare and the Hill-Burton hospital construction program. He said that only when the issues got firm support of the public did Congress react.

At the close of the two-day conference, delegates voted their unanimous support for the Health Security plan.

Activities Schedule For Studies Center

The AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center will conduct four institutes during May and June to close out the 1971-72 term. They are:

Effective Union Action in Civil Rights, May 8-12.

New Staff Program, third phase, May 14-June 9.

Man and His Environment, May 15-19.

Seminar for Technicians and Engineers, June 12-16.

Elevator Union Strike Pledged Full Support

A month-long strike by 15,000 members of the Elevator Constructors received the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council which called on the forces of organized labor "to do everything in their power to help these strikers in their campaign to gain a measure of economic justice."

The strike, against the National Elevator Industry, Inc., began Mar. 30 after management terminated negotiations on a new nationwide contract covering workers who install, erect and maintain elevators and escalators. A separate contract for Elevator Constructors in New York City only, expires later this year.

"The strike was called," the Executive Council observed, "when the employers cavalierly terminated the extended collective bargaining agreement. The employers refused to budge on any of the issues and are now trying to break the strike by taking away the welfare benefits the workers have earned over the years."

Pres. R. Wayne Williams of the Elevator Constructors said the impasse involved wages as well as a management proposal to transfer some jobs outside the union's jurisdiction.

Non-Union Shops Exempted:

Kirkland Attacks New Decontrol Rule

Rumsfeld said that the 5 million firms account for 28 percent of the nation's sales—$500 billion—and that the 19 million workers employed by these firms account for 26 percent of all payroll employes in the country.

He said the government is relying on "competition" to exert "pay and price controls on these small businesses."

Rumsfeld maintained that the move would enable the Internal Revenue Service to assign an additional 900 agents to direct enforcement of the economic stabilization program.

The COLC action will have no effect on small firms in construction.

On the wage side of the construction industry, all union contracts—even in the smallest units—require prior approval by the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee.

But there is no price control in construction and the COLC did not establish any.

Wages of health service employes also are not exempted by the COLC action, although the council's announcement showed that only 7.6 percent of the health service industry is required to report on price increases.

And Pres. George Hardy of the Service Employes, which represents hospital and nursing home employes, said that singling out thousands of non-professional hospital workers for continued wage controls sentences them to "continued, locked-in poverty."

"Here are hundreds of thousands of hard-working employes whose lives are dedicated to caring for the nation's sick . . . hundreds of thousands of these nonprofessionals made from $1.60 to $2 an hour—real starvation wages in these days of inflation—yet the COLC sentences them to locked-in poverty by the $1.90 wage control standard."

When the decontrolling of the small firms is added to last February's exemption of about 75 percent of all retail stores and nearly half of all rental units, the picture stacks up as follows, according to the COLC:

- About $500 billion in sales is exempt from price control.
- Two-thirds of all sales of services—such as dry cleaning, and laundry—are not controlled.
- About 45 percent of all retail sales to the consumer are exempt from controls.

C. Jackson Grayson, Jr., chairman of the Price Commission seemed cool to the COLC decision to decontrol small firms and noted that his commission had recommended to the Administration that it "hold off" any more exemptions from controls until more evidence is available that the Phase 2 program is actually succeeding.

In other action, the Price Commission suspended pending price increases for more than 1,000 firms that were late in filing required reports.

Grayson said the firms could face price reductions and possible civil fines of $2,500 unless they file reports within five days of receiving the commission notices.

LONGSHOREMEN'S PACT for East and Gulf Coast dock workers should be approved, ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason tells members of the Pay Board, even if the settlement is above the board's guidelines. Gleason said planned increases in productivity make the pact noninflationary.

56 Key Areas On List of High Unemployment

Stamford, Conn., was added to the Labor Dept.'s list of major labor markets with "substantial" unemployment, making April the 14th consecutive month that a third or more of the nation's 150 major labor areas have been so classified.

The addition of Stamford brought the total to 56 major labor areas with substantial unemployment, which the Labor Dept. defines as a jobless rate of at least 6 percent with the level expected to persist for at least two more months.

A 10-year high was reached last October when 65 areas were on the list.

The Labor Dept. said that 15 smaller labor areas were added to the substantial list and that six others were removed, raising that total to 835 in April.

Seattle continued to be hardest hit of any major U.S. city with a jobless rate of 13.7 percent, due mainly to cutbacks in the aerospace industry. Two Puerto Rican cities had higher rates—Ponce with 17.5 percent and Mayaguez with 14.1 percent.

Delegates Vote 2-Step Raise In UTW Dues

Miami Beach—The United Textile Workers voted to raise the union's dues to $5, effective immediately, and to $6 on Jan. 1, 1974. The constitutional amendment was adopted at UTW's 18th regulation convention here.

Newly-elected Pres. Frank Schaufenbil had earlier thanked the delegates for the rank and file's cooperation in responding to an appeal for a voluntary increase in dues and per capita payments.

UTW had gone to its membership with its request for help prior to the convention, and about 85 percent of all the local unions responded by establishing a structure of $5 dues with a $2.50 per capita payment.

"Had it not been for the response by our local unions in helping us meet the financial problems of our organization, we would be in an extremely serious, if not impossible, financial condition today," Schaufenbil said.

For the fiscal year ended Mar. 31, 1972, UTW had a surplus of $24,135 after a deficit of $79,863 the year before. Schaufenbil pointed out that the surplus "is the result of staff reduction, a wholly unsatisfactory and dangerous approach."

Gleason Defends Pact At Pay Board Hearing

Longshoremen Pres. Thomas W. Gleason told the Pay Board that contracts covering more than 50,000 East and Gulf Coast dockers were not inflationary because of planned increases in productivity.

Gleason said work rule changes in the new contracts will provide increased productivity and cost savings over the life of the three-year pacts and that the board should take that fact into consideration.

"These contracts provide increases less than those granted by the Pay Board in this same industry" Gleason declared. "They provide even less in cost when proper credit is given for reduction in past costs and for increased productivity."

But it became apparent that Gleason was faced with a hostile panel.

The Pay Board's own staff acknowledged that there would be increased output on the part of the dockers but refused to put a dollar value on it.

And "public" member Arnold Weber repeatedly indicated to Gleason that he felt dockers already had been compensated for any past increases in handling tonnage.

Basically the ILA pact raises base dock worker's pay by $1.50—70 cents this year and 40 cents in each of the two remaining years.

Both the union and longshore management disagreed with the Pay Board analysis of the total value of the wage and fringe benefit package.

Gleason and management officials placed the value of first year increases at 8.1 percent for major Atlantic ports, 9.2 percent for New Orleans and 13.8 percent for the West Gulf ports.

The Pay Board staff however valued the increases at 12.1 percent for the Atlantic ports and a 14.4 percent for New Orleans. It agreed with the ILA assessment of the West Gulf settlement.

Although the money increase is the same in all ports there was a great deal of variation in fringe-benefit and work rule agreements from port to port.

"I am no economist" Gleason said "but I do know that when you move much more cargo with a lot fewer men and millions of less man-hours it must follow that productivity has greatly increased."

On the West Coast the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen planned to seek an escrow agreement with the Pacific Maritime Association after a federal judge ruled there was no legal barrier to their request that increases denied by the Pay Board be placed in escrow until such time as they are permitted.

House Defies Veto Threat to Pass Federal Employe Health Benefits Bill

There was additional good news for 214,000 of the federal government's hourly paid blue-collar workers.

They will receive retroactivity ranging from two weeks to three months on pay adjustments that were delayed by a presidential order holding up area surveys of prevailing wages.

The Senate approved intact a House-passed bill that had the backing of both the Administration and unions. It provides back pay for workers whose pay adjustments came later than scheduled because of the delays in the wage surveys.

In other congressional developments:

The Senate voted 57-15 to restore a crippling slash in funds for the U.S. Information Agency in a bipartisan rebuff to Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. William Fulbright (D-Ark.).

Fulbright had demanded the 25 percent fund cut to protest the Administration's refusal to turn over documents outlining USIA goals in various countries.

Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.) led the fight for restoration of the funds.

The Senate voted 51-15 approval of so-called "fair credit billing" legislation. But its original sponsors were among those voting against it on the grounds that it was so weakened by the Senate Banking Committee that it no longer could be considered a consumer bill.

In fact, Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) suggested, it might well be retitled the Bank Protection Act.

The bill as passed would require creditors to mail their bills at least 14 days before the deadline for avoiding a late payment charge, acknowledge billing disputes within 30 days and resolve them within 90 days, and identify each transaction on bills sent to customers.

On the minus side, it would limit the amount of damages groups of consumers could claim in "class action" suits filed under the Truth-in-Lending Act. The limitation of $100,000 applies also to suits now pending in courts.

The Senate rejected a series of amendments designed to restore provisions of the original bill that would:

- Prohibit billing customers for merchandise not yet delivered.
- Allow consumers to withhold payment for defective merchandise paid for with a bank credit card on the same basis as if they were billed directly by the seller.
- Prohibit retroactive finance charges on revolving credit accounts. At present, a customer who pays $90 of a $100 bill can still be charged interest on the full $100.

Vietnam Labor Issues Appeal For Backing

Saigon—The Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT) in a May Day message has appealed to workers of other countries to better understand the struggle and tragedy of workers and peasants of South Vietnam.

"Many of you are signing petitions for peace in Vietnam," the CVT noted. "We too, with all our hearts, long for peace. But the only peace we are offered is to prostrate ourselves in front of invading Communist divisions. . . ."

"What a tragedy to see some union leaders abroad marching in support of Hanoi, a dictatorial and despotic regime that has not only suppressed the free trade union movement in North Vietnam, but systematically seeks to assassinate free trade union leaders in South Vietnam," the CVT message said.

House Votes Nixon Plan To Delay $2

By David L. Perlman

A labor-supported minimum wage bill was gutted by a conservative coalition in the House.

The final version of the bill sent to the Senate bore little resemblance to the legislation that had been approved by the House Labor Committee.

After most Republicans and conservative southern Democrats had joined to chop it up with a series of amendments, the House bill matched almost exactly the proposals made by the Nixon Administration a year ago. The key vote was a 218-192 victory for the conservative coalition.

As passed by the House:

- Most workers now at the $1.60 minimum wage level would go to a $1.80 wage floor 60 days after the bill becomes law and to $2 a year after that.

Under the original House bill, they would have moved immediately to the $2 level.

- Those workers brought under the Fair Labor Standards Act for the first time in 1966—including large numbers of low-paid retail, hospital, hotel, restaurant and laundry workers—would only move up to $1.70 this year. One year later, they would go to $1.80—and would be relegated to second-class status at 20 cents an hour below other covered workers.

The original House bill would have moved them to $1.80 this year and the full $2 rate next year.

- Employers would be able to hire teenagers at $1.60 an hour or 20 percent below the applicable minimum wage if that should be higher at some future time.

The committee bill would have made it easier for employers to hire full-time students for part-time jobs at 85 percent of the minimum wage, but would have required payment of the full minimum to out-of-school youngsters.

- In both the final version and the committee bill, farm workers who are now held to a $1.30 minimum would go to $1.50 this year and $1.70 next year.

The biggest difference is in added coverage.

The labor-supported committee bill would have extended coverage to millions of public employes not now covered—and to domestic household workers. It also would have gradually eliminated the overtime exemptions under present law for various groups including transit workers, argicultural processing workers and nursing home employes.

Under the Republican-sponsored substitute passed by the House, there would be no additional cov-

Longshoremen, Shippers Protest Pay Board Slash

PAY BOARD PROTEST was staged by 500 members of Laundry & Dry Cleaning Local 141 in Pittsburgh after a 40-cent hourly wage increase negotiated for the low-wage workers was turned down. Many of the workers were making only $1.94 hourly, just 4 cents above the wage level exempt from Pay Board controls. The union has filed an appeal. (Story, Page 3.)

Panel Urged To Restore Full Raise

By Tom Castor

The Longshoremen and East and Gulf Coast shipping firms jointly called on the Pay Board to reconsider its action rolling back a first-year wage increase for dock workers from 70 cents an hour to 55 cents.

The decision came after both the union and the North Atlantic Shipping Association expressed disappointment at the Pay Board action and agreed to joint sessions of their respective negotiating committees in New York "to consider the nature of future action."

The first such meeting is scheduled for May 17.

ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason and management representatives contended that the Pay Board had given insufficient weight to improvements in productivity, new savings that would accrue to employers through changes in guaranteed annual income provisions, modified work rules and reductions in the size of work gangs.

The Pay Board's own staff reported to the seven-member panel that there would be increases in productivity over the life of the three-year agreement, but would not say how much or place a dollar value on the anticipated gains.

The agreement, covering more than 50,000 Longshoremen from Maine to Texas, provided a wage increase of $1.50 an hour—70 cents in the first year, retroactive to last

Pay Chiseling At $74 Million In Nine Months

By John R. Oravec

Employers illegally underpaid workers more than $74 million in the nine months ended Mar. 20, according to statistics released by the Labor Dept.'s Employment Standards Administration.

The underpayments, reflected in the paychecks of 371,255 workers, were mainly in violation of the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Underpayments discovered by wage-hour investigators totaled $74.2 million for the nine months, an increase of about $2 million from the comparable period a year earlier. Minimum wage violations amounted to $23.7 million, about Conventions to Vote:

Pulp, Paper Unions Agree on Merger

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The executive boards of two AFL-CIO unions representing 350,000 workers in the pulp and paper industry reached a merger agreement here.

The merger would unite the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers and the United Papermakers & Paperworkers. If the agreement is approved at conventions of the two unions in Denver this August, the new organization will be known as the United Paper Workers International Union.

Announcement of the merger agreement came at the conclusion of a three-day meeting of the unions' executive boards from Pres.-Sec. Joseph P. Tonelli of the Pulp-Sulphite union and Pres. Harry D. Sayre of the UPP.

Under terms of the agreement, Tonelli will become president of the new union and Sayre will be senior executive vice president.

Both unions have been considering the merger for a number of years. Convention resolutions adopted by the UPP three years ago and the Pulp-Sulphite union last year directed the officers and boards to step up merger talks.

The merger agreement will be the first order of business at the UPP's triennial convention and a special convention of the Pulp-Sulphite union to be held simultaneously in Denver starting Aug. 7. If delegates from both unions approve the agreement, they will then meet in joint session.

The two organizations currently have more than 1,600 local unions in the United States and Canada — many covering overlapping jurisdictions and areas.

Both unions trace their history to the turn of the century. The

Jobless Rate Remains Near 6 Percent Level

The unemployment situation among American workers continued to stagnate during April as the jobless rate remained at 5.9 percent —the 18th straight month that it has held near 6 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The BLS also announced that wholesale prices continued to climb—by three-tenths of 1 percent during last month—despite a drop in food prices.

The Wholesale Price Index, regarded as a barometer of future increases in consumer prices, rose to 117.5 percent of its 1967 base. This meant that wholesale goods priced at $100 in 1967, now cost retailers $117.50.

The price of industrial commodities, usually viewed as the most significant indicator of inflation, rose three-tenths of 1 percent,

2 New Surveys Confirm Corporate Profits Boom

Two more surveys of corporate profits tend to confirm earlier forecasts that the first quarter of 1972 may well be a record profit-making period for American business.

The First National City Bank of New York reported that after-tax profits of 1,561 leading corporations totaled $8.8 billion in the first three months of the year—13 percent above the first quarter of 1971.

The Wall Street Journal conducted a survey of 599 companies which showed that profits rose 11.7 percent over the like period of last year.

Earlier, Business Week magazine made an initial survey of the first quarter and predicted that when all figures are in, they probably would show American business earning money at an annual rate of better than $52 billion, far ahead of the record pace of 1966.

HIGH SCHOOL ESSAYIST Harry L. Gilbert of Reno, Nev., receives a gift volume on U.S. Presidents from AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton, right, and Gordon M. Freeman, president-emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Gilbert was the top winner in the 1972 "Ability Counts" essay contest sponsored by the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped. Forty-nine state and area winners were brought to Washington at the expense of AFL-CIO state federations and councils.

Training, Jobs Called Vital to Handicapped

America must remove the roadblocks confronting handicapped workers by expanding training programs and job opportunties, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Hunter P. Wharton told a group of young essayists from around the country.

Speaking at a luncheon honoring the high school essay contest winners during the 25th anniversary meeting of the President's Committee on Employment of the handicapped, Wharton noted that labor is deeply involved in the development of federal training programs and is proud of the progress made.

"But we are not satisfied," he stressed. "More and better rehabilitation and training programs are needed, and labor is going to fight for them.

And needed as much as training is a job in which to use that training, the Operating Engineers president pointed out.

Wharton, who is the labor committee chairman of the President's Committee, told the 49 state winners in the "Ability Counts" essay contest that organized labor is also fighting to overcome the social handicaps of poverty, poor health care and ignorance.

The first place winners from 46 states and three other jurisdictions —the District of Columbia, Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico—were brought to Washington at the expense of AFL-CIO state federations and councils.

Five contest entrants shared the $2,500 in prize money donated by the Disabled American Veterans. Four were high school seniors and one was a junior.

The first prize $1,000 Robert S. Marx Memorial Award went to Harry L. Gilbert of Reno, Nev. Other top winners were Renee Dunlap, Waverly, Iowa, $600; Joni Stripe, McAlester, Okla., $400; Laura Richardson, Newberry, S.C., $300, and Timothy W. Horan, Delanco, N.J., $200.

Objectives of the contest are to instill in young people positive attitudes toward physically and mentally handicapped persons in their age group. It also is an effort to focus national attention on the capabilities, potential and accomplishments of the handicapped.

National judges in the 1972 contest were Saul Miller, AFL-CIO director of publications; Paul Sonnabend, president of International Hotels Corp., and J. Harvey Daly, management consultant.

During their three-day stay in Washington, the young essayists visited labor unions, government agencies working with handicapped persons, veterans organizations and employer groups.

They were also taken on a sightseeing tour of the nation's capital and visits to national memorials by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

OCAW Wins Elections at 3 Companies

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers have added 1,500 new members in elections at three eastern companies where workers were previously represented by unaffiliated unions.

In a National Labor Relations Board election at a Union Carbide plastics and chemical plant in Bound Brook, N.J., OCAW received 541 votes to 506 for the independent union from among 1,250 hourly workers eligible to vote.

At Penn Drake Refining Co. in Petrolia, Pa., an independent union representing 192 employes conducted its own election on affiliation with OCAW, which received 102 votes while 35 votes were cast to remain with the former union.

In the third election, an unaffiliated union representing 85 members at a Texaco terminal in Pennsauken, N.J., voted 46 to 16 in favor of joining OCAW.

OCAW earlier had added 2,800 new members in elections conducted at American Oil Co., Continental Oil and Atlas Chemical Co.

To Build Democracy:

Labor Institute's Assistance Spurs Asian Trade Unionism

Much more than education—in the traditional sense of the word—is required to foster trade unionism, or democracy itself, among the peoples of Asia, according to Morris Paladino, executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

"One requisite is tangible evidence that a better life is possible," Paladino writes in the April issue of the Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine. And he notes that "for the most part this means mechanical equipment"—with agricultral equipment being the most urgently needed.

The science of agriculture and the lot of the farm worker in Asia both are in a far worse state than their industrial counterparts, the author states.

And unlike the United States, Asian farm labor traditionally is very much a part of the trade union movement. Tenant farmers, small landowners and individual commercial fishermen are as much union men as day laborers.

Consequently, the AAFLI—established in 1968 by the AFL-CIO and funded by the federation and the Agency for International Development—"furnishes irrigation pumps, sprayers and the like to farm unions and to labor-organized cooperatives."

"Such equipment is provided at cost, through interest-free loans under a system of revolving funds. As each purchase is paid for, the money is made available for additional purchases," Paladino says.

The institute has been able to show that free trade unions can improve the lot of the Asian people many times over.

For example:

"In Vietnam, a rice farmer using one of the 87 tractors the institute supplies to the Tenant Farmers Federation, an affiliate of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor (CVT), can do in one day what took five days behind a water buffalo."

"More than 800 farmers use the tractors on a cooperative basis. Three hundred manual pesticide sprayers are also in use. The results have been so good that 100 more tractors, 60 irrigation pumps and 400 sprayers have been authorized by the institute," Paladino writes.

In effect, he says, "what the institute does in Asia is strengthen the faith of working people in themselves and in each other; faith in the proposition that the only future worth having is one that they build for themselves, through institutions created and controlled by themselves."

For this reason, the underlying concept of the AAFLI is that it goes only where it is invited. Its programs have been developed in full partnership with unions in the countries involved and with the full knowledge of their governments.

The problem unique to the institute's effort to foster the growth of free trade unions is that in the 5,500 air miles between Ankara, Turkey, and the Philippines, there are more human beings in a greater diversity of cultures than anywhere else on earth.

The absence of democratic traditions as they are known in the United States compounds the problems of political fragmentation, economic instability, educational shortcomings and communications inadequacies that plague the underdeveloped nations.

Therefore, Paladino points out, the institute has no packaged programs, but must play it by ear, and uses local personnel wherever and whenever possible with a long-term view of developing trade unions that can stand on their own, financially and every other way.

The institute's work is divided into three major categories: education in all its aspects, from leadership training to communications to administrative planning; the supply and utilization of technical equipment, from typewriters to tractors, and the swift relief of emergency needs, which Paladino compares "to answering fire alarms."

Among the emergency relief projects Paladino mentions are:

- Aid to more than 40,000 Vietnamese tenant farmers and fishermen left hungry and destitute by a typhoon.
- Aid to 25,000 people left homeless in Manila by a disastrous fire that destroyed 3,000 dwellings.
- Improvements in dormitories for Korean bus conductors, nearly all of them young girls who did not have such social amenities as wash rooms.

"Upon these small deeds may depend the scope of human freedom in Asia," Paladino observes.

IBEW Safety Director On Pipeline Panel

Charles H. Tupper, safety director of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, has been appointed a public member of the Dept. of Transportation's Pipeline Safety Standards Committee.

Tupper's term on the 15-member committee runs through 1974. The committee is made up of government, industry and public members.

New Guidelines For Central Bodies On Involvement with Businesses

The following policy guidelines on involvement of central bodies with commercial enterprises was adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its May 2 meeting in Washington on the recommendation of the Advisory Committee to the Dept. of State and Local Central Bodies.

Increasingly, unions are looked upon by commercial enterprises as profitable channels through which to promote the sale of commodities or services. Endorsements by a central body, advertising in the labor press, issuance of discount cards and the use of mailing lists to reach union members are among the means sought by commercial, profit-making enterprises in an effort to secure a competitive advantage over rivals offering substantially the same commodities or services.

Insurance companies particularly are active in such promotions. Officers of central bodies have been offered "cash" money for mailing lists or an endorsement. Labor papers frequently carry special "advertising supplements" containing a business reply card to secure information about a policy "for union members only." Such policies range from health and accident to supplemental hospital and medical insurance. All legitimate and sound insurance companies have similar policies at similar rates. The chief result of the endorsement of one company by a central body is to give that particular company an advantage in selling its policy to union members. This is of no benefit to the central body or to the union member who buys as a consequence of the endorsement.

Discounts are generally available on most consumer products in one form or another. Unless the central body can negotiate a regular discount substantially lower than otherwise available, no service to members results from an endorsement or the distribution of discount cards or coupons.

For these reasons an endorsement by a central body of a commercial enterprise generally is not sound policy and is contrary to the purposes for which central bodies have been established by the AFL-CIO. No central body may permit the use of mailing lists in its possession for commercial purposes. Nor may a central body permit the use of advertising in a publication owned or endorsed by the central body which seeks to secure a competitive advantage by alleging or implying special prices and/or privileges for union members unless such benefits can be clearly established.

A legitimate distinction must be made between a service-oriented enterprise and a profit-making enterprise. In the former it is frequently possible to materially promote the interests of union members without compromising union principles. An example of a service-oriented enterprise which a central body should support is the organization and establishment of non-profit, prepaid, comprehensive group health plans to provide medical services to union members and their families and to the community. The AFL-CIO actively supports such plans and urges the State and Local Central Bodies to do likewise.

Some central bodies have become involved in eyeglasses and drug programs seeking to furnish the members of affiliated unions with these items at low cost. To the extent that such programs are the result of negotiated arrangements which include adequate control for the central body of prices and quality, and are not merely a means to promote greater sales for the benefit of the business, they are commendable and useful.

No central body may endorse, or engage in, or be involved with a commercial enterprise or non-profit organization unless such participation has been approved by the President of the AFL-CIO.

Hits Lax Safety Laws:

Abel Calls for Probe Of Mining Disaster

Pittsburgh—Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel called for a congressional investigation of the tragic disaster at the silver mine in Kellogg, Idaho, and strict new safety laws to prevent its repetition elsewhere.

Fire broke out in the Sunshine Silver mine almost a mile underground on May 2. More than 100 miners escaped that day, but 24 were killed immediately and almost 70 others were trapped in the blazing, smoke-filled tunnels. The death toll has since climbed to 47 and the fate of 44 others is unknown.

After a week, only two survivors emerged. They had subsisted on the sandwiches in the lunch pails of fellow workers in their section who had died from carbon monoxide poisoning.

Abel said that the "tragic loss of human life in the Idaho mine cries out for the immediate action by the federal government, . . . it reveals the gross inadequacies of the current mine safety law and its standards."

The Steelworkers had dispatched a team of officials to the Idaho mine disaster shortly after it occurred. The union represents miners of the Sunshine Co. through its USWA Local 5089.

"This is the worst rock mine disaster in the century," Abel noted. "It is a terrible tragedy and our hearts go out to the families of the miners who have lost their lives."

Abel said that the unsafe conditions at the Sunshine Mine are not exceptional: "They exist at other mining locations and are not being corrected by the Bureau of Mines."

The charge was echoed by the miners who survived the disaster. And the wife of one of the trapped miners told a New York Times correspondent: "There should have been more fire drills. I don't know whether it was plain lack of funds for safety training or what. The fact is, what have they done for safety here?"

Abel charged that "the Bureau of Mines cannot adequately represent the miners because it is the voice of the mine operators."

He called for an immediate congressional investigation into the disaster and urged that mine safety enforcement be transferred to the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

"We must make it impossible in America to operate a mine that is not safe for the miners who work in it," he stressed. "This will require a strong law with strict enforcement and severe penalties for non-compliance."

The present mine safety law, he charged, "is a hoax."

An examination of federal reports and a series of newspaper interviews with miners at the Sunshine Co. mine revealed that safety conditions had been ignored and much of the survival equipment was found unusable.

LABOR STATESMAN OF THE YEAR award is accepted for AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Federation Vice Pres. Fredrick O'Neal, left, from the School Administrators & Supervisors Organizing Committee. The presentation was made by Committee Pres. Walter J. Degnan, at the organization's 9th annual convention in New York City.

First Quarter Contract Gains Average 7.8%

Wage increases in major settlements during the first quarter of 1972 averaged 7.8 percent a year over the life of the contract, down from the 8.1 average gain in 1971, the Labor Dept. reported.

Wage gains with cost-of-living escalator clauses were lower, averaging 5.4 percent compared with 7.1 percent a year ago. Those without escalator clauses were slightly higher—9.4 percent as compared with 9.2 percent in 1971.

Increases in manufacturing averaged 5.5 percent, down from 7.2 percent in 1971. In non-manufacturing they were 9.9 percent compared with 9 percent the previous year.

In the construction industry, wage increases averaged 13 percent, up from 11.8 percent. However, these contracts were actually negotiated before last Nov. 14 and so date back to before the wage control program went into effect.

In addition to these settlements, which cover 42 contracts and 362,000 workers, there are 64 contracts covering 375,000 additional workers still to be considered by the Pay Board.

First-year wage boosts, while generally larger than the increases averaged over the life of the contract, showed "sharper declines from 1971 levels." The average first-year raise dropped to 8.4 percent for all industries as compared with 11.7 percent in 1971. Manufacturing settlements averaged 7.3 percent compared with 10.8 percent the previous year and non-manufacturing dropped to 9.4 percent as compared with 12.7 percent in 1971.

Dock Union, Shippers Protest Wage Slash

Nov. 14, and 40 cents in each of the remaining two years.

Fringe benefit and work rule packages, plus base wages varied from port to port, however, so that total percentage increases varied for the East Coast, New Orleans and western Gulf ports.

For the more than 30,000 dockers in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Providence, Baltimore and Hampton Roads, Va., the 55-cent raise, plus negotiated fringe benefits will amount to a 9.8 percent increase, according to figures issued by the Pay Board.

For the 10,000 New Orleans dockers, the total package will come to 12 percent, and for 11,000 longshoremen in the west Gulf Coast, it will mean an increase of 11.4 percent, the Pay Board said.

In the northeastern ports, basic hourly pay amounts to $4.75.

Pay Board Chairman Judge George Boldt claimed that taking the base hourly wage alone, the total increase granted by the board amounted to 12 percent as opposed to the negotiated increase, which he placed at 15 percent.

He said the board's decision represented a notable departure from its own guidelines of 5.5 percent and, in exceptional cases, up to 7 percent for first-year increases.

The board went higher, he said, because it accepted, in part, both management and the ILA's contention that work rules changes would, in his words, "result in greater productivity and considerable savings to the employers in the administration of the guaranteed annual income."

The ILA and management had argued before the board that such savings justified approval of the entire 70-cent increase.

The Pay Board's decision came on a 6-1 vote with Teamsters Pres. Frank E. Fitzsimmons dissenting.

Pay Board Bars Moves To Defer Denied Raises

The Pay Board has issued new regulations which in effect prohibit agreements to pay disallowed wage increases on a deferred basis after wage controls are ended, whether such funds are put in escrow or not.

The regulations were issued after a federal judge in San Francisco told the Longshoremen & Warehousemen that he saw no legal barrier to prevent the union from negotiating an agreement to put wage boosts denied by the Pay Board in an escrow fund for payment when permissible, or when wage controls end.

The ILWU filed suit in an attempt to force the Pay Board to permit such an arrangement. But U.S. District Judge Albert C. Wollenberg declined to order the board to do so although he said he saw no existing legal barrier to negotiating such an agreement.

His pronouncement was quickly followed by issuance of the new regulations.

The board said a building contractor trying to protect his bid price could place negotiated wage increases in escrow pending approval of the Construction Industry Stabilization Committee.

But there can be no arrangement under which increases disallowed by the CISC, or the Pay Board, would be paid at some future time. The board said it viewed any such projected increases as part of the current, first-year settlement.

The board also said it would be taking a harder look at the latter-year increases of multi-year contracts. Thus far it has ruled only on the first year package of such agreements.

And it said that it will control bonuses that employers promise to pay employes when Phase 2 ends, counting these against the general 5.5 percent guideline on current wage increases.

Although there is no announced end of Phase 2, which began after the wage-price freeze ended last Nov. 14, the enabling legislation for economic controls expires in May of 1973.

In other action, the board was asked during public hearings to exempt professional athletes from wage controls.

The shortness of athletic careers, and the need to reward players who show improvement were some of the reasons cited.

Executive Pay, Bonuses Post 'Spectacular' Gains

While the Pay Board exerts controls on the wages of most workers making more than $1.90 an hour, executive compensation skyrocketed in 1971, "matching the spectacular improvement in corporate profits"—according to a survey conducted by Business Week magazine.

The survey showed average increases of executive compensation as 10.7 percent in automotive, 16.6 percent in transportation, 17.1 percent in food, 15 percent in tobacco and 13.2 percent in the tire and rubber industry.

"Top executives in the auto and parts industry garnered some of 1971's biggest increases, as industry profits climbed by 126 percent," the magazine noted.

"The pay package of James M. Roche, who retired as chairman of General Motors Corp., in December, was boosted from $262,500 to $838,750—an increase of 219.5 percent," Business Week said.

"A portion of that hike came in the form of a salary increase from $250,000 to $275,000. But most of the boost was due to restoration of GM's traditionally handsome bonus unpaid in 1970 because of a lengthy strike and sagging profits."

Laundry Union Protests Cutback of Pay Boost

Pittsburgh—More than 500 members of Laundry & Dry Cleaning Local 141 rallied on the steps of the federal building here protesting the government's denial of a wage boost which their leaders charged "has the net result of locking service workers into permanent poverty."

Pres. Russell R. Crowell pledged the international union's full support to the protest and said the union would demand that the present ceiling of $1.90 an hour on wages exempt from controls be raised to $3.25 per hour.

A statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its February meeting characterized the $1.90 limitation as "contrary to the terms of the amendments to the Economic Stabilization Act" and called on the Cost of Living Council to increase it to an equitable figure.

The Local 141 members are employed at seven Pittsburgh area laundry plants which process linens and overalls, and most of them were making only $1.94 hourly.

A recently negotiated master contract gave them a first-year wage increase of 40 cents hourly, which would bring their wages to $2.34.

But this was too much, according to the Internal Revenue Service, the enforcement arm of the Pay Board. The board's guidelines would trim the settlement back to a 13-cent increase, holding the hourly rate to $2.07.

"It was the intent of Congress to provide that wage controls should not apply to wages that are less than federal poverty standards," Crowell told the rally.

He noted that the 1970 Labor Dept. figure for "subsistence standard living" was $6,970.

"The Pay Board's $1.90 guidelines and this specific instance of allowing only 13 cents an hour of a 40-cents per hour raise has the net result of locking service workers into permanent poverty."

"The Nixon Administration has expressed concern about the number of people on welfare and claims to be working to get people off welfare rolls and into a productive role in the American society," Crowell said.

"At the Pay Board level of $1.90 an hour most laundry and other service workers are fully eligible for welfare benefits. In effect, the Pay Board is legislating people out of any incentive to be productive workers and encouraging them to go on welfare."

Job Bias Ruling Allowed to Stand

The Supreme Court has declined to review an appellate court decision holding that past practices of employment discrimination at the Jacksonville, Fla., railroad terminal were perpetuated by craft seniority agreements.

A federal district court had initially dismissed the case brought by the Justice Dept. under the 1964 Civil Rights Act on the ground that there was no evidence of current discrimination and the seniority provisions in contracts with 16 rail unions merely followed the nationwide pattern of the railroad industry.

The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled, however, that evidence of past racial discrimination required that specific affirmative action be ordered.

Conglomerate Secrecy

THE PUBLIC'S RIGHT TO KNOW goes far beyond the present price control program with its anti-consumer inequities and its pro-business bias—because that right to know is an essential feature of a democratic society.

Power in today's American economy is highly concentrated in a relative handful of giant corporations. The 500 biggest corporations hold about two-thirds of all business assets and get about two-thirds of all business income. Only 111 corporations—out of some 400,000 manufacturing enterprises—have at least 51 percent of all manufacturing assets and get 56 percent of profits in manufacturing. And 49 banks—out of 3,100 commercial banks with trust departments—control at least 54 percent of total bank trust assets, hold 5 percent leverage-control stock in more than 5,200 companies and have interlocking directorships with more than 6,500 business corporations.

Even if the price program didn't exist, it would be essential for the public to understand how giant U.S. corporations—not only the "top 500" but also the 2,400 firms with annual sales over $50 million—manipulate their costs, prices and profits in ways that may be contrary to the public interest.

Big multi-product, multinational conglomerate corporations have deliberately diversified through aggressive merger-and-acquisition campaigns. Now these conglomerates—like ITT, Gulf & Western, Litton Industries and others—present financial reports that conceal far more than they reveal about the corporation's U.S. and foreign operations.

Greatly increased concentration of economic power in the hands of a narrowing group of banks and business firms with the power to administer prices in many industries requires federal government action to protect the public interest. And the pricing policies and financial operations of giant U.S. corporations, including particularly the multinationals, require public attention.

Efforts to regulate the multinational corporations can't succeed without an effective financial reporting system with standardized bookkeeping and standardized accounting procedures. Federal standards for international accounting by U.S. firms with foreign operations should be set up and enforced.

If multinational corporations were forced to assign costs and prices to the country and to the subsidiary where production actually occurs, then the export of technology, production and jobs could be understood and regulated to protect the public interest more effectively.

RISING PUBLIC DEMANDS for increased social responsibility on the part of U.S. corporations and new demands for corporate social accounting in regard to the environment product reliability and safety and employment practices suggest that the winds of change are blowing into the world of business.

Sound public policy can't be achieved unless the cloak of secrecy is ripped away from the big conglomerate corporations. The public needs detailed, standardized corporate financial reporting to understand how these economic giants are shaping the economy. The public's right to know and the public interest require an end to corporate secrecy on cost, price and profit information that vitally affects more than 200 million American citizens.

A Word Edgewise:

'Instant Explanations' Confuse Media Coverage of Primaries

By John P. Roche

IF YOU HAVE TROUBLE making sense out of the primaries, welcome to the club. The American system of nominating presidents is at best confusing, and this year the media seem determined to make it utterly inexplicable.

The political reporters for the New York Times, for example, seem oblivious to the extremely perceptive Yankelovich Surveys, which often appear in adjoining columns of that newspaper. An additional problem is created by what is known as "advocacy journalism," which argues that a reporter engages in immoral behavior if he does not carry the flag for his personal convictions, i.e., load the dice.

Thus a supposedly straight news story may in fact be full of ideological ballast. The Manchester Union Leader's job on "Moscow Muskie" so far leads the field in this respect, but the dagger can be inserted with somewhat more sophistication.

There was a choice little item in the Times which, with seeming impartiality, discussed Sen. Henry Jackson's campaign organization in Oregon. It noted that Congresswoman Edith Green had agreed to spearhead the effort, and then came the technically correct statement that in 1968 she had organized Sen. Robert Kennedy's campaign: the only primary a Kennedy ever lost. Zap.

The real difficulties arise, however, from the fact that most commentators are under the gun: their editors are demanding "instant explanations." Two thousand words have to be provided by next morning, long before it is possible to investigate the election results in depth.

And when the depth explanations do appear, maybe a week or so later, most people have forgotten what it was all about. What readers do retain is that first sharp image: "McGovern Sweeps Massachusetts," "Muskie Double Loser," etc.

Suppose the morning after the Massachusetts primary, when you opened your paper, the headline read "10 percent of Massachusetts Voters Give McGovern Victory"—how would you have reacted? Would you have turned to your husband or wife and said, "By God, that McGovern is a winner!"? Yet, the headline would have been completely accurate. Massachusetts has more than two and a half million registered voters; McGovern got about 250,000 votes.

If you go into this more deeply, you realize that there are at present two "turned-on" constituencies: the McGovernites and the Wallaceites.

They are the people who, for different reasons, want to hit that lever. The McGovernites because they want McGovern to be President; the Wallaceites because they think that a vote for the Alabama governor is a nice way to blackmail the system, a vivid way of conveying a message to the Establishment. (Most Wallace voters would shudder at the thought of his actually winning the White House, a fact that explains why there is no mathematical relationship between his primary vote and what he might receive in November.)

BACK TO MASSACHUSETTS: roughly a quarter of all registered voters turned up at the primary; despite all the talk about involvement and the infusion of youth, this percentage was the same as 1968. They belonged to the dominant "turned-on" constituency in this area; the McGovernites. I would estimate from personal knowledge of my area that perhaps 90 percent of the McGovernites voted, and a check with knowledgeable reporters elsewhere indicated that this was par for the state course. If correct, this would mean that we have perhaps 300,000 McGovernites in the commonwealth.

Now to the other side of the coin: the non-participants. Probably not more than a quarter of the Muskie-Humphrey constituency voted, totaling around 150,000, but suggesting that there are a good 600,000 of this inert persuasion around—twice the McGovern brood.

In short, when the primary reports come in and the pundits begin to lay on the superlatives, keep your shirt on until you have obtained two crucial pieces of information: (1) What percentage turned out? and (2) Who were they?

Interpreting Performance:

Shoddy Reasoning of 'Experts' Imperils Educational Progress

The following is from a column by Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers in New York City, that appeared in the New York Times, Apr. 30, 1972.

RECENTLY I RECEIVED a telephone call from a school superintendent in a Connecticut district. "For many years," he told me, "I've been arguing with my school board and with the community. I've urged greater expenditures for schools in order to improve education. Now I'm in an impossible position. Whenever I urge more money, I'm handed a reprint of a recent article in the Wall Street Journal which shows that the more money spent on educating students, the less they learn. Is that really true?"

The caller was referring to an article which appeared on Mar. 31, 1972, "Should States Finance the Schools?" by Dr. Roger A. Freeman, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford University who formerly served in the administrations of Presidents Eisenhower and Nixon.

In the article, Freeman discovers a "surprising fact: the higher the expenditures per pupil —the smaller the class size—the lower are pupil achievements—and vice versa."

Freeman cites as his source of information The New York City School Fact Book, published not, as he says, by Queens College of the City University of New York, but by the Institute for Community Studies at that college.

The Institute is directed by Marilyn Gittell, author of the Bundy Report on school decentralization and numerous other reports and pieces of research on decentralization.

With the Fact Book as his reference, Freeman announces: ". . . There were in 1967-68, 30 schools (out of a total of 900 elementary schools) in which per pupil expenditures exceeded $1,100. They averaged $1,330. Then there were 101 schools in which per-pupil expenditures were below $600. They averaged $551. In other words, the first group of schools spent about 2½ times as much as the second. The teacher-pupil ratio was 1:12.3 in the high-expenditure schools, 1:25.9 in the low-expenditure schools—or more than twice as high.

"But the reading skills of the students in the low expenditure, large-class schools averaged above grade level; in the high-expenditure, small-class schools below grade level.

"This is not just an accident. A review of that study and of reports from other cities shows that the high-expenditure, small-class city school typically is one with low educational achievements." Freeman goes on to assert that while New York City school expenditures have been increasing each year, ". . . educational achievements have been going down year after year."

Were these the views of one man only, they would merit no more than casual attention. But the ominous fact is that these dangerous views are the hallmark of an odd coalition of the right and the left—the wealthy right embracing them as a justification for withholding adequate fiscal support for education, the new left proclaiming that "relevancy," "community control," "ethnic studies" and "life style," rather than more money, are the keys to educational success.

The shoddiness of such reasoning is quite apparent. Pupils do not do poorly in reading and math because they are in small classes; rather, they are placed in small classes because they are doing poorly. (If we were to extend Dr. Freeman's logic to other fields, the venture would be most instructive. For example, the more money an individual spends on doctors and hospitals, the poorer his health. The healthiest individuals spend little or no money on doctors and hospitals. Hence, the way to fight disease is to abolish Medicare, health insurance and welfare schemes.)

Freeman never once takes into account that the low achievement of city schools is not due to "high expenditures," but to the fact that more and more children in these schools are poor, live in slums, and struggle with disease, violence, discrimination and drugs.

Our interpretation of the figures is quite different from Dr. Freeman's. While the precise relationship between academic achievement and school expenditures is not known, it may well be that even though the cities are spending more for disadvantaged students than for others, they are not spending enough.

Or it may be that, while more money will make some difference, the schools, no matter how effectively they function, cannot overcome all the non-school factors preventing students from achieving.

RECENT DISPUTES over this question have made it abundantly clear that political and economic interests now overshadow educational and humane considerations.

Pres. Nixon himself has about-faced on the issue within the last year. Throughout his administration he opposed increases in educational expenditures on the grounds that there was no evidence to show that more spending would mean greater achievement. Recently, however, he modified his views to the point of contending that more money rather than busing was the answer.

Fortunately for the schools, when all the "research findings" are carefully scrutinized, common sense usually prevails. Parents do want small classes for their children. The resistance put up by wealthy districts to any changes in the present method of providing school support testifies to their acknowledgment that money does make a difference.

Dr. John E. Coons, prominent in the fight for school fiscal reform, recently said: "If money is inadequate to improve education, the residents of poor districts should at least have an equal opportunity to be disappointed."

We submit that Dr. Coons, in these very few words, has made a richer contribution to educational betterment than Dr. Freeman in his lengthy article in the Wall Street Journal.

Biemiller Warns:

All Industries Face Threat Of Compulsory Arbitration

PASSAGE of the Nixon Administration's bill for compulsory arbitration of transportation disputes could lead to forced settlements throughout industry, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller warned.

Stressing that both the Nixon and Packwood bills call for studies of extending compulsory arbitration "to all of industry," Biemiller charged that the legislation is "so wide that if you take it into certain fields, it just doesn't make sense."

He said that for example, a seamen's strike would affect only about 7 or 8 percent of the tonnage that leaves this country and "that is hardly what you would call a critical situation."

Biemiller declared that the Administration is less interested in smooth economic recovery than it is in "trying to deliver to the people they regard as their close friends—the employers—and are trying, therefore, to clamp down very hard on unions." The former Wisconsin congressman made the statements on the AFL-CIO produced network radio interview Labor News Conference.

Biemiller pointed out that the record of Congress over the years shows that "they are more likely—if they are going to do anything in a critical situation—to take a one-shot piece of legislation, rather than the broad legislation embodied in the Administration and Packwood bills." He said it is very doubtful that "any bill which carries compulsory arbitration will be voted out of the Senate Labor Committee."

He said the AFL-CIO and the American Arbitration Association are exploring ways to make wider use of voluntary arbitration to avoid strikes. But, he asserted, abolishing the right to strike is "forcing men and women to work against their will, and that's involuntary servitude, as far as we're concerned."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY & Health Administration has just finished its first year in its congressionally directed program of enforcing job safety and health.

For organized labor it has been a disappointing and frustrating year.

On all sides there have been complaints that the program is not being enforced with the vigor that is needed after many years of neglect in the industrial health and safety field.

OSHA—as the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has come to be known—has been accused of belittling the threat to health in industry and of setting its sights too low both in terms of budget requests and enforcement policies.

The concern for rigid enforcement of what involves the lives and health of millions of workers that has been shown in OSHA's own reports on its enforcement activities is not too reassuring. Its reports have stressed the number of plants found in conformity with the act rather than those that have been found delinquent.

This would be understandable if the proportion of those found in accordance with the law was preponderant. But it is not. As of the end of April, OSHA reported that "23 percent of the establishments inspected during the July 1-Mar. 31 period were found to be in compliance with job safety and health standards."

"We find this a most heartening indication of how well our efforts toward voluntary compliance are working," OSHA Director George C. Guenther said. "Considering our emphasis to date on inspections in high hazard target industries, this percentage is a respectable indication that employers and employes are addressing themselves to the improvement of job safety and health conditions."

The fact that 77 percent of plants in these "high hazard target industries" were not in conformity with safety and health standards was ignored by Guenther in his almost unbelievably complacent statement.

On top of that is the OSHA statement on its first year anniversary that "the Labor Dept. will emphasize increased state involvement in job safety and health during the coming year."

While state involvement in industrial safety and health obviously is desirable, the OSHA statement means continuation of a policy that has met the strongest kind of labor objection—dependence on the states to do the safety and health job that is needed. The states have long had the opportunity to do the job as it should be done. They have failed. Passage of the federal act is convincing evidence of that. Yet, OSHA still persists in emphasizing the state role.

The AFL-CIO recently served notice that "organized labor will fight to prevent state legislators or employers from undercutting job safety standards guaranteed under the federal law."

ORGANIZED LABOR is fearful that the guidelines and standards laid down by OSHA for the states are simply not strong enough and that the guidelines "fall far short of meeting the intent of Congress."

Moreover, labor has complained that not only are state guidelines lacking in vigor, but OSHA's own guidelines are proving inadequate.

Complaint was also made that OSHA has "tended to belittle the role of the unions and their members in helping make the workplace more safe and more healthy" and that workers who are exposed to whole series of dangerous substances should have more of a voice in the safety and health program.

In any event, the first year of enforcement of the act has passed. Organized labor is alarmed that this long-fought-for legislation is failing its purpose. The act was not adopted to meet the convenience of business and industry—but to safeguard the health and lives of workers. It has a long way to go to do that.

FORCED SETTLEMENTS may well replace freely negotiated contracts throughout industry if the Nixon Administration's bill for compulsory arbitration of transportation disputes becomes law, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Peter Milius, left, of the Washington Post and Tom Joyce of Newsweek magazine. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Jobs Held Key To Success Of Young Nations

Finding jobs for people in the economic development programs of the emerging nations is being urged as a top priority by an increasing number of "influential voices," a Labor Dept. official told the 40th graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Daniel C. Lazorchick, director of the Labor Dept.'s Office of Program Operations told the 42 trade unionists from 15 Latin American countries that the workers in developing nations have "modest" economic aspirations.

"They want steady jobs at wages which enable them to provide decent food, housing, clothing, medical care and education for their children. They are not asking for handouts."

Lazorchick said the AIFLD "represents an exceedingly significant enterprise" in this area and that the investment "which the U.S. trade union movement, American business community, and the U.S. government have made in the AIFLD has been one of the most sensible investments Americans have ever made in the field of foreign affairs."

Speaking for the graduating class was Gustavo Valdes Aravena, treasurer of the Copper Workers of El Salvador, Chile.

He said that through the AIFLD program at Front Royal, Va., "we have received classes from dedicated brother trade unionists and we were able to admire the power of a well-organized working class."

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, secretary-treasurer of AIFLD, challenged the graduates to remain in the labor movement in their respective countries, declaring that "there is no greater calling than that of free men standing together to defend what they believe in."

Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith presented diplomas and AIFLD Director William C. Doherty, Jr., presided.

AIFLD GRADUATE Gustavo Valdes Aravena of Chile receives his diploma from Machinists Pres. Floyd E. Smith. Aravena was the spokesman for his class—the 40th to participate in the AIFLD training program.

Pollock Bars New Term As TWUA Chief

New York — William Pollock, who has been president of the Textile Workers Union of America since 1956, announced that he will not be a candidate for re-election at the union's convention next month.

Pollock, 72, disclosed his decision in a letter to TWUA locals, joint boards and staff members. He said he has no desire to retire or withdraw from the activities of the union and expressed the hope that he could serve "in some other capacity where I can continue to be useful to our organization and its members."

A native of Philadelphia, Pollock worked as a textile weaver and in 1931 became a business agent for his union.

When the TWUA was chartered as a CIO union in 1939, Pollock was named secretary-treasurer. He served in that post until 1953, when he was elected executive vice president. Three years later, he began the first of eight successive terms as TWUA president. Pollock has been an AFL-CIO vice president since 1967.

Hillman Awards Note Media Achievements

New York—A television documentary producer, two journalists, two collaborating authors of a best-selling work of non-fiction, and five authors of a special section in a national magazine received Sidney Hillman Foundation Awards for outstanding achievement in mass communications during 1971.

The awards, each consisting of a scroll plus $500, were presented by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, who heads the Hillman Foundation. They went to:

Martin Carr, a documentary producer, for his NBC White Paper, "This Child Is Rated X," an examination of how children are victims of unfair laws and court procedures.

Morton Mintz and Jerry S. Cohen, co-authors of "America, Inc." (Dial Press), a critical view of who owns and operates the U.S.A.

Alfred Friendly, for his series of articles in the Washington Post, "Victims of the Great American Red Hunt," telling what has happened to the victims of McCarthyism, 20 years after.

Neil Sheehan, correspondent for the New York Times, who obtained the Pentagon Papers and digested and summarized them for publication in that newspaper.

Carolyn See, Richard Todd, Robert Coles, Kenneth Lasson and William Serrin, authors of the individual articles in a special section of the Atlantic Monthly titled "Work in America," an exhaustive and sympathetic study of a subject of particular concern to trade unionists.

The Hillman Foundation was created by the Clothing Workers shortly after the death of Hillman, the first president of the union, in 1946. Potofsky, who succeeded Hillman, has described the foundation's purpose as "perpetuating Hillman's philosophy and broad-ranging interests and concerns."

Judges for this year's awards were Alan Barth, editorial writer for the Washington Post; Edward P. Morgan, ABC news commentator, and Harrison Salisbury, assistant managing editor of the New York Times.

Farm Union Settles Dispute with NLRB

Los Angeles—A settlement agreement between the United Farm Workers and the National Labor Relations Board has apparently averted a court battle over whether the union could be penalized for violations of federal labor law at the same time it was denied the protection of the law.

Cesar Chavez, director of the union, told a news conference that the agreement makes it clear that the Farm Workers do not seek to represent any non-farm workers and therefore is not under NLRB jurisdiction.

The NLRB position had been that if the union sought to represent any workers subject to federal labor law, the government could move to halt a secondary boycott even when the workers directly involved were not subject to the National Labor Relations Act.

Unions Assail Soviet Attacks On Writer

Denouncing the Soviet government for its treatment of Nobel Prize-winning writer Alexandr Solzhenitsyn, the Council of AFL-CIO Unions for Scientific, Professional & Cultural Employes labeled the Soviet Writers Union "nothing but a lackey of the government whose representation of artists is a charade."

The council said it resented "implications that such organizations within the Soviet Union are indeed trade unions."

"They are a disgrace to all bona fide free trade unions and a fraud perpetrated on working people everywhere," the council's executive board said in a statement.

Noting that Soviet artists such as Rudolf Nureyev and Natalia Makarova have found freedom to express themselves as artists in recent years only by fleeing their homeland, the council said that others like Solzhenitsyn, refusing to be forced from his country, "work in the face of incredible restrictions," and face joblessness.

"We call upon all trade unionists, all artists and professional people to join with us in deploring the continuing brutalization of the human spirit by the Soviet government and its captive 'trade union' organizations," the council said.

Needed Facilities:

Public Works Cited For Jobs Potential

America needs an economic policy which will move it rapidly toward full employment and keep it there, concludes a report on the construction industry prepared for the recent legislative conference of the Sheet Metal Workers.

The report, "A Program for Economic Progress in the Construction Industry," was presented to each of the congressional leaders who addressed the conference which drew more than 300 delegates to Washington from all parts of the country.

The report acknowledges that full employment will not solve all of the nation's social problems, but stresses that many of those problems will evaporate with more and better jobs, and more and better incomes. Thus, full employment is a good social policy as well as good economic policy.

After listing myriad public needs that could be met by federal expenditures, the report charts the dramatic impact such spending could have on the economy.

It quotes a Bureau of Labor Statistics estimate that for each $1 million spent on the construction of various public facilities, 100 jobs are created for one year—"about 40 jobs at the construction site and about 60 jobs in industries supplying building materials, equipment and services."

"Most of the jobs thus created are in unskilled and semi-skilled occupations, the kinds of jobs that are badly needed in a highly automated economy," the report points out.

It also notes that there is an indirect job-creating factor to federal investment in public works.

"As a result of the wages and salaries that are earned and spent by these 100 workers, economic activity is further increased in the community and still more jobs—another 50 to 100—are created.

"This means, therefore, that each $1 billion spent on public facility construction is worth 100,000 jobs in on-site activities and in the supply of materials and equipment plus an additional 50,000 to 100,000 as a result of the secondary impact that occurs in the spending cycle.

"Moreover, once the facility is completed, still more people are put to work providing the public service for which it was intended."

"Thus," the report stresses, "the construction industry has a built-in potential for generating the kinds of employment increases that are needed to help move the economy on to a full-employment growth rate."

According to the Administration's own figures, as much as three-quarters of the $39 billion deficit in the federal budget for Fiscal 1972 is traceable to the slack economy, the report notes.

The government estimates that the recession has cost the U.S. Treasury $27 billion in tax receipts, while the high level of joblessness will increase outlays for unemployment compensation by an extra $3.5 billion.

"Such performance is inexcusable," the report declares, in light of the nation's tremendous backlog of unmet needs in public facilities, with more than 5 million jobless workers available to help meet those needs.

"The link that is missing is a government decision to embark on a program involving substantial expansion in outlays for public investment as part of an overall policy that has full employment as its goal."

It was prepared for the union by Stanley H. Ruttenberg & Associates. Ruttenberg was an assistant secretary of labor in the Johnson Administration and formerly was director of research for the AFL-CIO.

Zimmerman to Retire From Key ILG Post

New York—Charles S. Zimmerman, a leader of the Ladies' Garment Workers for more than half a century, will retire on July 1 as general manager of the ILGWU's Dress Joint Council and New York Dress Joint Board.

His successor will be Murray Gross, currently associate general manager. The board and council represent 80,000 workers in the eight-state New York dress market area.

Zimmerman, an ILGWU vice president, joined the union in 1916 and became manager of its Local 22 in 1933. He is a former president of the Jewish Labor Committee and former chairman of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Civil Rights. He has been head of the Dress Joint Council and Joint Board since 1958.

Gross has held leadership posts in the ILGWU since the early 1930s.

CWA Charges Sex Bias In Bell System Policies

The Communications Workers filed sex discrimination charges against American Telephone & Telegraph and 28 Bell system affiliates because of the companies' policies and practices regarding maternity leave.

Specifically, the union charged that Bell's sick leave policies are not applied to disability due to pregnancy or childbirth on the same terms and conditions as they are applied to other temporary disabilities.

The Bell system employs more than a half-million women.

The charges, signed by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, said the Bell policy was discriminatory in such matters as commencement and duration of sick leave, the availability of extensions, the accrual of seniority and other benefits and privileges, reinstatement and payment under health or temporary disability insurance or sick leave plans.

The charges were filed with the Washington, D.C., office of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

By Chamber of Commerce:

U.S. Business Summoned To Anti-Worker Campaign

The owners and managers of American business were summoned to a new crusade against "union power" at the 60th annual meeting of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

They loudly applauded a film strip that portrayed unions as the cause of all of the nation's economic problems and called on businessmen to contribute votes, time and money to candidates who will act to curb "union power and government spending."

The film, "Your Commitment to America," was introduced by a Florida banker and Chamber of Commerce vice president who voiced indignation that unions "want a $2 minimum wage, want it now, and want it for everyone."

To appreciative chuckles from his audience, he confided that he was raised "in abject poverty" but "we didn't know we were poor and we were the happiest people in the world."

Then came a panel discussion on "Union Power and Its Victims," moderated by Charles H. Smith, Jr., chairman of the Chamber's Labor Relations Committee and board chairman of SIFCO Industries in Cleveland.

It was a right lively discussion and the audience—judging by its applause—was nearly evenly divided.

There were those who applauded the ideological purity of Sylvester Petro, a New York University law professor who is considered one of the intellectuals of the extreme conservatives.

Petro somewhat startled his audience by asserting that "in a free country, the right to strike is inviolable. If we want to be a free country, we have to respect the right to strike."

But he quickly reassured the gathering by advocating the abolition of the National Labor Relations Board, and undoing "the unfair labor laws that put burdens on business." He blamed the government for having "dragooned most workers into unions" and suggested that the nation "turn around" and "go back" to that happier time when the government kept out of the way of business. The wrong turn was taken, Petro asserted, way back in 1887 when the Interstate Commerce Act was passed.

And he won another round of applause with a claim that the businessman is in fact "the consumer's representative" and a denunciation of "consumer advocates" for "undermining confidence in management."

But there was loud applause also for the more pragmatic view of another panelist, Robert T. Thompson, another member of the Chamber's Labor Relations Committee.

There is no "inherent" right to strike, he declared. It is "a privilege, not a right . . . and can be taken away by legislation."

On this issue, he said business needs to either "change the minds of our legislators or change the legislators."

Thompson got off on a bit of a tangent by taking out after the press for contributing to a hostile view of businessmen.

He called on business firms to use their advertising power to crack down on newspapers that don't give their views "fair treatment."

Petro's contribution to this topic was a complaint that newspapers had "perverted" the views of his old friend, Lemuel Boulware, whose "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining tactics for General Electric came to be known as "boulwarism."

A third member of the panel, John P. Trimmer of the Associated Builders & Contractors, didn't have a chance to get much of a word in. But he complained about the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and urged the Chamber of Commerce members to do all they can to "arouse" the public to the evils of "union power."

Congress Allows Sale Of U.S. Cruise Ships

The Nixon Administration and Congress may have sounded the death knell for U.S.-flag passenger ships at a time when Americans are increasingly taking cruise vacations.

The blow to any revival of this nation's passenger-ship business came when the Senate passed and sent to the White House a bill allowing foreign operators to buy five laid-up vessels. The measure, proposed by the Administration, passed the House last year.

The ships to be sold are the Brazil and Argentina of the Moore-McCormack Lines; Santa Paula and Santa Rosa, owned by Prudential-Grace Lines; and the Constitution of American Export-Isbrandtsen Lines, Inc.

The sale was opposed by the AFL-CIO, the National Maritime Union, the Seafarers, various AFL-CIO departments and councils, and a number of city governments, civic groups and veterans' organizations.

The key vote in the Senate was a 48-to-30 rejection of an amendment by Sen. Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.) that would have delayed the sale during exploration of a proposal for a new American company, owned in part by workers themselves, to buy and operate the ships.

The NMU has waged a battle for several years to save the ships. NMU Pres. Joseph Curran, in a letter to the Senate, reiterated his union's offer to relax its rules on crew sizes and operating procedures to aid the plan for a new U.S. owner.

Maritime labor has pointed out for years that a "deplorable" disappearance of U.S. passenger ships is due to the fact that their owners—many of them Americans—flee to foreign registry to escape U.S. wage standards, safety regulations and U.S. taxes.

Only three of 55 cruise ships operating out of U.S. ports still fly the U.S. flag.

In Senate debate, supporters of the sale led by Sen. Russell Long (D-La.) argued that if the ships were kept and operated by any U.S. owner, they would be eligible for operating subsidies. Long contended subsidies should be reserved for more essential businesses.

At one point, Hollings challenged the proponents to name areas in which the U.S. should help Americans to compete. He said:

"What have we left to do in this land? If we get a textile bill, they say 'Get out of the business. The Japanese . . . and everybody else can do it better.' If we get into the shoe business, they say, 'Go to Italy and get a pair of shoes, boy.' If we go to build a supersonic, they say, 'Go to France and get the Concorde.' If it's trains, they say, 'Go to Switzerland and ride one, you'll enjoy it.' "

But his appeals were in vain. His proposal was beaten and the Senate passed the bill by a voice vote.

Conservative Coalition Guts Wage Floor Bill

erage or improvement of overtime.

Despite the setback in the House, supporters of an improved Fair Labor Standards Act still see a good chance that an acceptable bill will emerge this year in a House-Senate compromise.

The Senate Labor Committee is currently putting the finishing touches on a bill that would raise the minimum wage to $2 this year and $2.20 a year later—with expanded coverage along the line of the origianl House Labor Committee bill.

The House voted 218-192 approval of the Republican substitute sponsored by Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.) after having made it even worse than its original version by adopting an amendment by Rep. John B. Anderson (R-Ill.) which cut back the amount of the minimum wage increase. The Anderson amendment carried by a 216-187 vote.

Throughout the debate, Administration supporters argued that an increase in the minimum wage would be "inflationary" and upset Pay Board efforts to curb wage increases.

Supporters of a $2 minimum wage countered by noting that a $2 rate today would actually represent less in buying power than the $1.60 rate when it was enacted in 1966.

3,000-Member 'Independent' Joins OPEIU

Milwaukee — Affiliation of the Associated Unions of America with the Office & Professional Employes International Union has been announced by OPEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin.

The Milwaukee-based, 3,000-member AUA, which has operated as a successful independent union for 31 years, officially became Local 500 of OPEIU at ceremonies here. Coughlin and the OPEIU's director of organization, Arthur Lewandowski, presented the charter to Donald Cameron, AUA national secretary and founder.

Coughlin noted that "while the OPEIU naturally welcomes this affiliation, it was actually initiated by the AUA, whose members and leadership alike realized that independent, unaffiliated unions cannot adequately represent employes in today's complex business world of multinational companies, where strong inter-union relationships are increasingly important."

Jobless Rate Remains Near 6 Percent Level

slightly less than the February and March increases of four-tenths of 1 percent.

The BLS reported that total employment was unchanged from March, and the number of unemployed persons also remained the same at 5.1 million on a seasonally adjusted basis.

The average duration of unemployment remained at 12.4 weeks, seasonally adjusted, almost a full two weeks longer than a year ago.

The number of persons without jobs for 27 weeks or more rose to 655,000, seasonally adjusted, up from 633,000 the previous month, and over 200,000 more than in April 1971 when 448,000 persons were so classified.

On an actual basis, there were 756,000 persons out of work 27 weeks or longer.

Employment totaled 81.2 million persons in April, and the civilian labor force stood at 86.3 million, also unchanged from March on a seasonally adjusted basis.

Unemployment for adult men rose during the month from 4.1 percent to 4.3 percent while the rate for teenagers fell somewhat from 17.9 to 17.3 percent. The jobless rate for adult women at 5.4 percent was relatively unchanged.

The unemployment rate for heads of households, published for the first time last month, stood at 3.4 percent, the same as in March. That rate was higher than joblessness among married men which was 2.9 percent, an increase of one-tenth of 1 percent.

The April figures showed a decline in unemployment for black workers and members of other minority groups with the rate falling from 10.5 percent to 9.6 percent.

The unemployment rate for white workers was unchanged at 5.4 percent in April.

The decline for minority group unemployment occurred largely among adult females, the BLS said, as the jobless rates for adult males and teenagers in that group were about unchanged in April.

The jobless rate for Vietnam-era veterans remained at 8.6 percent. For veterans in the 20-24 age group, unemployment continued at 12.7 percent while the rate for older veterans in the 25-29 age group remained at 5.4 percent.

Of the 4.1 million veterans in the labor force, 3.8 million were employed and 340,000 were without jobs, the BLS said.

The average workweek for all rank-and-file private non-farm workers rose two-tenths of 1 hour to 37.3 hours, the highest level since March 1970.

And factory overtime edged up one-tenth of 1 hour to 3.4 hours, the highest level since December 1969.

Average hourly earnings rose by 2 cents to $3.59 cents. Coupled with the rise in the workweek, this brought average weekly earnings up $1.10 to $132.83.

Pulp, Paper Unions Reach Merger Pact

Pulp-Sulphite union was a part of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers of the AFL in the early 1900s, but withdrew from that union in 1906 and was chartered itself by the AFL in 1909.

In 1957, the AFL's Paper Makers joined with the CIO's United Paperworkers of America to form the United Papermakers & Paperworkers. That was the first merger of autonomous international unions under the guidance and encouragement of the AFL-CIO.

The UPP is now headquartered in Albany, N.Y., and the Pulp-Sulphite union is based in Fort Edward, N.Y., but will soon be moving to Flushing, N.Y., where it has a new headquarters building under construction.

The proposed United Paper Workers union is expected to be headquartered in the new building where the staff departments of the two unions will be integrated.

IUE Wins 2-1 Vote At Mississippi Plant

Louisville, Miss.—Employes of the Spartus Corp. here voted by a margin of nearly 2-1 to be represented by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the union announced.

Of 914 eligible voters, 580 chose IUE and 285 voted for no union. There were 35 challenged ballots and one ballot was declared void.

New Tax Loophole:

Pension Reform Bill Called Boon to Rich

The Nixon Administration's "pension reform" bill is primarily "a new tax loophole for the wealthy," the AFL-CIO charged.

Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller told the House Ways & Means Committee that the Administration plan to allow individuals to avoid taxes on money invested in a retirement plan "has little value to those with low incomes."

But it would be a windfall for persons with high incomes that normally would be taxed at a high rate. The Treasury in effect would be paying for a large share of their retirement savings, he pointed out.

Few persons of low or moderate incomes could even afford to set up tax-sheltered retirement accounts, Biemiller noted.

He termed the Administration bill "class legislation" that would "accelerate the trend toward distributing more of the nation's income, its wealth and its tax resources to the well-to-do."

Biemiller criticized both tax deduction features of the Nixon plan.

One would triple the present limit of $2,500 a year in tax exemption that a self-employed person can put into a retirement fund he sets up for himself and any employes he may have.

"The main beneficiaries of this program have been doctors and lawyers," Biemiller noted. Under the Administration plan, they could avoid taxes on retirement investments amounting to 15 percent of their income, up to $7,500 a year.

The other new tax gimmick would allow individuals to put aside 15 percent or a top of $1,500 a year in a tax-free retirement fund, whether it is a group plan of their employer or an individual plan.

While a family of four with a $10,000 income would be able to save $285 on their tax bill—if they could afford in the first place to set aside the full $1,500 for retirement—a family with a $50,000 a year income would save $720 in taxes on the same set-aside.

Since other taxpayers would have to make up for the revenue loss to the government, Biemiller said, the added tax relief for the rich would "result in further shifting the tax burden to low and middle income Americans."

Turning to the pension vesting provisions of the Administration bill, Biemiller criticized two key features.

The Administration requirement for compulsory vesting of pension rights, he noted, fails to make any distinction between single-employer plans where federal vesting standards are needed and multi-employer plans which protect workers who change jobs within the plan's jurisdiction, even if their original employer goes out of business.

On single-employer plans, he testified, the AFL-CIO favors a federal requirement for vesting after 10 years of employment. He said labor has "serious reservations" about the "rule of 50" in the Administration bill, which would vest one-half of an employe's accrued benefit when a combination of his age and his years of service totalled 50 years.

"This vesting standard could easily result in discrimination in employment against older workers," he cautioned. "The annual cost required to fund a pension benefit for a person at or near age 50 is very high, and many employers would be unwilling to underwrite this cost."

Strong Backing Given Group Health Plan Aid

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to give strong bipartisan support to legislation that would help start up prepaid group health programs in communities throughout the nation.

That's one area in which there is "complete accord" between labor and the Nixon Administration, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified.

He suggested that a House Commerce subcommittee combine features of several similar bills providing initial financial support for non-profit health maintenance organizations.

Under the group health concept, subscribers pay a set fee that entitles them to comprehensive medical services. The emphasis of the program is on preventive care to keep people healthy, early treatment of illnesses and cost controls through the efficiency of group practice.

Seidman said the Administration bill should be clarified to give preference to consumer-organized programs and to ensure that only non-profit groups receive federal aid.

"Experience with profit-making nursing homes and proprietary hospitals has demonstrated that the incentive to make profits by not maintaining quality standards is too overwhelming," he testified. "We are adamantly opposed to exploiting human misery for private gain."

A broader array of federal financial assistance is provided in a bill sponsored by Subcommittee Chairman Paul G. Rogers (D-Fla.) and Rep. William R. Roy (D-Tex.), and Seidman urged that this section be retained in the final legislation. But he said that some of the required standards in the Rogers-Roy bill are unnecessarily strict and could put group health programs at a competitive disadvantage with private practitioners and insurance programs that are not required to provide such fringe services as "health education."

Seidman noted that unions have pioneered in developing health services and clinics for their members and increasingly have joined with other community groups in sponsoring broad-based programs open to the entire community.

Labor's experience, he said, is that these group health programs "provide better quality medical care at lower cost than the fragmented fee-for-service system."

And while the Administration sees encouragement of health maintenance organizations as a means of holding down costs of its own insurance company-oriented health care proposals, Seidman stressed the program's value as "part of the tooling-up process for National Health Security."

Payday

Two-Thirds Pay Sought As Job Injury Standard

Workers who are injured on the job should receive a full two-thirds of their lost wages, the AFL-CIO told a Senate Labor Subcommittee considering amendments to the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act.

The federal law, last updated in 1961, covers more than 800,000 workers—on the docks, in shipyards, in certain types of government activities, and in private employment in the District of Columbia.

Its ceiling of $70 a week in benefits—based on two-thirds of a weekly wage of $105—was set 11 years ago and is long since outdated, the AFL-CIO stressed.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. F. Howard McGuigan urged approval of a no-ceiling bill introduced by Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) and nine co-sponsors. The legislation would reimburse an injured worker for two-thirds of his lost wages.

McGuigan's testimony was also given on behalf of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept., Industrial Union Dept., Maritime Trades Dept., and the Washington, D.C., Central Labor Council.

He termed the Williams bill superior to an Administration measure that would establish a $119 benefit ceiling for most of the workers covered by the law and a separate $85 ceiling for workers in the District of Columbia.

McGuigan noted that in 1962 only three states had higher benefit ceilings in their state laws than the federal program provided. But currently 20 states exceed the $70 ceiling which, he noted, is less than the government-defined poverty level for a family of four.

The AFL-CIO testimony also spelled out the areas of improvements needed in other provisions of the law, including minimum benefits, survivor benefits in fatal accidents, compensation for reduced earning capacity as a result of permanent injuries and time periods for filing claims.

The Senate panel also heard the president of the Air Line Pilots, John J. O'Donnell, urge that flight crews be included under the federal law.

Airline crews cross state and even international boundaries regularly as part of their jobs, he stressed. He cited compensation claims that have shuttled back and forth among states. And benefits, O'Donnell noted, differ sharply from state to state.

Thus, he told the subcommittee, a former $300-a-week airline captain blinded during a California hijacking attempt in 1961, is drawing $46 a week in compensation. But had the incident occurred in Arizona, his payment would be $150 a week.

Equal Rights Proposal Runs into State Snags

The proposed equal rights for women amendment to the Constitution neared the halfway mark in state ratifications. But despite the fast start, ratification by the required 38 states is not likely to be achieved this year.

Seventeen states have ratified the amendment and the number is expected to rise in the weeks ahead. But several legislatures have already adjourned and more than a dozen states have no legislative session scheduled for 1972.

Only one state—Connecticut—has actually rejected the amendment which is intended to wipe out all legal distinctions between men and women. Several others, however, have sidetracked the proposal for further study or blocked attempts to force it out of committee.

In California, the trade union movement has used the debate over ratification as a launching pad for a drive to extend state laws that protect working conditions of women to cover men workers as well.

Women trade union leaders, backed by the State AFL-CIO, convinced the Senate Rules Committee at public hearings to hold off action on the amendment until the legislature extends to all workers such protections as the state's $1.65 minimum wage for women.

Unless protective labor standards were applied to all workers, they warned, laws designed to help women would be nullified as discriminatory.

Pay Chiseling At $74 Million In Nine Months

the same as in the year-ago period, and overtime violations totaled $39.2 million, an increase of $1.7 million over the year.

Other underpayment violations occurred under the equal employment opportunity and women's employment programs, $10 million; and the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, $1.2 million.

The statistics from the Employment Standards Administration show that the number of workers found to have been cheated in their pay checks rose from 345,952 a year ago to the 371,255 in the recent nine-month period.

The ESA figures also show that in the nine months, 187,042 workers were paid less than the legal minimum wage and another 202,909 workers were not paid full overtime compensation.

Violations of the equal pay and age discrimination laws affected 22,723 workers.

The number of minors found illegally employed in violation of child labor provisions totaled 14,467, the ESA statistics show.

ESA investigators found 45,525 employers in violation of the various federal laws on wage and hour standards.

Richard J. Grunewald, Assistant Secretary of Labor for Employment Standards, said that "when our investigators find violations, they not only attempt to conciliate future compliance by employers, they also try to recover back pay owed slighted employes."

But the ESA has been able to recover illegally withheld wages from only about half of the employers found short-changing their workers.

And the total amount recovered from employers, the statistics show, is slightly over $23 million—less than one-third of the $74.2 million lost to wage chiseling.

Grunewald said that if the ESA is unsuccessful in getting the back pay owed workers, the Labor Dept. "may" take legal action.

Meany Supports Nixon Proposal

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made the following comment on Pres. Nixon's Vietnam report:

"I think the President made a reasonable proposal to end the war which has not been accepted. In this time of crisis, with 60,000 American lives at stake, I think the American people should back up the President, irrespective of politics or any other consideration."

Put-People-First Program Urged for Party Platforms

Profits Top Record High For Quarter

Business Week magazine confirmed its earlier estimate that "U.S. business earned more money in the first quarter of 1972 than in any previous three-month period in its history."

"Not since 1966 have corporate profits topped a $50-billion rate in any one quarter. But profits apparently were at better than a $51-billion rate in the most recent quarter," Business Week said.

The weekly magazine reported that nearly every sector of the economy was performing well, with after-tax profits surging ahead by at least 15 percent over the first quarter of 1971, when company earnings were at a $45-billion seasonally adjusted rate.

Business Week's quarterly survey was prepared by Investors Management Sciences Inc., a subsidiary of Standard & Poor's Corp. It covered 880 companies in 35 different industrial categories.

Of the 35 industrial groups, only six reported earnings down for the quarter, and only one, the airlines, lost money.

"The big winner in the first quarter," Business Week said, "was the radio-TV broadcasting industry, with profits up by 107 percent. But the year-ago quarter was a bleak period for the broadcasters—the first three months after cigarette commercials were kicked off television."

Labor Presses For Expansion Of GI Benefits

The United States is shortchanging its returning veterans, the AFL-CIO charged in testimony urging substantial improvements in the education benefits of the GI bill.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter Davis said education and training allowances for Vietnam veterans are so low that thousands are "forced to drop out of school and seek employment in a job market already overburdened by widespread unemployment."

Davis told a Senate Veterans Affairs subcommittee that, "like so many others of my generation," he had the opportunity for higher education under the original World War II GI Bill.

But "in terms of 1972 dollars,"

LABOR'S PROGRAM for America is outlined to the Democratic platform committee by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. He urged both political parties to take on the job of achieving full employment, fair taxation, adequate health care and other pressing needs.

In Safety Enforcement:

Mine Fire Survivors Cite Federal Laxity

The Steelworkers bitterly charged the Sunshine Mining Co. with wholesale violations of safety standards and the Bureau of Mines with failing to enforce them prior to the flash fire at the Kellogg, Ida., silver mine which took the lives of 91 men.

Testimony of the USWA officials during congressional hearings on the tragedy revealed that there had been a fire in the same mine in 1971 and at that time the company did not even evacuate the workers.

The Bureau of Mines was condemned for its lack of enthusiasm in investigating that fire, and Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan said its "proximity to private mining interests creates no confidence within the ranks of labor that there will be an aggressive implementation of mine safety laws and standards."

Enforcement of safety standards in mines must be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Interior Dept.'s Bureau of Mines, the USWA declared.

In a letter to Steelworkers Pres. I. W. Abel, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany expressed sympathy to the families of the union members who died and pledged the federation's full support for legislation that would give miners "the same protections as those now provided for workers . . . covered by the Occupational Safety & Health Act."

Meany's message was followed up by testimony by George H. R. Taylor, secretary of the federation's Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, endorsing the Steelworkers demand that responsibility for mine safety be shifted to the OSHA.

The most poignant and chilling testimony given before the House Labor subcommittee as it opened the hearings came from a 21-year-old mine elevator operator who was

Labor's Proposals List Critical Needs

By David L. Perlman

Labor presented its "program for America" to the Democratic Party's platform-drafting committee and will make an identical proposal to the Republican convention.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany asked both parties to shun "glib advertising slogans" and deal "specifically and candidly" with the issues.

Declaring that it is time for the government to "put the people first," Meany outlined labor's program for full employment, fair taxation, health care, quality education, clean water and air, safety, old age security and consumer protection.

A party platform, Meany urged, should be "a solemn pledge" and not "pap fed to voters before election day and forgotten afterward."

He called on the Democratic and Republican conventions to "restore public confidence in their platforms by binding their standard bearers and their legislative leadership to keeping the party's word." (Excerpts, Page 5.)

Meany told the Democratic panel, headed by Harvard Prof. Richard E. Neustadt, that the AFL-CIO's platform recommendations are not intended "to make labor strong to the detriment of others, for that would not be proper or just."

And, he said, "we do not write one statement for Republicans and another for Democrats, because the problems of people, which is our overriding concern, should not be divisible along party lines."

The AFL-CIO's 35,000-word platform proposals highlighted these areas of concern:

JOBS — America needs "more jobs, better jobs, at decent levels of pay." These jobs should come from the private sector. But when the economy is not growing suffi-

Kickbacks Probed on Medicare

Hospitals, nursing homes and other providers of medical services for Medicare may be receiving illegal rebates from their suppliers, official documents of the Social Security Administration reveal.

The documents, which were made public by the Senate Antitrust & Monopoly subcommittee, have never been released before.

The Social Security Administration, in July of 1971, warned Aetna Life & Casualty Co. that it was not taking enough precautions to protect the Medicare program from increased costs resulting from rebates.

The subcommittee is holding a series of hearings into the practices of commercial health insurance companies.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), subcommittee chairman, said investigation would continue into the rebate problem and called on his staff to obtain more material from the Social Security Administration.

The SSA warning noted that insurance companies that act as intermediaries for Medicare are required

Bommarito Spells Out to Canadians Case Against Multinational Firms

Ottawa—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito told the Canadian Labor Congress that the AFL-CIO is backing the Burke-Hartke bill as a means of fighting the excesses of multinational corporations and pledged his personal efforts to ensure that the new trade bill will foster fair trade with Canada.

Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers, spoke as the AFL-CIO's fraternal delegate to the CLC's biennial convention the day after the 1,800 delegates adopted a policy statement deploring the Burke-Hartke bill as symbolic of protectionist sentiment.

But Bommarito insisted that the AFL-CIO, in supporting the bill, is not "putting on the cloak of protectionism." He said the old concepts and labels of "free trade" and "protectionism" have become obsolete "in this new world of managed national economies and the multinational and transnational corporations."

"We in the AFL-CIO believe the new label should be 'fair trade,'" he declared.

He said workers, governments and even countries, in the U.S., Canada and throughout the world "are being manipulated by the tremendous power wielded by the multinational firms."

"Simultaneous with their global efforts to bring about a greater concentration of wealth in the hands of the few," they have declared "open season on the labor movement in both our countries," renouncing "allegiance and loyalty to any one country," Bommarito charged.

He noted that the multinationals blame labor for inflation, for high labor costs leading to increased im-

Abel Points to Success Of 'Instant Arbitration'

Pittsburgh—The "instant arbitration" procedure set up by the Steelworkers to provide prompt handling of routine grievances in the basic steel industry has successfully passed several initial tests, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel announced.

The new arbitration system, adopted in the union's 1971 basic steel agreement, was instituted on an experimental basis by the USWA and 10 major steel producers.

Under the "instant arbitration" procedure, decisions on grievance cases must be rendered within 48 hours after the completion of hearings.

Nine grievances were recently resolved under the new system in short order and at vast cost savings to the local unions involved.

Director Ben Fischer of the USWA Contract Administration Dept. said that six cases involved members of the union's District 15 in western Pennsylvania and three were in District 36 in central Alabama.

The first two grievances, dealing with disciplinary action at U.S. Steel's Homestead, Pa., works, were appealed to the new arbitration procedure on Mar. 4.

The hearing was held Mar. 11 before Prof. J. Basial of the Duquesne University School of Law. He rendered his decision the next day.

Total cost of the arbitrator's services was $150, which was evenly split between the local union and the company.

Fischer noted that not only were these cases settled within 11 days of appeal from the third-step of the normal grievance procedure, but the cost to the local was a minimal $37.50 per case.

The three Alabama cases involved USWA members employed by Republic Steel in Gadsden. Hearings were scheduled 10 days after the date of the third-step appeal and Attorney Brad Bishop, the umpire, issued his ruling within the 48-hour timetable after both sides presented arguments.

Expenses for the locals amounted to $25 per grievance as overall costs totaled $150, of which Republic Steel paid half.

Fischer pointed out that the initial experiences with the expedited arbitration procedure show that the system is meeting its objective—reduction of the time for adjudication and lower costs for the local unions.

Under old grievance procedure systems, the costs of similar cases could run up $1,500, the union pointed out, and settlement of the issues often take up to a year or more.

Between Feb. 1 and Apr. 1, union-industry "instant arbitration" panels were set up in Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago and Birmingham, Ala., to handle hearings within their areas.

Additional panels will be established in Buffalo, Detroit, Salt Lake City, Seattle, San Francisco and Los Angeles by mid-June, the USWA reported.

The USWA said that the experimental arbitration procedure will expire Aug. 1, 1973, but may be extended by mutual agreement of the union and the companies.

1,230 County Workers Pick Service Employes

Pittsburgh — The Service Employes won a representation election for 1,230 Allegheny County clerical workers despite pressures of county commissioners to discourage the organizing effort.

Of the 969 ballots cast, the SEIU received 640. Among the remaining votes, three other unions got a total of 139; no union, 106. There were 79 challenged ballots and five were voided.

The county commissioners had expressed surprise at the interest the workers showed in the election since, in the past, the positions had been subject to political patronage.

Funds Voted For Reusable Space Shuttle

Congress has authorized funds to launch a new era of space exploration involving reusable space shuttles piloted by astronauts.

The labor-supported program will generate an estimated 50,000 jobs in the still-depressed aerospace industry. It will provide relatively economical transportation from earth to space and back. And in the words of an AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution of endorsement, "it will make space as accessible as the airplane has made the other continents."

A one-sided Senate vote rebuffed an attempt to delete the $228 million earmarked for development of the space shuttle from a bill authorizing funds for the National Aeronautics & Space Administration. The amendment to kill the space shuttle program was rejected, 61-21.

The final version of the bill, that has now been sent to the White House, also includes funds for Project Skylab, the experimental space station that will be launched into earth orbit next year.

The shuttle will eventually have a key role in providing a link between space stations and earth.

IAM Ratifies Aerospace Pact In 10-to-1 Vote

St. Louis—Members of District 837 of the Machinists have approved a contract with McDonnell Douglas Corp. here that provides an 85-cent-an-hour wage increase over three years, a cost-of-living allowance and improved fringe benefits.

Cosimo (Gus) Troia, president-directing business representative, said the vote was 10-to-1 in favor of accepting the proposed contract, which had been recommended by union officers.

Ratification averted a strike by more than 10,000 workers at the huge aerospace manufacturing plant. The contract, retroactive to Jan. 31, expires Jan. 30, 1975.

Troia said the contract terms compare with those negotiated at the firm's West Coast plants and follow the guidelines set forth by the Pay Board.

Under the contract, the 18-cents-an-hour, cost-of-living increase that workers are now receiving will be made a part of their base pay immediately. Then they will receive an increase of 34 cents an hour in the first year of the contract.

There will be an increase of 17 cents plus 3 percent in the second year and an additional 3 percent in the third year. The contract also calls for further cost-of-living increases starting in November.

The settlement includes a "me-too" from the company assuring that the St. Louis workers will receive comparable benefits if the company's West Coast employes win further improvements through bargaining, grievance sessions or a suit filed against the Pay Board.

CWA Phone Line Airs Union's Views

The Communications Workers are making the union's views widely known in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area through a new telephone news service called "CWA Comments."

Each week day, the service provides three-minutes of union commentary on the top news items of the day, including some of the most controversial topics in the nation. Presently the service is available only to newsmen, Capitol Hill staffers and industry representatives.

But that may change, according to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who noted that his union wants "to give the media our views on a wide variety of subjects," and that the Washington experiment could be inaugurated in each of the CWA's 10 districts.

Motorist Shortchanged:

Abuses Spur Drive For 'No-Fault' Bill

Auto insurance as it is now works is at best a hit-and-run system that grossly shortchanges policyholders and accident victims. It is "costly, unresponsive, wasteful" and sorely in need of reform, an article in the May issue of the Federationist declares.

Less than 42 cents of each premium dollar has been returned to consumers who filed claims in the last six years, even though their auto insurance costs increased 70 percent during the period, writes Michael Gildea of the federation's legislative staff in the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

And a Dept. of Transportation study ordered by Congress shows that 85 percent of the losses insured motorists incurred in serious accidents in 1967 never were recovered. Gildea cites the study's conclusion:

"The existing system ill serves the accident victim, the insuring public and society. It is inefficient, overly costly, incomplete and slow. It allocates benefits poorly, discourages rehabilitation and overburdens the courts and the legal system."

The widespread abuses have brought about a public clamor for change, and among the new proposals is the labor-supported "no-fault" system.

Gildea suggests that a national no-fault program is the only alternative to correct the battered auto insurance system so that accident victims will be "compensated promptly and justly, court congestion reduced, insurance coverage and emergency medical care be improved and insurance premiums lowered."

Citing government statistics, the article notes that auto insurance policyholders paid $9.5 billion in premiums for personal injury and property damage liability coverage in 1970.

But less than half that amount, $4.5 billion, was paid back to compensate accident victims. The remaining $5 billion was split between insurance company costs and lawyers and claim adjusters.

The biggest losers are the victims of serious auto accidents, Gildea points out:

"In 1967, motorists incurred $5.1 billion in losses in accidents resulting in death or serious injury. Of that amount, automobile insurance repaid only $813 million—or 15 percent.

"More significantly, in most serious cases—the 32,500 accident victims whose losses average $52,659—insurance paid only an average of $9,048, or 17 percent of the average loss after the case was settled out of court."

Gildea further notes that more than 93 percent of the accident victims who lost more than $25,000 failed to get the full amount due them. Most got about one-third of their actual losses.

On the other hand, persons involved in less serious accidents in 1967 were paid much more than the losses incurred. Those in the $500 range received 4.5 times their actual losses, Gildea writes.

The main reason for this inequity, he notes, is that the insurance companies find it cheaper to bypass the legal and court costs and "buy off" the claim to avoid the greater expense of processing it.

Rate controls by state insurance commissions are almost non-existent, the article declares. "The increase in insurance rates of some 70 percent in the past six years—twice the increase in the Consumer Price Index—shows that the states have not done their job."

"As a result of the chaos which has occurred at the state levels, advocates of reform have incorporated the no-fault concept into legislation now pending in Congress," Gildea notes.

The legislation would require every automobile owner to have insurance that covers personal injury for himself and other drivers of the car, in addition to passengers and pedestrians. All insurance companies would be required to accept qualified applicants.

Insurance companies would also be barred from cancelling or refusing to renew policies for any reason other than revocation of a driver's license or non-payment of premiums.

Gildea reports that among key benefits no-fault would provide are:

- All medical and rehabilitation costs, plus after tax wage losses up to $1,000 a month.
- Losses of future anticipated income or for impairment of earning capacity.
- All fees for services needed during recovery.
- Recovery of all damages caused by an uninsured auto.

To speed up payment, Gildea notes, the no-fault proposal would require insurance companies to compensate accident victims on at least a monthly basis. Interest charges would be added to claims not paid after 40 days.

The major opposition to national no-fault insurance comes from the American Trial Lawyers Association. More than 90 percent of its 26,000 members depend largely on auto accident claims and related legal action.

"In the past few years," the article states, "these fees have siphoned off about 35 percent of the total dollar amount paid to accident victims."

Massachusetts and Puerto Rico have no-fault insurance plans in operation that have proved their value to consumers. Gildea notes that the Massachussets plan has already saved motorists in the state an estimated $76 million in bodily injury insurance premiums.

And the Puerto Rico plan, which is a mini-version of the no-fault bill pending in Congress, pays out 90 cents of every premium dollar to compensate accident victims, almost double the return from auto insurance in the states.

Exiles Praise AFL-CIO on Haitian Policy

The AFL-CIO Executive Council was praised by Haitian exiles on its recent statement calling for sanctions against the regime in Haiti in an effort to win democracy and freedom for the people of the Caribbean nation.

The Haitian Resistance, headquartered in Montreal, sent a cable congratulating the council on its action "in the name of 5 million Haitians reduced to servitude" by the Haitian government. Telephone calls also were received from Haitian exile leaders in Puerto Rico and Venezuela endorsing the council statement.

The council urged the U.S. government and international agencies to impose "strict economic sanctions against Haiti" until the new Duvalier regime ends its despotic repression.

Public Employe Leaders Jailed:

Canadian Labor Congress Rallies to Quebec Strikers

Ottawa—The first resolution adopted by the Canadian Labor Congress at its biennial convention here was one of support for the troubled public service employes in Quebec province.

The 210,000 public service employes in Quebec had struck for 11 days until legislation forced them to return to work. Then their leaders were jailed for terms ranging from six months to one year for contempt of court because they had urged workers to ignore an injunction forbidding strike action at one hospital during the walkout.

There had been reports of a rift between workers in Quebec and those in the rest of Canada, but the 1,800 delegates to the CLC convention adopted the resolution of support unanimously with a standing vote.

CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald called the vote "a great moment in Canadian history." He said he hoped the mass media, which had carried reports of the rift, would note the solidarity shown by the convention.

The resolution called for general amnesty for all trade unionists jailed in Quebec in the current crisis, and it urged the provincial government to resume negotiations immediately with representatives of the public service workers without threats of coercion.

The resolution supported "the legitimate collective bargaining aims" of the Quebec public service workers. But it made no mention of support for the demonstrations, takeovers of radio stations and even violence that had occurred in several Quebec communities during protests against the jail sentences.

Speaker after speaker supported the resolution, led off by J-Henri Lorrain of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, a vice president of the CLC. He said the Quebec issue was one that extended beyond the province's boundaries and affected the rights of every trade unionist.

Several speakers warned that compulsory arbitration was spreading throughout Canada, a theme that took up much of MacDonald's hour-long presidential address.

Earlier, Premier William Davis of Ontario had told the delegates his government was continuing an extension of compulsory arbitration. Ontario's hospital workers already are forbidden by law to strike, and the provincial legislature now is considering legislation that would forbid strikes by the province's 55,000 civil servants.

MacDonald said workers should have the right to withhold their labor "without being intimidated by threats of stiff fines and jail sentences," as was happening in Quebec. He added:

"The right of organized workers to withhold their labor is, in the final analysis, the only way in which the collective bargaining process can remain viable. if the right to strike is outlawed, collective bargaining can be nothing more than chit-chat between the employer and the union, with the employer in the end unilaterally decreeing wages, salaries and other conditions. What is the difference between this and company unionism?"

MacDonald also devoted much of his address to the state of the economy, roundly criticizing federal government policies for current high unemployment.

He said the ruling politicians in Canada "have allowed themselves to become captives of the inept economic advice" of senior public officials in the Dept. of Finance and the Bank of Canada. There is need, instead, he said for "imaginative understanding of the modern economic problems of this country."

MacDonald also touched on Canada's relations with the United States, especially over foreign trade trends which he said could have grave consequences for the Canadian economy.

He expressed misgivings about the effects of the Domestic International Sales Corporations (DISC) program, which permits American companies to defer tax payments on half their profits from sales outside the country.

And he voiced concern about the possible impact of the proposed Foreign Trade & Investment Act—the Burke-Hartke bill—which he noted has strong support from "powerful elements in the U.S. including important elements within the American trade union movement."

MacDonald's criticisms were included in a statement on economic policy adopted by the convention on its second day.

Bommarito Cites Case Against Multinationals

ports, and for the export of jobs from both Canada and the United States and thus hope "to divert the public's attention from themselves and their economic cannibalism."

Multinational corporations are the fastest-growing institution in American society, Bommarito said. And American multinational subsidiaries in foreign countries, totaling more than 8,000, have become the third largest productive force in the world, "only superseded by the U.S. and Russia."

As an example, he noted that the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. produces a yearly volume abroad of nearly $2.5 billion in manufactured goods and has more employes abroad than in the United States.

He cited the case of Chrysler, which acquired 35 percent of Mitsubishi Motors, part of a large Japanese conglomerate.

"The Japanese government 'suggested' that in exchange for permitting this investment, Chrysler would agree to import into the U.S. the Dodge Colt manufactured in Japan—36,000 in 1971, 60,000 in 1972 and 175,000 by 1975. Chrysler, however, insisted that in return Japan agree to import the Plymouth Valiant. Where are the Plymouth Valiants manufactured? Australia."

The problem posed for labor by the multinationals, Bommarito said, has gone far beyond the stage of correction through collective bargaining.

"It's too big for handling on a union-by-union and corporation-by-corporation basis," he added. "It has to be accomplished through legislation."

He said the Burke-Hartke bill would remove the tax loopholes and other advantages that "make it profitable for the multinational to export jobs overseas—to prevent situations like U.S. Steel paying four times as much tax to Venezuela than to the U.S."

It would regulate "the torrent of imports that have smothered U.S. production and cost hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs;" it would make taxes on U.S. corporations overseas "relate more closely to the tax rules domestically;" it would help regulate the outflow of international capital transactions, and it would provide an improved program to speed anti-dumping complaints and provide relief to affected industries and workers. "Under current law, by the time a determination is made, a U.S. industry can be forced out of business and its workers jobless."

Bakery Workers Name Regional Vice President

The executive board of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers has appointed Charles E. Messer a vice president representing the union's fourth region. He succeeds Amos Miller, who retired.

ILO Conference Urges Safer Road Transport

Geneva—A 30-nation conference sponsored by the International Labor Organization has called for a redoubling of efforts to improve safety and working conditions in the road transport industry.

The delegates, representing workers, employers and governments, stressed in their conclusions that changes and improvements must take account of the "legitimate aspirations for social and occupational advancement" of the workers.

U.S. worker delegates to the 10-day session of the ILO's Inland Transport Committee were Vice Pres. William Winpisinger of the Machinists and Vice Pres. Kenneth Moore of the United Transportation Union.

The committee adopted a resolution calling on the ILO's Governing Body to bring together at the "earliest possible date" a panel of union, industry and government representatives to plan a major ILO conference on civil aviation.

In its conclusion on road transport, the delegates urged all nations to maintain a strong inspection service to insure that working conditions and safety requirements set out in legislation and collective bargaining agreements are "strictly observed."

It urged early retirement benefits for drivers with medical problems who can't be provided with "reasonable alternative employment."

Winpisinger and Moore said the conference offered a valuable insight into problems in other nations, even though many of the difficulties cited during discussions have already been overcome in the United States.

The conference was also attended by Rudolph Faupl, the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO Governing Body.

A SURVIVOR of the Sunshine Silver Mine disaster, Byron Schulz, pauses during his narration of the tragedy that claimed 91 miners' lives. Schulz was seated next to Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) during his testimony before a House Labor subcommittee.

Wide Safety Violations Charged at Idaho Mine

the last man to leave the Sunshine mine alive May 2 when the fire struck.

The survivor, Byron Schulz, narrated the horror of watching his fellow miners die in carbon monoxide-choked tunnels nearly a mile beneath the ground.

They died, he said, because lifesaving respirator masks were either not available or not functioning or the miners didn't know how to operate them in the onrush of the odorless, but deadly, carbon monoxide gas generated by the fire.

In two years of employment at the mine, Schulz said, he had never received safety instructions and had never seen a fire drill.

He told of riding down to the 5,000-foot level of the mine after learning of the fire. He found the smoke there extremely thick.

"The men were choking . . . down on their knees gasping for air. Many of them couldn't operate the respirators. I had to show them how they work," he said.

There weren't enough respirators for everyone, and Schulz testified that he had to use a pipe wrench to get some of them functioning.

"Mr. Chairman," he told Rep. Dominick Daniels (D-N.J.), "I was extremely lucky; some of the men weren't."

The young father of two was repeatedly congratulated for his acts of heroism by members of the subcommittee, including Daniels, who said he was "shocked and appalled at what I've heard this morning."

Schulz further testified that he had "been given a bad time," for filing safety grievances, as did Pres. Lavern A. Melton of USWA Local 5087.

Melton, who had worked the graveyard shift, 11 p.m. to 7 a.m., the day of the fire, said there had been no fire drills in the seven years he has worked at the Sunshine mine, no respirator drills and that the company had refused his request to accompany a federal mine inspector investigating an unsafe work location where one miner had died and another had been seriously injured.

The USWA presented a sheaf of correspondence between Melton and mine officials on safety, and Melton told the committee that the company's standard response to requests for implementation of safety standards was that they were "not economically feasible" or that "they might set a precedent."

Some of the more conservative members of the House panel indicated in their questioning of the USWA witnesses that they felt the union should have made enforcement of safety regulations a subject of contract bargaining.

But Daniels, who co-authored the Occupational Health & Safety Act, pledged his support of strong federal legislation on mine safety.

He also read a 1966 statement from the Sunshine Mining Co. insisting that "the primary responsibility for safe operating procedures in providing the proper equipment and facilities for a safe working program is a management function of the industry."

The statement had been issued as part of the company's opposition to the Metal & Nonmetallic Mine Safety Act, which became law in 1966 and which Sunshine viewed as "an unnecessary imposition."

A particularly damning statement came from Frank S. McKee, director of USWA District 38, who said the most tragic facet of the fire was the lack of useable safety equipment that could have saved more men.

He said respirators were locked up in the mine so that miners were forced to break open the locks and then read the instructions "in the midst of a fire while choking to death."

No units were available on mine elevators and when elevator operators died in the fire, the hoists stopped, thus condemning more men to death.

Meanwhile, word was received in Idaho that the Nixon Administration would not declare the mining district a disaster area, but instead sent its "sympathy and concern."

"Sympathy and concern is fine, but it buys very little at the grocery store," Gov. Cecil D. Andrus (D) said. He had requested the presidential action along with Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) so that stricken families might receive emergency aid.

Abel announced that the USWA had made a $25,000 contribution to the Sunshine Miners Disaster Fund to aid the families of the disaster victims. The fund is being administered by McKee as Director of USWA District 38 with headquarters in Los Angeles.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams (D-N.J.) announced that an investigation of the disaster also was under way by the Senate Labor Committee, which he heads.

'Senseless' Do-Nothingism

AS GOV. GEORGE CORLEY WALLACE lay under the scalpels of a team of this area's finest surgeons, candidates for President, statesmen and politicians of all stripes took to the television stump to deplore "senseless violence" in our society, to wonder about the health of the body politic and to raise deep questions about the strong current of violence running just millimeters under the surface in our country.

Too little is known at this point, it seems to us, about the suspect in the Wallace shooting to draw any sweeping conclusions as to whether this act illuminates dark recesses in all the rest of us or indeed as to what this all means or will come to mean in the political processes of the United States.

We do know a few things, though. First, Gov. Wallace was shot with a hand gun. Second, the man whom federal and state authorities have identified as the suspect in the shooting was arrested last October in Wisconsin on a concealed weapons charge. Finally, we know that gun control legislation has been dragged before an unwilling Congress year after year—to no avail.

Yet, there we all were, on Monday, May 16, 1972, with a presidential candidate cut open on an operating table, with our leaders crying about his spilt blood and with the memories of Friday, Nov. 22, 1963, Thursday, Apr. 4, 1968, and Wednesday, June 5, 1968, etched indelibly in our minds and upon our collective spirits.

And still, through all the days of all those years of grief for our honored public men, for peace officers by the score and for unnamed and little noted private citizens, murdered, maimed and accidentally killed by private weapons in unlicensed hands, we have not been able to pass the sort of gun control legislation that would make these grievous public and private events much less likely to occur.

The passage of such legislation would do much to change the atmosphere in this country at a time when our doubts about violence in our national life trouble us deeply.

Finally, it seems to us that our leaders—all of those presidential candidates, including the President himself—who were so fulsome in their denunciation of violence two days ago might strike a more positive note by setting forth clear positions favoring strong gun control legislation.

Gov. Wallace, himself, could do the nation a great service by reconsidering his strong position in opposition to gun laws. For in the end, it is useless to deplore "senseless violence," no matter how passionately and eloquently, while doing nothing about it.

—From an editorial in the Washington Post, May 17, 1972.

The Unassailable Facts

The absolute need for federal hand gun control legislation is seen by the unassailable facts: in the past 10 years 560 policemen have been killed in the line of duty, three-quarters of them by hand guns; nationwide comparably the United States has more homicides than any other country in the world, 52 percent caused by hand guns.

The AFL-CIO stands firmly committed to legislation that will provide for registration of all guns in private possession, an action which has the overwhelming support of the American people.

A Word Edgewise:

Credit-Card Radicals Provoke Wider Support for Demagogues

By John P. Roche

THE INTELLECTUAL WORLD these days is populated with latter-day Oswald Spenglers who echo the theme that the United States is a corrupt, dying society in the last stages of degeneration.

This has to be understood as the background music for the virulent anti-Americanism that has surfaced in connection with the war in Vietnam: we no longer have a significant anti-war movement. What we have is a loud and quite nasty rooting section for a Hanoi victory.

This came home to me with a vengeance a few days ago in the airport at Los Angeles. Two distinctively academic types were sitting behind me in the waiting room and they were absolutely furious at the Russians. "It's unbelievable, outrageous!" said the first. "You're damn right," agreed the other: "They just can't let Nixon get away with this!"

Not wanting to land up in the Los Angeles jail for aggravated assault, I rose, paid them my respects in brief, pungent fashion, and went off to sit someplace else.

But it got me fuming inside: those miserable and obviously affluent characters (a word chosen out of respect for the sensitivities of my readers) had a frank, untroubled dedication to American defeat. What they hoped the Soviets would do I never learned; I suppose a nuclear attack would have made their day.

This same pattern of anti-Americanism was recently discussed by the extremely perceptive writer, Midge Decter, at a League for Industrial Democracy banquet honoring George Meany. She suggested that the root of the intellectual's scorn for the labor movement was its success. The passage is worth extensive quotation.

"What is important to note (Miss Decter said) is that beneath the particular details of the ever-lengthening indictment of labor (by the radical intelligentsia) ran a single unbroken and unspoken thread of attitude. The labor movement was being charged with having had the bad taste and graceless temerity to achieve a wholesome number of its purposes."

These intellectuals, she argued, have a vested interest in the failure of the American social order. Thus any institution that seems to be working must incur their hatred and disdain. Then she really took off the gloves:

"But it is the luxury of the stability that (the labor movement has) brought to the American social order . . . which makes it possible for the free-thinking, free-speaking, comfortable and secure enemies of that order to continue plying their reckless trade. As the nations of Western Europe, secure under the American nuclear umbrella, liberated from the palling economic necessities of their own defense, were freed thereby to become heedless critics of American foreign policy, so have (the radical intellectuals) been freed to deplore as recklessly and self-servingly as they wish the fruits of both our political liberty and our economic achievement."

I HAVE QUOTED this at length because I simply could not have said it better. It cuts to the heart of what I have called "credit card radicalism."

More than that: the existence of this dishonorable sector in American society generates the ferocity of the Yahoos and provides a constituency for demagogues like George Wallace. (The supreme irony is, of course, that if the Yahoos ever took power in the United States Miss Decter and I would be marched to the gallows along with the anti-Americans. One "pointy-head" looks pretty much like another to those who consider intellectuals as such to be the curse of the land.)

But the Yahoos won't take power—to the profound disappointment of the intellectuals who have been predicting a "police state"—and, thank God, when the going at the university gets rough I can always go off for a good talk with Pete and Ray, the custodians.

In Government:

AFL-CIO's Platform Proposals Keyed to Restoring Fair Policies

The following is excerpted from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's summary statement of the federation's platform proposals to the Democratic and Republican platform committees. Meany presented the AFL-CIO views at a session of the Democratic Platform Committee in Washington, May 15, 1972.

EVERY FOUR YEARS, the AFL-CIO presents to the platform committees of the major parties our program for America. We do not write one statement for Republicans and another for Democrats, because the problems of people, which are our overriding concern, should not be divisible along party lines.

The people's problems are real, and the people have a right, under this system of government, to look to their government for redress of their grievances. But in this search they have been frustrated by both the Congress and the Executive Branch, which have too often ignored the people's problems in order to respond to the pleas of special interests.

It is time for the government to put the people first. It is time that the best system of government ever devised be put to work for the benefit of all the people. That is why we ask each of the parties to deal squarely—specifically and candidly—for the purpose of restoring fairness, equity and compassion to government policies.

There is a need today for the "unalienable rights" of the people, set forth in the Declaration of Independence, to be defined in concrete, human terms. This means the right to a job with decent pay and working conditions; good health and quality medical care; quality education for all children; clean water to drink and clean air to breathe; decent housing; safety on the street, in the home, at the workplace and on the highways; dignity in the latter years of life; protection in the marketplace from unsafe products, fraudulent warrantees and deceptive insurance and bank practices.

Above all, the people have a right to have confidence that this system of government will function for the benefit of all its citizens. But this confidence is being undermined by policies that tax unfairly; by a government that refuses to tell the people the truth about foreign affairs and the domestic economy; by the increase in slums and poverty, and by the human misery of unemployment.

When the word "politician" becomes a dirty word in the lexicon of America, then something is grievously wrong. America needs a return to the day when elected officials considered themselves public servants—responsible to all the people, not just a chosen few.

Therefore, we have prepared detailed suggestions on a great many issues. They are not proposals to make labor strong to the detriment of others, for that would not be proper or just. We do not ask for a labor government, and we reject a government by corporations. In its simplest terms what we seek is a return to, as Abraham Lincoln said, government "of the people, by the people, for the people. . . ."

Our proposals for the platforms of both parties would make people and their welfare the primary focus of government policy. They would reverse the unhealthy trend toward concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few individuals and corporations.

In advocating these "unalienable" human rights, we also plead for preservation of the basic civil rights and liberties that guarantee that all Americans are free men. Erosion of freedom, in the pretense of protecting the public interest, has long been the way of dictatorship. That, we submit, is totally incompatible with democracy.

We reject the demagogue who incites racial unrest or the administrator who coldly refuses to carry out the law of the land, because we are convinced that the American people still hold as "self-evident" the truth that all men are created equal. Much progress has been made toward equality of opportunity for all Americans, and demagogues and administrators must not be permitted to undo that progress.

Those who would divide America along racial, age, ethnic or income lines really are dividing people from their government—undermining public confidence in the ability of their government to function for the benefit of all citizens.

We are firmly committed to the proposition that there is no problem too large or complex for the American system of government to correct if that government truly puts the welfare of the people above all else.

We ask both parties to restore public confidence in the government. We fully realize that there is a wide streak of cynicism among politicians and political commentators whenever the subject of platforms is raised. "Platforms are made to run on, not stand on," is what some say. The American people deserve better.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE do not want platforms that are glib advertising slogans—pap fed to voters before election day and forgotten afterward. As far as we are concerned, and as far as the American people are concerned, platforms are a solemn pledge—a pledge that must be kept. We believe that the party conventions must restore public confidence in their platforms by binding their standard bearers and their legislative leadership to keeping the party's word.

And, so, we urge each party to say what you mean, mean what you say, and do what you say.

Fosters Starvation Pay:

'Workfare Plan' Hit as Subsidy To Sweatshop-Type Employers

THE SO-CALLED workfare plan being shaped by the Senate Finance Committee would use federal funds to subsidize "employers who are paying the most unconscionable wages" and encourage them to continue "starvation pay," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged.

Pointing out that the plan would force welfare mothers into jobs paying as little as $1.20 an hour with the federal payment pushing it up to the minimum wage, Seidman declared the plan offers "no incentive whatsoever for such employers to increase their wages." He agreed fully with a recent New York Times editorial stating that "the program would put the government in a two-way partnership with cut-rate private employers."

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman hit hard at the public service employment aspect of the Senate Finance Committee's plan whereby welfare recipients would be assigned to government jobs in public institutions and other areas at wages less than half the government's own poverty-level figure.

The committee itself "assigns no value to these jobs," he stressed, noting that although pay would be set at three-quarters of the minimum wage, if the minimum wage were improved, as now appears likely, "they'll just cut the hours of work . . . to hold down the income of these people."

Seidman said the AFL-CIO strongly supports a wide-ranging public service employment program, provided the jobs "pay decent wages . . . have some opportunity for advancement . . . and provide meaningful training leading to real jobs." Moreover, he declared, "all the surveys that have ever been taken demonstrate that the people now on welfare are very anxious to get such jobs."

Seidman renewed the call for adoption of the welfare reform amendment sponsored by Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) and a large bipartisan group of co-sponsors, which would "establish the whole welfare program on a federal basis."

By Press Associates, Inc.

IF YOU HAVEN'T HEARD about "The Great Withholding Caper of 1972" it's about time that you did.

At least, that's the way the U.S. Treasury Dept. and the Internal Revenue Service feel about it.

It involves the fact that more money is being withheld from paychecks in 1972 than should be. There is no law against keeping money in the IRS bank account, but there would be more money to spend today. Here is the problem.

In calendar year 1971 the IRS did not withhold enough money from most paychecks. The initial Treasury withholding schedule for 1972 reacted sharply—the other way. As a result, anywhere between $5 billion to $8 billion over-withholding is being taken out of paychecks.

Many persons were counting their increased take-home pay beginning with the first paycheck of 1972 as a result of the 1969 Tax Reform Act. They were surprised to find that although their taxes were supposedly reduced—slightly—more money was being withheld.

Some thought that the extra bite out of their paychecks was part of a diabolical plot of the Nixon Administration to reduce the federal deficit, originally estimated to be about $38 billion.

This isn't true, says Edgar R. Fiedler, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for economic policy. In fact, he says that it will mean some complications with the economy being deprived of billions of dollars of purchasing power at the very time it needs the boost.

Fiedler and the IRS have been pressing a campaign urging that persons who have been over-withheld fill out revised Forms W-4 to reduce the money taken from their pay envelopes.

Two groups can take advantage of this opportunity to get some more cash now:

- The single worker, employed at only one job, earning $25,000 a year or less, and
- The married worker, holding only one job, whose spouse does not work and who earns $31,000 a year or less.

Additional exemptions may be claimed if a person can show that he will have a large number of itemized deductions during the year which would decrease his taxes.

IRS, which has enough problems these days trying to police price controls, has issued press releases, television and radio spots explaining the over-withholding featuring the IRS Commissioner and another dramatization of the problem.

Apparently, this hasn't been too effective. Fiedler admits that less than one-quarter of the 40 million taxpayers being over-withheld have moved to file new Forms W-4. Some IRS offices are reporting as few as 5 percent making the change.

JUST WHY MANY persons are cool to the idea of decreasing their withholding is easy to understand. Many of them were burned this year, when their 1971 taxes were under-withheld and they had to shell out a healthy additional sum to make up for it.

There is another problem. Many declare less exemptions than they can claim because this will mean a refund at the end of the tax year. It's forced savings.

Some economists say that if $5 billion or $6 billion were withheld over and above scheduled taxes, there could be serious inflationary pressures when this amount of money is suddenly pushed into the economy early next year.

Fedler says this is not a real problem. He points out that some taxpayers are making the revisions in withholdings, and some higher bracket taxpayers will not be influenced in their spending habits.

The best thing about this whole "withholding caper," though, is that this is one tax problem that a person can decide for himself. It's not like playing around with the massive loopholes enjoyed by the wealthy and big corporations, but he can make his own decision.

FEDERAL SUBSIDY for the "starvation pay" of low-wage employers will emanate from the Senate Finance Committee's "workfare plan," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Spencer Rich of the Washington Post and Marjorie Hunter of the New York Times. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

House Vote on Minimum Wage Bill

The House on May 11 rejected a labor-supported $2 minimum wage bill that would have expanded coverage to millions of low-paid workers. Instead it substituted a Republican bill with no additional coverage and a $1.80 wage floor.

The substitute bill was adopted on a 217-191 recorded teller vote.

On labor's scoreboard, the 69 Democrats and 148 Republicans who voted for the substitute bill were Wrong (W). The 171 Democrats and 20 Republicans who opposed the cutback cast Right (R) votes.

From Suppliers:

Senate Unit Probes Medicare Kickbacks

to determine whether "providers of services are receiving hidden rebates from their suppliers."

In this case, the Aetna office in Los Angeles was not thoroughly investigating possible rebates. The SSA acknowledged that "in cases of rebates that are contrary to state law" they probably would not be entered on the provider's books.

However, SSA examiners strongly recommended that Aetna "learn if money is being given to the facilities' owners, either as a kickback, rent, billing fee, or fee for the privilege of doing business in the facility."

Responding to the SSA report, an Aetna official, R. E. Stewart, wrote: "Questions can be asked: however, the answers to them are not necessarily revealing of the total circumstances."

Max W. Fine, executive secretary of the Health Security Action Council, commenting on the reported rebates problem, told Hart that the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare has repeatedly refused attempts by private citizens and labor unions to investigate such reports.

Fine charged that rebates "artifically" drive up the costs of medical care for everyone and must be stopped.

Fine appeared with Auto Workers Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who testified that 700 insurance companies have established a super-secret, "CIA-type" data bank containing the health records of more than 11 million Americans.

Woodcock identified the data bank as the Medical Information Bureau of Greenwich, Conn.

He said that the data bank helps commercial insurers determine the "profitable and non-profitable risks."

"What this means," he continued, "is that insurance companies want to sell sickness insurance to healthy people."

Joseph C. Wilberding, executive director of the MIB, followed Woodcock to the witness chair and admitted the existence of the $8 million computer operation.

At first Wilberding claimed that only life insurance companies had access to the material, but under questioning by Hart conceded that commercial life insurance companies sell 85 percent of commercial health insurance sold in the United States.

He acknowledged that consumers had no way of knowing that information on their insurance applications would be fed into the computer or that 700 companies would have access to that information.

He promised to inform any consumers of the material in their files if they write and request it, but the committee drew the admission that the MIB is housed in an unmarked building and has an unlisted telephone number.

Wilberding also told the committee that no company is allowed to reject an applicant solely on the basis of MIB information, but companies are required to conduct their own investigation. He offered no details as to how this rule is enforced.

Opening the second day's hearings, Pennsylvania insurance commissioner Herbert S. Denenberg condemned mass-marketed health insurance as distributed by "mail-order hucksters" and as "junk" or "Mickey Mouse" insurance.

He recommended that Congress and state legislatures consider laws to remove these companies from the market. "The public is being taken," he told Hart.

Denenberg told the subcommittee that one "notorious cancer policy" returns only 7 cents on the premium dollar to subscribers.

The subcommittee staff produced charts showing that the Combined Insurance Group, which is headed by W. Clement Stone, a major contributor to Pres. Nixon's campaign funds, paid only 40 cents on the premium dollar.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has charged that Stone's company "is notorious for writing policies that are long on profits and short on benefits."

The subcommittee's hearings will resume June 6, 7, and 8.

THE IMPACT OF IMPORTS on America's economy and jobs is discussed by union and management representatives of the apparel industry at a meeting with members of the New York congressional delegation. Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob Potofsky and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller urged the legislators to support the Burke-Hartke bill as the most constructive approach to the import problem. In the foreground is Rep. Frank J. Horton (R). Others, from left, are Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R), Mayor Stephen May of Rochester, N.Y., Potofsky, Rep. Emanuel Celler, Research Director Lazare Teper of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Biemiller, and Chester Kessler, president of the Clothing Manufacturers Association.

Labor Asks Expansion Of GI Education Aid

Davis stressed, the current GI Bill is "a shadow of its former self."

The Administration has proposed an 8.6 percent increase in benefit levels and the House has approved a 14 percent increase.

Both are inadequate, Davis said. "At a minimum," he urged, education benefits should be raised the 40 percent advocated by Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee.

Davis also urged that low-interest tuition loans be made available to veterans, financed through the National Servicemen's Life Insurance Fund.

While supporting these and other liberalizations of the GI bill, the AFL-CIO statement urged tighter controls on payments to profit-making correspondence and vocational training schools.

"Many of these schools cruelly prey on the desire of veterans to get ahead," Davis said. "They promise much and deliver little."

He noted that over the past five years, the Veterans Administration has paid out some $156 million for correspondence schools alone—even though three out of four veterans who enroll fail to complete them.

He cited an AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution warning of "fly-by-night so-called 'approved for veterans' schools" that make misleading claims of job opportunities on graduation.

Davis said the "diplomas" awarded by some of these schools "are worth less than the paper they are printed on—and certainly less than the prices they charge."

America's veterans, the AFL-CIO said, deserve better from their country than "indifference from the government, indifference from employers and indifference from the educational system."

Apart from the nation's obligation to its veterans, Davis said, America will benefit from "the educated veteran who can market his skills, earn a decent wage and sustain himself as a productive member of society."

TWUA Settles With 6 Major Northern Mills

New York—The Textile Workers Union of America announced that it has reached a three-year agreement providing a wage-fringe package of about 50 cents an hour for employes of six leading northern cotton-synthetic mills.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the package, which varies in minor details from plant to plant, is expected to set a pattern for settlements with some 75 other companies employing approximately 25,000 workers in the New England and Mid-Atlantic states.

The new contract, effective immediately, has been ratified by TWUA members at the American Thread Co. in Willimantic, Conn.; Bates Manufacturing Co., Lewiston and Augusta, Me.; West Point-Pepperell, Inc. and Biddeford Textiles in Biddeford, Me.; Berkshire Hathaway, Inc. in New Bedford, Mass., and Waumbec Co.'s weaving and dyeing plants in Manchester, N.H.

TWUA negotiators were led by J. Harold Daoust, the union's cotton-synthetic industry director. Generally speaking, Daoust said, the new agreement provides increases of 15 cents an hour in 1972, 1973 and 1974, with the remainder consisting of fringe benefit improvements.

At Berkshire Hathaway, Daoust said, workers voted to take 3 cents more in fringe improvements rather than wages.

Serving with Pollock and Daoust on the union's contract policy committee were TWUA Sec.-Treas. Sol Stetin, Thomas J. Pitarys of Nashua-Manchester, N.H.; Denis A. Blais, Lewiston, Me.; Alex Anastasoff, Biddeford, Me., and Frank Gencarella, Willimantic, Conn.

2 More Hawaii Units Vote for State-County

Honolulu—Two more groups of state employes in Hawaii voted for the State, County & Municipal Employes in union representation elections.

The union was picked as bargaining representative for a unit of more than 3,000 engineering and technical workers and, in a separate vote, by 300 white-collar supervisors.

AFSCME reported that it now represents 18,500 state employes in Hawaii.

School Busing Issue Intensifies in Congress

House Democrats voted in caucus not to cave in to demands to instruct committees to report anti-civil rights legislation under the guise of outlawing busing.

Rep. Joe D. Waggonner, Jr. (La.) asked the Democratic caucus to order the House Education & Labor Committee to approve a bill that would amount to giving congressional approval to "freedom of choice" school systems that the courts have ruled unconstitutional.

His motion also would have directed the House Judiciary Committee to send to the floor the Administration's busing moratorium bill, despite the legislation's unconstitutional aspects

House Speaker Carl Albert (Okla.) led the fight to table, and thus kill, the pro-segregation instructions. The Democratic caucus did so by a 115-87 vote. Labor and civil rights groups helped rally opposition to the effort to turn the clock back towards the era of segregated schools.

The politically volatile, emotion-laden busing issue has also held up congressional agreement on multi-billion dollar higher education legislation that passed both the House and Senate during 1971.

The House twice ordered its conferees to stand firm for the series of anti-civil rights amendments it had written into the bill.

After three months of futile meetings, House and Senate negotiators reached an agreement during an all-night session that continued until 5:30 a.m.

It would impose, until Dec. 31, 1973, a moratorium on all court-ordered busing until all appeals from the order are exhausted. Also prohibited for 18 months until appeals are exhausted would be court-ordered student transfers where busing is not required.

The final language was only narrowly approved by the conferees—with most Senate liberals voting against it and with opposition expressed on the House side from both liberal and conservative ranks—for different reasons.

The tough anti-desegregation langauge adopted by the conference committee has led the AFL-CIO and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights to oppose passage of the legislation.

To complicate the anticipated battle over approval of the conference report, there are disagreements over substantive provisions of the legislation that have nothing to do with busing.

There were more than 200 differences between the House and Senate versions that had to be resolved by the conferees on a bill that authorizes $18.5 billion through mid-1975.

It includes a vastly expanded program of student assistance—up to $1,400 a year for college students from the poorest families.

It also provides direct federal funds to both public and private colleges and prohibits any public undergraduate school or public or private graduate school from discriminating against women in admissions policies.

Imports Prompt Aid to 125 at Marble Works

The Labor Dept. has certified 125 members of the Steelworkers eligible for financial assistance and retraining because their jobs with a Vermont marble firm were adversely affected by imports.

The workers were employed by Vermont Marble Co. of Proctor, Vt., in the firm's quarries, plants and offices. As imports of marble and travertine increased in the United States and the firm's sales dropped off, overall employment at Vermont Marble declined 27 percent since July 1970.

Certification for trade adjustment assistance was approved after the USWA filed a petition in behalf of the affected union members.

Workers' assistance under the Trade Expansion Act includes cash readjustment allowances, testing, training, job placement and relocation, if needed. The maximum payment for the cash allowance is now $93 a week.

Labor Lists Critical Needs:

Put-People-First Program Urged for Party Platforms

ciently, "the government must assume the obligation of being the employer of last resort."

Above all, Meany said, "we seek a rejection of unemployment as an instrument of national policy."

In response to questions, he cited as the best means of creating immediate jobs for large numbers of workers an accelerated public works program that would provide funds for the tens of thousands of blueprinted projects that cities, counties and states have been forced to sidetrack because of lack of money.

"That would be real revenue-sharing," Meany noted.

TAXES—The tax shelters and loopholes for the wealthy and corporations "place an undue burden on those who have little to benefit those who have much."

Citing examples of unequal taxation of the same income, the AFL-CIO declared:

"What it comes down to is that the worker is paying more than his fair share. It is withheld from his paycheck. Earned income—earned by honest work on an assembly line, in a painstaking craft, in a laborious service — is overtaxed. Unearned income — where money does the work rather than the man, the special privilege of the wealthy —is undertaxed, if taxed at all."

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS—"Stripped of its fancy disguise," the Administration proposal to curb the right to strike in transportation industry disputes adds up to compulsory arbitration.

"It would force free American workers to labor against their will for the private profit of other American citizens. . . . It is a proposal that should be repugnant to any American who believes in freedom."

POVERTY—"An adequate minimum wage covering all workers is the best single step this country can take to alleviate poverty."

Welfare reform is vital but proposals to require welfare recipients to work for less than an already inadequate minimum wage would "only drive them further into the trap of poverty."

And "essential to welfare reform must be a federally-funded, community-controlled system of day care centers."

HEALTH CARE—Most Americans, not just the very poor, are deprived of their right to quality health care "because the system for delivering health care is geared more to profits than health."

The only proposal that faces up to all aspects of the problem, the AFL-CIO declared, is the Kennedy-Griffiths Health Security legislation.

The federation's statement acknowledged that all the problems of health care cannot be resolved overnight. But a start must be made to transform the system into one that "effectively provides for the health care needs of all the people, controls cost and is fairly financed by a system of contributory taxes matched by federal general revenues."

POLLUTION—"We believe that America can have a clean environment and jobs, too. Reasonable and enforced federal standards can significantly reduce emissions, without wiping out American industry."

And, the AFL-CIO urged, there must be recognition that the workplace is part of the environment. The Occupational Safety & Health law must be fully enforced.

URBAN PROBLEMS — Far-reaching programs are needed "to prevent the collapse of the nation's cities."

Housing opportunities must be greatly increased for low and middle income families.

"America's major education problem is not busing. It is inadequate schools. . . . The federal commitment to education is one of words backed with too few dollars."

Cities need help. "A massive federal program of public investment —schools, libraries, mass transit, sewage treatment facilities, hospitals—coupled with expanded public service employment programs will benefit the economy through increased jobs while, at the same time, solving some of America's urban problems."

FOREIGN TRADE & INVESTMENT—"For wanting to save his job from the tide of imports, for wanting work instead of welfare, the worker is being attacked. He is told that to safeguard American jobs by restricting imports would be harmful to consumers. Who is the consumer but an American worker? Without a job, he cannot afford to purchase any goods, whether made in the U.S. or in a foreign country."

The statement noted that tax and tariff loopholes have encouraged the growth of multinational corporations that use low-paid foreign workers to manufacture goods that are sold at U.S. prices.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS & DEFENSE — The AFL-CIO is "implacably opposed to governments which suppress the freedom of their people, whether these governments be dictatorships of the right or the left."

The Executive Branch has an obligation "to confide in the American people . . . to refrain from political adventures . . . to refuse to conduct international diplomacy as if it were a television spectacular . . . and, finally, never to use international relations as a domestic political vehicle."

Also, the AFL-CIO stressed, "we flatly reject the concept of isolationism. We believe in a defense establishment strong enough, but no stronger than necessary, to meet these obligations."

Veterans of Vietnam have been shortchanged. "We believe they are entitled to the training and education benefits that earlier veterans received, but in terms of today's costs."

In summarizing the AFL-CIO's platform proposals, Meany called for protection of the basic civil rights and liberties guaranteed to Americans.

"We reject the demagogues who incites racial unrest . . . We are firmly committed to the proposition that there is no problem too large or complex for the American system of government to correct if that government truly puts the welfare of the people above all else."

Nixon Nominates Shultz To Succeed Connally

George P. Shultz, who first entered the Nixon Administration as Secretary of Labor, has been nominated to succeed John B. Connally as Secretary of the Treasury.

Connally, a former Democratic governor of Texas, had emerged as the strong man in the Nixon Cabinet during his relatively brief 15 months in office.

He presided over the abrupt shift to wage-price controls, the devaluation of the dollar—and the Administration's blunt attacks on the labor movement and its leaders.

During the surprise White House announcement of his resignation, Connally and the President exchanged extravagant praise. The Texan is expected to take part in Nixon's re-election campaign, whether or not be formally switches to the Republican Party.

Shultz, who was dean of the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business before he was tapped for the Cabinet, early won Nixon's respect as an economist.

He was drafted by the President two years ago to head the then newly-created Office of Management & Budget. It meant a salary cut from his Cabinet pay. But it brought him into the powerful inner circle of the presidential operation —even though he was out of the public spotlight.

Casper W. Weinberger, now serving as Shultz's deputy, will succeed him as head of the Office of Management & Budget.

As Secretary of the Treasury, Shultz will be squarely in the spotlight he has previously shunned. Before his new appointment, Shultz was quoted as saying: "I don't think that the President looks at me as a great fount of wisdom about how to get re-elected. If he does, I'd be alarmed."

Nixon Tells It Like It Is To His Friends in Texas

Pres. Nixon has acknowledged that his proposal to curb "crippling strikes" in transportation industries is nothing but compulsory arbitration.

That's what labor has been saying from the start. But the President and his aides shunned the term and insisted on such phrases as "final offer selection."

Nixon didn't pussyfoot, however, during his recent visit to the Texas ranch of John Connally.

One of Connally's guests asked the President why the government can't stop strikes more quickly.

According to the official White House transcript, Nixon complained that Congress "has not acted" on the Administration bill "that would require, in effect, compulsory arbitration of such disputes."

Sheet Metal Workers Reach Rail Pact Accord

The Sheet Metal Workers became the last of the railroad shopcraft unions to settle with the nation's rail carriers—after 18 months of bargaining.

Elsewhere in the industry, a presidential emergency board recommended delay in any cutback of crew sizes on the financially beleaguered Penn Central Railroad. The board proposed that the carrier and the United Transportation Union continue bargaining on the dispute until next January and use that time to resolve the issue at the local level.

The Sheet Metal Workers agreement hinges on ratification by some 6,300 rail workers represented by the union. They have until June 1 to vote on the terms which follow the industry pattern of 42 percent over 42 months. The contract is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1971.

The wage package is in line with the recommendations of another emergency board, but there was an improvement in the controversial incidental work rule which permits the crossing of craft jurisdictions.

"We rewrote the troublesome incidental work rule so it can be lived with and policed to a great extent," said J. W. O'Brien, Sheet Metal Workers vice president in charge of railroad bargaining.

The rule was amended, the union said, so that it will not apply to any worker who has been performing a specific job for more than an hour.

The grievance procedure also was improved to apply to the implementation of the incidental work rule.

The emergency board in the Penn Central dispute was named Mar. 31 after the UTU threatened to strike the railroad after it announced that it would lay off about 6,000 brakemen and conductors Apr. 1.

After the board issued its report, UTU Pres. Al H. Chesser summoned the general chairman of the union to a meeting in Philadelphia May 23 to give "consideration to the recommendations."

Although Chesser was noncommital about the position of the union, he did say, "it is evident that the members of the board recognize the importance of settling such disputes through negotiation at the local level of operations."

The board made no mention in its recommendations of a Penn Central request to settle the dispute through compulsory arbitration.

A spokesman for the trustees of the bankrupt railroad said they were "concerned that the board did not make more specific recommendations."

Edmond Bishop Elected CWA Vice President

Edmond F. Bishop was elected a vice president of the Communications Workers to head the CWA's seven-state District 8. He succeeds John C. Carroll, who earlier was named an assistant to CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne.

Bishop formerly was Carroll's assistant in the Denver-based district.

IAM Appoints Winpisinger to Top Staff Post

Machinists Vice Pres. William W. Winpisinger has been named resident vice president and chief of staff of the IAM headquarters in Washington to succeed Charles F. West, who will retire Aug. 1.

IAM Pres. Floyd E. Smith announced that the union's executive council selected Dan Blue, an international representative in San Antonio, Tex., to fill West's unexpired term on the council. Blue will also take over Winpisinger's post as vice president for transportation.

Winpisinger, an IAM vice president since 1967, has been supervising the union's activities in the airline, railroad and auto repair industries. He also has been an alternate to Smith on the Pay Board.

West, who will turn 65 on July 14, has been resident vice president and chief of staff since 1969.

Senate Unit Okays $2.20 Wage Floor

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XVII | Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington, D. C. 20006 $2 a year | Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. | Saturday, May 27, 1972 | No. 21

Bill Extends Coverage to 8 Million

The Senate Labor Committee has voted 14-2 approval of a bill that would raise the federal minimum wage in steps to $2.20 an hour and expand coverage to an additional 8 million workers.

Newly-covered groups would include an estimated 5 million public employes, 2 million more retail store workers, about 1 million household domestics and an additional 150,000 farm workers.

By one-sided votes, the committee rejected Administration-backed amendments that would have slashed the bill down to the level of the measure passed earlier this month by a conservative coalition majority in the House. The Senate panel voted down efforts to cut back the wage levels, eliminate the new coverage and impose a lower pay floor for young workers.

The Senate bill, sponsored by Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.), was strongly backed by the AFL-CIO. It was sharply denounced as "inflationary" by Donald Rumsfeld, director of the Administration's Cost of Living Council.

Rumsfeld termed the House-passed bill "far more reasonable" and indicated an all-out Administration effort to get the Senate to dump the Labor Committee bill and adopt a substitute by Sen. Peter H. Dominick (R-Colo.) that closely follows the House bill.

The House version would raise the $1.60 pay floor of workers whose jobs had been covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act before 1966 to $1.80 an hour this year and $2 a year later. Workers who were covered for the first time in 1966—chiefly retail, hospital, hotel, restaurant and laundry workers—would move up only to $1.70 this year, going to $1.80 a year later and $2 the followng year. Covered farm workers, now frozen at a $1.30 subminimum, would be allowed to rise to a $1.50 wage floor and a new permanent ceiling of $1.70 a year later.

By contrast, the Senate bill would raise those covered before 1966 to $2 this year and $2.20 the following year. The groups covered in 1966 and those to be added to coverage this year would go to $1.80 and then, in annual steps, to $2 and $2.20. And farm workers would gradually be brought up to parity with other

Meany Bids Industry Join Forced Arbitration Battle

GEORGE MEANY PAINTS "because he enjoys it," says the catalogue for the exhibit of paintings by the AFL-CIO president at Automation House in New York during the annual Collective Bargaining Forum. Enjoying the company of the artist at a reception is Theodore W. Kheel, administrative director of the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations that sponsors the forum.

Compulsory Terms Held Threat to All

New York—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on employers to join with labor in fighting off a compulsory arbirtation law—and in making collective bargaining function more effectively.

"We need some new machinery to reduce the likelihood of strikes," Meany said. But he stressed that the solution must be found "in the collective bargaining process itself."

Meany told an audience that included top-level negotiators from both corporation and union ranks that development of "effective voluntary alternatives to strikes" is "a do-it-yourself project for management and labor. We cannot and must not look to Congress to handle it." (Excerpts, Page 5.)

In his speech to the annual collective bargaining forum of the Institue of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations, Meany stressed that free workers will "naturally resist" a solution to a dispute that is imposed on them.

"I don't believe either workers or management would regard a contract imposed by government as a document to be observed and respected," Meany declared.

As to the question posed to the conference, whether limitations on collective bargaining are "right or wrong," Meany stressed the distinction between voluntary and compulsory limitations.

When curbs on bargaining and the right to strike are imposed by law, he said, the answer is "wrong. Categorically and absolutely wrong."

Clothing Firm Fights Union:

Labor's Aid Pledged For Farah Strikers

El Paso, Tex.—Nearly 3,000 workers who are striking several plants of Farah Manufacturing Co. were pledged the support of the AFL-CIO in their struggle for the right to organize and bargain.

The Clothing Workers strike, which began in El Paso and San Antonio May 8, was precipitated by the company's unfair labor practices, the union reported. When the firm discharged a number of active union supporters, hundreds of workers struck.

Employes at other Farah plants—in Victoria, Tex., and Las Cruces and Albuquerque, N.M.—joined the walkout as the strike picked up momentum. Farah is one of the world's largest makers of men's slacks and sportswear.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany issued an appeal to all federation affiliates and state and local central bodies to support the struggle.

He said the ACWA "is asking union members and their families not to buy Farah slacks and sportswear. I urge your complete support of this boycott."

Demonstrations of support for the strikers have been conducted in 11 major cities across the country by ACWA members, with members of other unions joining their ranks.

Teams of strikers—most of whom are Mexican-Americans—were dispatched to the cities to coordinate the demonstrations with the help of local ACWA officials and AFL-CIO leaders.

But hundreds of strikers have been arrested for their activities in El Paso since the walkout began.

Antonio Sanchez, manager of the ACWA El Paso Joint Board, and ACWA Vice Pres. Leonard Levy charged that some of the strikers were taken from their homes in the middle of the night by police.

New Orleans Teachers Vote On Unity Plan

New Orleans — Merger action among rival teacher organizations has spread to Louisiana.

Unification of local organizations of the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association is up for ratification by public school teachers of Orleans parish in a mail referendum.

The merger proposal would bring together nearly 3,000 members—1,500 in the AFT and more than 1,300 in the NEA. The new organization will be affiliated with the AFT, the NEA and the Louisiana AFL-CIO.

Both groups now have an overlapping membership in the parish

Record Profits Top Optimistic Forecasts

Official Commerce Dept. figures show that after-tax profits for U.S. business surpassed even the most optimistic forecasts on first-quarter earnings, setting an all-time record.

Profits ran at an annual pace of $52.3 billion in the first three months of the year, the first time since 1966 that after-tax profits topped the $50 billion rate in a single quarter.

After-tax profits jumped $2.6 billion, or 5.2 percent, while wages and salaries increased by only 3.3 percent, according to the Commerce Dept. A significant part of the wage gain represented the "bulge" of retroactive payments unfrozen during the period.

The Commerce Dept. noted that the bulk of profit improvement in the first quarter occurred in manufacturing, where gains centered on durable goods. The highest increases were reported for auto machinery and metals firms.

Business Week magazine earlier had reported in a quarterly survey that nearly every sector of the economy was performing well and that after-tax profits were at least 15 percent over the first quarter of 1971 when company earnings were at a $45 billion seasonally adjusted rate.

Pre-tax profits rose $5.6 billion—or 6.5 percent—during the Nixon Program Blasted As 'Economic Injustice'

By Tom Castor

The Nixon Administration's economic stabilization program was termed "a vehicle for economic injustice" in an interim report of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

The majority report of the committee lent support to organized labor's argument that the controls have been inequitable and unfair from their inception. The entire controls program, the report declared, has proved to be a "costly mistake." It concluded that:

- "Inflation is not being effectively controlled.
- "The control program is serving as a vehicle for economic injustice" and "serves to lock in existing economic inequities and, in some cases, to exacerbate them.
- "Excessive secrecy surrounding the operation of the program is not only destroying public confidence in the program itself, but is contributing to a general public attitude of mistrust of government."

The report had particularly harsh

JEWISH DAILY FORWARD, a strong ally of the trade union movement during its 75 years as a Yiddish-language publication, celebrated its anniversary at a gala program in New York's Philharmonic Hall. The newspaper presented a special citation to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for leadership in social justice and human rights.

Daily Forward Marks 75th Year, Salutes Labor with Award to Meany

New York—The Jewish Daily Forward, a unique American institution, celebrated its 75th anniversary with a program at Philharmonic Hall here that reaffirmed its ties with the labor movement.

The Yiddish-language newspaper, a non-profit enterprise founded by trade unionists and Social Democrats early in the wave of Jewish immigration, crusaded for social justice and against every shade of totalitarianism throughout its history.

It championed the cause of New York's needle trades workers during the early strikes and organizing campaigns. And at its diamond jubilee, it saluted the labor movement with an award to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

It was a richly sentimental occasion with a concert featuring Workmen's Circle choruses and talented soloists, interspersed with speeches that recalled shared battles of the past.

Thus, Pres. Louis Stulberg of the Ladies' Garment Workers reminded the gathering that "at every critical turn in the ILGWU's history, the Forward was there aiding in our battles." It was at the Forward building, he said, that striking cloakmakers gathered waiting for the latest bulletins. And when Communists sought to capture the union, "the Forward was our journalistic fortress."

In presenting to Meany a plaque recognizing "his courageous leadership as the spokesman for American labor toward expanding the horizons of social justice, human rights and the cause of freedom for peoples of all races, colors and creeds," Stulberg added:

"In this nation of immigrants, this son of a Jewish immigrant salutes the son of an Irish immigrant."

Meany lauded the Forward—the "Forvertz" to its Yiddish-speaking readers—for its unifying role "in helping the growth of free trade unions" and in bringing to "the impoverished and persecuted who fled to our shores for freedom . . . an opportunity to live and grow as free men and women."

He contrasted this with the "divisive and destructive forces now loose in our land. Those who preach separatism and divisions—white power, black power, pink power or red power—are not helping to remove the inequalities or injustices in American society."

And as for the brand of anti-Semitism peddled by some who call themselves the "new left," Meany declared: "Anti-Semitism is contemptible and reactionary no matter who preaches it. . . . The politics of hate and hypocrisy make the weirdest bedfellows."

It was a gala afternoon at the Philharmonic, despite a hoax bomb scare that delayed the start of the program.

Judge Jacob T. Zukerman, president of the Jewish Labor Committee, chaired the program. Simon Weber, editor of the Forward, spoke and produced for the occasion a 100-page edition in both English and Yiddish that recalled significant events in the newspaper's history.

Other speakers included Harold Ostroff, president of Workmen's Circle, and David Rivlin, Israel's consul general in New York. The plaque to Meany was signed by Weber and Dr. Samuel Silverberg, president of the Forward Association.

Dangers to All Cited In Forced Arbitration

But when voluntary limitations are negotiated in advance by the parties, "operating freely and without coercion," then the answer is "Right. Fine. Let's do it."

The difference between these two concepts is "the difference between freedom and its denial."

Meany again cautioned employers that compulsory arbitration is a two-edged sword.

Under the present administration, the concept might be tempting to an employer who has "good reason to believe that he can propose anything he likes and that his good friend in the White House, or that friend's Secretary of Labor, James Hodgson, will handpick an arbitrator to rubber-stamp it and ram it down the union's throat."

But such an employer, Meany said, should remember that "there have been presidents—and there will be again—who value the friendship of labor" and who would appoint secretaries of labor "who will advance the interests of workers."

Turning to voluntary alternatives to strike action, Meany noted that a "long and honorable" list of unions and companies have provided for continuing a contract in effect after its expiration date, so long as negotiations continue, with full retroactivity after an agreement is reached.

Because of labor's success in raising living standards, "workers have a great deal more to lose" through strikes. Meany observed. He noted that the AFL-CIO is cooperating with the American Arbitration Association in "exploring the possibility of developing effective voluntary alternatives to strikes—alternatives that will strengthen, rather than undermine, the free bargaining process."

But as to any attempt to take away by law labor's "basic economic weapon," the right to strike, "we intend to fight it by every means at our command."

And he urged, "it is the responsibility of those from both sides of the bargaining table, who have developed the collective bargaining process to its present point, to defend it from those who would wreck it."

Perlis Hits Bypass Of Consumer Unit

The AFL-CIO charged that the President's adviser on consumer affairs has ignored her own Advisory Committee on Consumer Interests throughout the eight months of Phase 2.

In a letter to Mrs. Virginia Knauer, AFL-CIO Director of Community Services Leo Perlis urged that the advisory group be called into session.

Perlis questioned if Mrs. Knauer was "afraid to call a meeting of the committee lest it take action to condemn the Administration's two-handed economic stabilization program, a giving hand to big business and the back of the hand to the average consumer."

25,000 Jobs Lost:

Doll, Toy Workers Urge Import Relief

New York—Delegates to the Doll & Toy Workers convention voted strong support for passage of the Burke-Hartke bill to regulate international trade after hearing Pres. Louis Isaacson underscore the need for the measure in his keynote speech.

Although it was the largest convention in the union's history—with 350 delegates representing 35,000 members—Isaacson pointed out that 25,000 jobs that normally would be held by Doll & Toy Workers have been eliminated by imports from low-wage countries in the past 10 years.

And not only jobs, Isaacson said, but also "wages and fringe benefits are being wiped out by selfishness and greed on the part of large doll and toy manufacturers and importers who are producing cheap . . . and selling in our rich market."

"The only answer to this problem is to have our government establish firm, fixed quotas which will prevent any imports coming into this country when the volume reaches the point of destruction—the point we are now reaching in dolls and toys and novelties," Isaacson said.

Isaacson was elected unanimously to a new four-year term. Also, re-elected by acclamation were Executive Vice Pres. Julius Isaacson, Sec.-Treas. Milton Gordon and Vice Presidents Victor Failla, Andrew Arcuri, Lewis Cole and Allan Carton as well as nine executive board members and three trustees.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany drew applause from delegates as he described the "general mess" created by the economic policies of the Nixon Administration.

The "so-called policy of economic stabilization," Meany charged, is "to squeeze workers in the paycheck and gouge consumers at the supermarket" while business and banks "reap a harvest of profits."

Federation Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland charged the Administration with "underwriting in 1972, business profits which would skyrocket above $100 billion."

Kirkland told delegates that a "big business mentality" permeates Washington, D.C., today. He cited as particularly flagrant Nixon's appointments to top Labor Dept. posts as well as to the Supreme Court which he charged the President "is packing with those committed to a right-wing orientation."

Both Meany and Kirkland called upon delegates to make political education and participation in COPE "your top priority in the months ahead and to carry this message from the convention to your members."

The delegates replied not only with a resolution but with voluntary donations which, as Isaacson put it, "will be a springboard for more than meeting our COPE obligations and thus help assure that we do our part in electing to the White House and Congress leaders of vision and dedication who have human instincts, human goals and human progress to meet those goals."

Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller headed a list of New York state officials that addressed the convention. Also speaking were Attorney Gen. Loius J. Lefkowitz, Industrial Commissioner Louis L. Levine, and Vincent McDonnel, chairman of the State Mediation Board.

Congress Votes Funds To Cover Dues to ILO

The United States was assured of maintaining its good-standing participation in the International Labor Organization as Congress gave final approval to a supplemental appropriations bill including nearly $7.7 million in back dues.

If the money hadn't been appropriated, the United States would have been subject to loss of voting rights this year in the tripartite international organization.

An additional $4 million appropriation has been passed by the House as part of the regular State Dept. funding bill, and now awaits action in the Senate.

The two appropriations amount to more than one and one-half years in back assessments to the ILO, but still do not completely make up the gap. The U.S. assessment amounts to 25 percent of the budget of the 120-nation ILO.

The original action of congressional deferment of payments to the ILO was taken in 1970 after widespread criticism from U.S. labor, business and government delegates of increased Communist-bloc influence in the organization and the repeated use of ILO conferences as forums for propaganda attacks on the United States.

At a news conference during the AFL-CIO Executive Council session last February, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany noted that there has been "some improvement" in the situation since the fund cutoff. The AFL-CIO's position has been that the assessments represent a debt that should be paid.

While approving the ILO payment, the House backed up its Appropriations Committee and voted to reduce the United States payment to the United Nations to 25 percent of the UN's regular budget. The United States is currently assessed 31 percent of the budget under a complicated UN formula based on per capita income.

The Administration sought to restore the full amount, urging that a reduction should be negotiated rather than unilaterally decreed. But most House Republicans voted against an amendment to maintain the 31 percent payment, and it was defeated on a 202-156 vote.

Service Employes Win Oakland Vote

Oakland, Calif.—The Service Employes won a representation election among 2,000 Oakland city workers to complete a long organizing struggle by SEIU Local 390.

Three major units of the city work force voted a total of 918 for the SEIU, 606 against. The three groups are made up of craftsmen, field and operations workers, and office and technical employes.

The SEIU had won an earlier election conducted last October, but the results of the balloting were invalidated because of objections over ground rules. Local 390 pressed for a new election rather than appeal, which would have further delayed representation.

At Collective Bargaining Forum:

Unions, Employers Explore Machinery of Negotiations

By David L. Perlman

New York—Negotiators from both sides of the bargaining table explored both the horizons of collective bargaining and the nuts and bolts of making the system work better during a two-day conference here.

They joined with arbitrators, economists and public officials in a lively exchange of views that developed a near-unanimity that good labor-management relations are possible only when conditions of employment are mutually agreed on—and when there are satisfactory procedures to resolve grievances.

The setting was the fourth annual Collective Bargaining Forum sponsored by the Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland is president of the institute; Postmaster Gen. E. T. Klassen is its chairman, and Theodore W. Kheel, the noted arbitrator and mediator, is the administrative director.

Kirkland, in welcoming remarks to the participants, urged them to consider the expansion of collective bargaining as a preferable alternative to curtailment.

Throughout the conference, labor speakers hammered at the theme that compulsory arbitration is a threat to the entire collective bargaining system—to employers as well as unions. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons, Transport Workers Pres. Matthew Guinan, Machinists Sec.-Treas. Eugene Glover and Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Pres. A. F. Grospiron stressed the futility and risk of government-imposed settlements.

Kheel, who has testified against the Nixon Administration's compulsory arbitration bill for transportation industries, warned that "collective bargaining can't exist without the right to strike" and, on the part of management, "the right to take a strike."

Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams, Jr. (D-N.J.) said at a luncheon session that the recurrent problems of collective bargaining in the railroad industry stem from the fact that there is "no real right to strike" in view of the long history of government intervention.

Without that right, he declared, the necessary "pressure to reach agreement is lost."

Williams has sponsored a counter bill that would clearly permit "selective strikes" in the railroad industry—insuring the movement of essential goods without taking away the rights of workers.

Meany, in his address to the conference, strongly endorsed this concept, declaring: "That would remove the emergency element from the strike, which is the sole alleged justification for government intervention."

Participants from both labor and management agreed that festering grievances are more often the cause of long, bitter strikes than disagreement over a few cents an hour in wage increases.

A paper submitted by Assistant Sec. of Labor W. J. Usery, Jr., reported that a study of more than 700 arbitration cases from the records of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service during the 1971 fiscal year revealed:

- An average of 251 days elapsed from the time an initial grievance was filed until an arbitration award was rendered.
- This represented an average of 83 days from the time a grievance was filed until a request for an arbitration panel was received by the FMCS—and an average of 168 days between the request and the arbitration award.

Usery, who was unable to be present because of illness in his family, cited as an encouraging development the "instant arbitration" procedure initiated as an experiment by the Steelworkers and the basic steel industry. It stresses informality, speedy processing, and a decision within 48 hours of an arbitration hearing

There was widespread interest at the conference in the report by Sam Kagel, prominent West Coast arbitrator, who is the permanent umpire for the North American Rockwell Corp. and the Auto Workers.

A new system instituted there has dramatically reduced the number of grievances coming to arbitration as well as the time lag in settlement, Kagel reported.

Before he is called into a case, he said, labor and management representatives are required to stipulate the facts on the grievance in a document signed by both parties. If they are not able to agree on some of the facts, each party must spell out its position.

Under this procedure, he said, most cases are settled before reaching the arbitrator. And of those that do go to arbitration, the time for hearings and decision is markedly shorter than in the past.

Sparks flew at the opening session of the forum—not between union and management negotiators but between two prominent economists.

Pierre Rinfret, a tough-talking conservative in a "devil's advocate" role at the forum, said the collective bargaining system doesn't work because of "greed, arrogance, avarice and selfishness" by both labor and management. Predicting that wage-price controls "ain't coming off" for the next five to 10 years, Rinfret said a "bigger and bigger government role" is inevitable because "the economic system has broken down."

Stanley H. Ruttenberg, who heads a firm of economic consultants and previously served as Assistant Secretary of Labor, U.S. Manpower Administrator and research director for the AFL-CIO, ripped into Rinfret's presentation as well as into the Nixon Administration's policies during his turn at the podium.

It was the price escalation that pushed up wage demands, Ruttenber said, and both have been aggravated by the "stagnant economic policy" adopted by the Nixon Administration.

Full employment—the policy rejected by the Administration—would hold down prices by utilizing the full capacity of industry, he suggested. And it would set the stage for "self-restraint" at the bargaining table by both labor and management with the possibility of agreement on national voluntary goals for economic expansion.

There was one evening during the conference when Automation House, the headquarters of the institute, was turned into an art gallery and management executives such as General Electric's Virgil Day joined with union officials in a salute to a talented amateur artist.

It was the first public display of paintings by George Meany—a selection of oils spanning a 14-year period, done for grandchildren and friends, pastoral and city scenes, still life, portraits and abstracts.

"Mr. Meany paints for relaxation and because he enjoys it," read the catalogue.

And when the last guest had left, Barbara Gray, the secretary-treasurer of the institute, proclaimed it the most enjoyable party ever held in Automation House.

There were other events in which union and management participants joined in applause.

Klassen, who played a key role in launching a new era of collective bargaining in the postal service, was this year's winner of the Collective Bargaining Forum Award. And the labor reporter of the Detroit Free Press, Ralph Orr, was presented with the Louis Stark Memorial Award, named for the late labor reporter of the New York Times. It included a check for $1,000 to Orr and a plaque for the newspaper.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING FORUM in New York opens with a welcome from AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland, who is president of the sponsoring Institute of Collective Bargaining & Group Relations. Stated at the table are Postmaster Gen. E. T. Klassen, left, chairman of the institute's board, and Iron Workers Pres. John H. Lyons, who presided at a panel discussion.

Shortchanged

Court Limits Liability Of Successor Firms

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled that when an employer takes over a business he is bound to recognize and bargain with an existing union but is not bound by a previously negotiated collective bargaining agreement.

The 5-4 decision overturns a landmark ruling of the National Labor Relations Board which in 1970 ordered the William J. Burns, International Detective Agency to abide by the contract of a local of plant guards which the Burns agency had "inherited" from another firm.

The court upheld a decision of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals which said the NLRB had exceeded its powers when it ordered the agency to honor the pact.

When the NLRB ruled in 1970, it based its decision on a separate Supreme Court case and held that "in the normal case, we perceive no real inequity in requiring a successor employer to take over his predecessor's collective bargaining agreement, for he stands in the shoes of his predecessor."

The AFL-CIO had filed a brief with the high court supporting that argument.

The four dissenting justices would have reversed the NLRB on all counts, arguing that successorship should be limited to cases in which the new employer purchases a part or all of the assets of a predecessor or where the entire business is purchased by the new employer.

It should not extend to cases such as Burns, they said, where there have been no contractual dealings between the two employers and all that has taken place is a shift of employes.

Burns had succeeded the Wackenhut security agency in 1967 as the subcontractor providing plant protection for Lockheed Aircraft Service Co., at Ontario, Calif.

Burns hired 27 guards who had worked for the other agency but refused to recognize their union, the unaffiliated United Plant Guards Local 162.

In other action, the Supreme Court upheld a lower court ruling that a railroad worker who sued the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. for "wrongful discharge" would have to take his case to the Board of Adjustment under the Railway Labor Act.

Two lower courts had dismissed the complaint on the grounds that the worker, Thomas L. Andrews, had not exhausted other remedies.

The high court also agreed to review a case posing the question of whether the Hobbs anti-racketeering act, which makes extortion of employers a federal crime, can be invoked against union members who damage property during an otherwise lawful strike.

A U.S. District Court had dismissed indictments sought by the Justice Dept. against four union members under the Hobbs Act because they allegedly committed property damage during a strike in Louisiana.

The Justice Dept. asked the Supreme Court to review the case after the lower court ruled that while any such acts would be punishable under state laws, that is not the purpose of the Hobbs Act.

The Hobbs Act is aimed at outlawing extortion of property from an employer "by the use of actual or threatened force of violence," the district court held.

AAA Elects Coulson As New President

New York—Robert Coulson, executive vice president of the American Arbitration Association since 1963, was elected president of the association at its annual meeting here. He succeeds Donald B. Straus.

Pres. Harold T. Rigley of the Utility Workers was elected one of 21 new directors of the association.

The Urban Crisis–1972

THE ROT OF AMERICA'S great metropolitan areas continues. More than 70 percent of the population lives and works in these urban centers and daily faces the problems of pollution, bad housing, inadequate education, traffic congestion, crime and a declining tax base.

These problems are the legacy of a social system, particularly in the South, fraught with cruelty and injustice; a depression during which America had no money to meet the task that needed to be met; a world war which channeled all available manpower into war production; the complacent do-nothingism of most of the 1950s, and the failure of this Administration to carry forward the progress begun in the mid-1960s.

The consequences are today's ghettos. And the need is for far-reaching programs to prevent the collapse of the nation's cities.

Housing opportunities for low- and middle-income families must be greatly increased. Supplying the shelter needs of the people must be freed from the control of the monied interests.

America's major education problem is not busing. It is inadequate schools, limited educational opportunities and reliance on a system of taxation that restricts progress. The federal commitment to education is one of words backed with too few dollars. Federal education programs do not receive the full appropriation of the authorized spending levels, leaving a disheartening gap between promise and performance.

At the heart of the problem is the reliance by school districts on the property tax that places a burden on the small homeowner while wealthy landlords, speculators and industry have special tax breaks.

Anything less than a full commitment to quality educational opportunity for all children—regardless of their race or family income or the neighborhood in which they live—will encourage the demagogues to inflame racial passions out of America's need for quality, integrated education.

We repeat that the AFL-CIO wholeheartedly supports the busing of children when it will improve the educational opportunities of the children. We deplore the actions of individuals or groups who are creating a divisive political issue out of America's vital need for quality, integrated education.

PARTICULARLY DAMAGING to the cities is the flight of its industrial and middle-income tax base to the suburbs. In addition to the fiscal problems created, a double-edged crisis is developing. Inner-city residents trying to follow their jobs to the suburbs cannot find adequate housing either because of cost or color bars and the mass transit needed to get to their jobs, is not available. New suburban residents clog city streets and parking lots with automobiles because mass rapid transit is inadequate.

Thus, the cities need help to solve their problems, including assistance in providing basic public services. A massive federal program of public investment—schools, libraries, mass transit, sewage treatment facilities, hospitals—coupled with expanded public service employment programs will benefit the economy through increased jobs while, at the same time, solving some of America's urban problems.

Recapturing the streets of the cities from the criminals requires a broader effort than tough-sounding talk. It requires more policemen, more judges, quicker trials, better prisons, better education, better employment opportunities, better housing, better health care.

Amish School Decision Raises Tricky Constitutional Questions

By John P. Roche

THE SUPREME COURT'S DECISION that the state of Wisconsin cannot require children of the Amish religious faith to attend school beyond the eighth grade opens up some remarkably tricky questions about the meaning of freedom of religion under the First Amendment.

Put briefly, the facts are that the Amish—gentle folk who do not hold with our worldly ways—see high school education as a source of corruption. They claim that mandatory state education requirements impose an unconstitutional burden on their religious freedom.

A unanimous Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Warren Burger, sustained their claim—and in so doing took American constitutional law into very treacherous waters. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes was fond of saying that "hard cases make bad law," and one suspects that this is a good instance of what he had in mind.

The Amish are a quiet group who want nothing more than to be left alone. Decent-minded people certainly don't want to see them jailed or fined for following their consciences. But the problem is that this court decision is, as the lawyers put it, fungible—that is, it is applicable to a whole category of church-state conflicts.

To take an obvious parallel, what about the handful of fundamentalist Mormons who still believe in plural marriage? Under the laws of the states this is a crime known as bigamy. Chief Justice Burger observed with regard to the Amish that "a way of life that is odd or even erratic but interferes with no rights or interests of others is not to be condemned because it is different."

In my judgment, plural marriage would clearly fall into this category. A more extreme case involves those who on religious grounds reject medical care, i.e., under some circumstances commit suicide (and the subsidiary question of whether they have the right to deny medical care to their children).

Switching areas, it might be noted that the Amish also oppose, on grounds of conscience, participation in social security. Should they be exempted from the tax laws of the nation? Should Christian Scientists be forced to pay taxes to support Medicare? Or Quakers for the support of the Dept. of Defense?

This list could continue at some length—and I have omitted such extreme situations as snake-worshippers—but the key problem is this: Does the First Amendment authorize people getting a constitutional bonus for their religious convictions? Historically speaking, the courts have denied this contention, though the precedents on conscientious objection to the draft are a bit murky.

SELECTIVE SERVICE statutes have uniformly required that conscientious objectors have a religious basis for their position, but the Supreme Court has broadened the meaning of religious to include non-theological convictions. (This was managed by suggesting that this must have been what Congress had in mind; otherwise it would have created serious problems of separation of church and state. In fact, it was not at all what Congress had in mind.)

What the court has done in the Amish case is, by supporting freedom of conscience, blast an enormous hole in the "wall of separation" between church and state.

In effect it has given special status to religious convictions: the non-Amish Wisconsin parent who simply wants to put his kid to work on the farm will continue to face the penalties of the law. One can only imagine the lawsuits that will now flood the courts as every eccentric sect goes forth to assert its supremacy over the police power of the state.

For Labor and Management:

Collective Bargaining System Prevails as Basic Freedom

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the Fourth Annual Collective Bargaining Forum of the Institute of Collective Bargaining in New York City, May 19, 1972.

THE VERY SUCCESSES of the collective bargaining system achieved to date have brought American labor and industry to the point where we jointly dare to seek new developments, new ground rules. But those rules must emerge out of the collective bargaining process itself, not be imposed upon it. Imposition, I am convinced, would insure that the whole enterprise would end in disaster. The freedom of labor, the freedom of management and the freedom of the American people would ultimately be submerged in tyranny.

Of course the collective bargaining system developed over the years is not perfect. No human instrument is; none can be. Every single human institution can stand a lot of improvement, and it is the business of human beings to improve them to the best of their ability. And that is why this institute came into being and why we are here; to see what we can do to improve collective bargaining, not to devise or endorse schemes to destroy it.

Plenty of people are doing that. Congress has before it bills that would do precisely that, none of them authored by a friend of collective bargaining. Congress is being asked to decide whether or not, in some cases or in all cases, the federal government should fix wages, hours and working conditions for workers in private industry through some form of compulsory arbitration.

Some contend the existence of strikes is intolerable in this complex society and that compulsory arbitration in its various disguises—"final-offer selection," "mediation to finality," or what have you—would solve the problems that the parties have failed to solve for themselves without disruption.

Free men do naturally resist any solution handed down from on high, as opposed to a solution in which those involved take an active role.

Those who seek compulsory legislation contend they are operating in the interests of a third party—the public. The public interest they say, is overriding and the public's right to enjoy an uninterrupted flow of goods and services justifies the abrogation of the constitutional and common-law rights of some of their fellow citizens. They say that the public interest somehow demands that some men should be required to work for the private profit of other men under terms and conditions they resent and are powerless to improve.

We in the labor movement are absolutely opposed to that idea, and we intend to fight it by every means at our command.

If we were to do less, we would abrogate our conviction that the right of men and women, working collectively through their unions to determine their own economic destiny, is a cornerstone of a free society.

Of course the right of labor to negotiate with management is an empty promise if it does not include the right to strike. That is the basic economic weapon—ultimately the only weapon—workers have to insure their employers come to the bargaining table to negotiate in good faith.

The public interest in the preservation of basic freedoms far outweighs the public's right not to be inconvenienced. Inconvenience—even major inconveniences—is a small price to pay for freedom.

And those who claim to put public convenience ahead of universal freedom, those who use public convenience as an excuse for compulsory arbitration have as their hidden, but very real, goal the abolition of strikes—strikes that are effective.

In the American free enterprise system, workers are employed to produce goods and services that employers sell to the public. By definition, a successful strike is one that makes those goods and services unavailable. The pressure that leads employers to compromise is lost sales. And every lost sale means that somebody's interests have been damaged because he was unable to buy something he wanted at the moment he wanted it.

THE ONLY KIND of strike that doesn't damage outsiders—members of the public—is a strike that doesn't cut off the employer's production. And that, by definition, is a losing strike.

There is a public interest that must be provided for in some situations. Some goods and some services—police protection, for example—are vital. The labor movement is fully supporting legislation to see that essential goods and services are delivered during a strike.

The proponents of compulsory arbitration are solely interested in easing the path of employers who face strong unions. None ever propose help for workers, who are deprived of meaningful economic power by a law that is supposed to protect them, but completely fails to do so.

The National Labor Relations Act, which was supposed to balance the power of labor and management at the bargaining table, has been revised twice, both times in order to strengthen management's hand. There has been no strengthening of the power of underpaid workers, despite clear, painful, daily evidence that the law is no deterrent at all to grossly unfair labor practice by certain powerful employers. The J. P. Stevens textile firm is one example.

But in these cases, since it is workers who suffer and not employers, the Administration and the advocates of compulsory arbitration see no need for change. Their interest lies exclusively in arming employers and disarming unions. In the long run, these tactics only undermine democracy itself.

Priorities Slanted:

Administration's Policy Muddle Slows Job Safety Protections

POLICY DISTORTIONS by Nixon Administration officials responsible for the new federal job safety and health law have slowed achievement of on-the-job protections long needed and expected by workers, AFL-CIO safety specialist George H.R. Taylor charged.

Some gains have been made in "certain areas of enforcement" of the Occupational Health & Safety Act, but the first-year record of the new law is far short of what "it would have been if there had been a committed Administration that really wanted to make the law work," declared Taylor, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, on Labor News Conference.

Taylor stressed that the "failure of policy" centers mainly on the priorities set by the Administration to implement the new law. He said the Administration failed to press for adequate funding, asking for only "the least amount of money that they can possibly get by with, in order to put on the appearance of carrying out the federal role."

He said the Administration has also been trying "to unload this program onto the states—put it back where it started," despite the fact that "the main reason this became a federal law was the failure of states to do the job" when they had the full responsibility.

Holding the new federal job health and safety law to "a starvation budget," Taylor declared, means that only a fraction of the enforcement and compliance force needed for the more than 4 million covered workplaces will be in the field during the next fiscal year. He said that some 2,500 inspectors and 150 industrial hygienists are needed now, but the Administration budget requests allow for a total force of only about 500.

Serious lags are also hampering development of standards and criteria for "some 10,000 hazardous materials . . . that can injure or kill a worker," and the adjudication of cases involving alleged violations of the law, he said.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

A LONG TIME AGO a cynical politician said that "platforms are made to run on, not stand on."

Organized labor is convinced that the American people deserve better than that.

To show its own deep concern that party platforms are more than Madison Avenue showcases designed to beguile voters with glib promises, the AFL-CIO has just presented a 35,000-word platform proposal to the Democratic Party. The same document will be presented to the Republican Party, in the firm conviction that what is good for the American people is not a partisan matter.

The labor proposals deal with matters of vital concern to all Americans, not only union members, and it belies the cynical view that platforms are necessarily documents that can be lightly ignored. Historically, there have been debates on party platforms that stand out in American life, even though some writers have contended that party platforms "usually bear the marks of artifice, ambiguity and dexterous evasion."

Party platforms can be of tremendous importance if voters give them the careful scrutiny that they call for. In 1968, for example, the AFL-CIO went to great trouble to compare the Republican and Democratic platforms to note where they agreed and where they differed. It was a service of inestimable value to American voters.

There were more than superficial differences, the AFL-CIO found on key issues:

Unemployment—"The answer to rising prices will never be sought in unemployment and idle plant facilities," said the Democrats, while the Republicans talked of "free enterprise" and "tax credits to employers." The government must be the employer of last resort, said the Democrats, while the Republicans took no position.

Tax Reform—The Democrats called for revamping of the tax system to make it "more equitable as between rich and poor." The Republicans spoke of "tax write-offs" and "economic incentives" and "depletion allowances," and they weren't kidding.

Consumer Protection—The Democrats took positions on a number of specific reforms to bring about fairness to consumers; the Republicans took no position on many of these.

Labor-Management Relations—The Democrats called for strengthening collective bargaining and for repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14b which makes "right-to-work" laws possible. The Republicans called for strict enforcement of legislation that permits such laws and laid their stress on protecting the rights of workers against union "abuses."

All in all, there were differences between the two platforms which made it possible for the intelligent voter to decide which side he was on.

It is not too much to say that anyone who read the Republican platform of 1968 with discernment could clearly see the course that the Nixon Administration has since pursued:

Misplaced dependence on private enterprise to create a growing economy that would prevent unemployment; tax advantages to promote the "trickle-down" economic theory; a tough stance toward labor; a lack of willingness to fund social programs as they should be funded; a health program that would result in subsidies for business and insurance companies; weak enforcement of occupational safety and health legislation; vetoes or watering down of job programs.

Already the nation, with the impulsion of wide newspaper, TV and radio coverage of the activities of the candidates, is centering its attention on the presidential "sweepstakes." Of equal, if not greater, importance is what will go into the platforms of the two parties. Labor has laid down its program. That program should become the focus of attention by the American media and the people that they serve instead of being virtually ignored.

FULL POTENTIAL of worker protection under the federal job health and safety law has been blocked by policy distortions of Nixon Administration officials, AFL-CIO safety expert George H. R. Taylor, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were James F. Welsh, left, of the Washington Evening Star and Donald Barnes of Air & Water Newsletter. The interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

AIFLD 10TH ANNIVERSARY dinner speakers included Winslow G. Carrington, right, a graduate of the AIFLD's first Washington course a decade ago and now Guyana's Minister of Labor. At left is Dr. John A. Hannah, administrator of the Agency for International Development, and Communications Workers Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, secretary-treasurer of the AIFLD.

AIFLD Draws Praise At Anniversary Dinner

The education and social projects of the American Institute for Free Labor Development drew the praise of labor, management and government officials as the institute observed its 10th anniversary.

Major speakers at a reception and dinner marking the anniversary were AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Dr. John A. Hannah, administrator of the Agency for International Development; Winslow G. Carrington, Guyana's Minister of Labor, and J. Peter Grace, chairman and executive officer of W. R. Grace & Co.

Meany is president of the AIFLD and Grace is chairman of the Board. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, secretary-treasurer of the institute, presided at the ceremonies.

Among the AIFLD's accomplishments over the past ten years cited by the speakers were:

- Training and education courses for more than 190,000 workers, union officers and labor economists from throughout the hemisphere.
- Construction of nearly 19,000 housing units for workers throughout Latin America with the AIFLD's assistance.
- The institute's Savings & Loan Cooperative Program, which has made low-interest loans available to thousands of workers.
- The Regional Revolving Loan Fund, which has financed community centers, schools and recreation facilities in a number of countries.

Meany, recalling the early days of AIFLD, said that one of the most significant factors contributing to its success was the inclusion of members of the business community in its board of trustees.

"All of us realize," he said, "whether we come from the ranks of labor or management, that building strong democratic unions in Latin America and the Caribbean is one of the surest means of preserving our freedom."

Grace termed the AIFLD's help to the democratic union movement "the crucial and significant factor in the steady deterioration of Castro-Communism in Latin America."

And its sponsorship of social action, education and housing projects, he said, marks it as "the single most successful organization initiated under the Alliance for Progress."

Hannah pointed out that among the most urgent needs of the developing nations during the next decade will be "jobs at productive labor paying wages sufficient to maintain a decent standard of living." He said AID is "giving increasing attention to this problem" and pledged "continuing collaboration" with the AIFLD.

Carrington, a graduate of AIFLD's first Washington course, paid tribute to the institute for its help in strengthening the trade union movement of Guyana over the past ten years.

On behalf of the trade unionists in his country, he presented Meany with a lamp and ash tray made by students at the Guyana Industrial Training Center, which was originally sponsored by the AIFLD and now is operated by the Guyana labor movement.

UTU Accepts Penn Central Board Report

Cleveland—Pres. Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union told Pres. Nixon in a telegram that the UTU general chairmen in the Penn Central system have agreed to accept a presidential emergency board's recommendations for "a settlement of issues in dispute and urged Penn Central to do the same."

The emergency board recommended that Penn Central delay any cuts in crew sizes and proposed that the bankrupt carrier and the union continue bargaining at the local level on crew sizes until next January.

General chairmen of the UTU met in Philadelphia to consider the board's recommendations.

The carrier had suggested to the emergency board that the dispute be settled through compulsory arbitration, but the board did not act on that recommendation.

A spokesman for trustees of the Penn Central said they were "concerned" that the emergency board did not make more specific recommendations for settlement.

Bows to Employer Lobby:

Arizona Erects Roadblocks To Farm Union Organizing

By Gervase N. Love

Phoenix, Ariz.—The Arizona legislature has ena cted, and Republican Gov. Jack Williams has signed with what has been called "indecent" haste, a law e recting a series of roadblocks to the United Farm Workers' efforts to make the American dream a rea lity for the migrants who plant, tend or harvest the state's lush farm crops.

The UFW promptly accepted the challenge, with broad support from the Arizona labor movement. It threw every available resource into a stepped-up drive for members and a companion effort to register every eligible voter and persuade him to cast a ballot in November.

UFW Pres. Cesar Chavez came here from his California headquarters to head the membership drive and told a rally on the Capitol steps that the law "is not going to stop this union."

Chavez reminded participants in the peaceful, two-hour protest that House Majority Whip Stan Akers (R-Phoenix) is vice president of the F. H Hogue Produce Co. of Phoenix.

"We struck that company last year," he added. "What a coincidence!"

Chavez began a fast the day the bill was signed which he said will continue "until Arizona loses its fear" of the UFW.

The bill in its original form was too harsh for many members of the legislature. It originated in the House, which eventually accepted Senate amendments that made it look better, but no easier to live with. Strong support came from Farm Bureau members in both branches, and Farm Bureau lobbyists pushed it ruthlessly at every stage.

The day after enactment, the measure went to Williams. At the same time, House leaders asked him to delay signing it until after a protest demonstration the UFW had scheduled for that day.

Williams ignored the usually granted request for the courtesy, signed the bill two hours after receiving it, and took off for Tucson to address the National Association of Broadcasters. Pickets were waiting for him at the meeting hall, so he slipped in the back door.

The governor didn't even wait for an opinion by Attorney Gen. Gary Nelson, who earlier had questioned the constitutionality of some sections.

The law:

- Places multiple curbs on standard union organizing techniques that enables an employer to stall off recognition of an election until his need for migrant farm labor has passed. When an election is scheduled, the union has no right of access to the workers, and the employer draws up the list of eligibles. By the time the union could make an effective protest, the workers ordinarily would have moved on to another employer's fields.
- Authorizes the governor to name a Farm Labor Relations Board of two union and two employer members and three public members, with power to intervene in a farm labor dispute at the request of either party. The board is authorized to hold bargaining elections even to supervise election of officers among new bargaining groups.
- Enables an employer who thinks his workers may strike or organize a boycott to obtain a restraining order from superior (county) court on the mere allegation that "substantial and irreparable" harm will result. The union need not be notified; the curb holds for 10 days, long enough to harvest most crops.
- Makes a secondary boycott an unfair labor practice and bans efforts to "induce" agricultural employers and their agents "to make a decision not to handle, transport, process, pack, sell or distribute any agricultural commodity of an agricultural employer with whom a labor dispute exists."

It also bars attempts "to induce or encourage" the ultimate consumer to refuse to buy the product, and also makes it an unfair labor practice "to picket or cause to be boycotted, or threaten to boycott or picket, or cause to be picketed or boycotted any agricultural employer when the objective is to induce, encourage, force or require" him to recognize a union or to bargain.

In testimony prior to passage, State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Parwin Aycock assured the Senate Agriculture Committee that the law's constitutionality will be tested in the courts.

Union spokesmen said the Farm Bureau is trying to have similar bills passed in every state where it has membership. UFW members and supporters plan to picket offices of the employer organization throughout the country.

House-Senate Panel Hits 'Injustice' Of Nixon's Stabilization Program

criticism of the Price Commission, accusing that panel of showing "contempt for the consumer" while catering to business executives.

The rent control system should "either be abolished or revised," said the report of the committee's Democratic majority. It added that rent regulations, as they now stand, encourage the same pattern of rent increases that existed before controls were imposed on the economy.

The report issued a number of recommendations to make controls effective and equitable and to bolster public confidence.

The committee's chairman, Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.), went even further, emphasizing on the Senate floor that the nation should reject the notion that it must choose between inflation or a high rate of joblessness and devise policies that will create full employment with relative stability in prices.

He pointed to the years 1961-65 as a period during which this was actually achieved.

Republican members of the committee dissented in a minority report declaring that since the President acted in August, the annual rate of inflation had been cut by one-third. Simultaneously, they said, average wages have increased "at a substantially higher rate" than during the six months prior to Aug. 15 when the wage-price-rent freeze was implemented.

The majority report repeated the committee's earlier recommendation that the wage-price program drop controls on most of the economy and focus attention on big business and larger unions.

It labeled as "specious and irrelevant" the Administration argument that current controls represent a "program to control inflation, not to correct inequity."

The definition of poverty level wages at $1.90 an hour or less, "does not meet the intent of the Congress that those in poverty should be excluded from wage control," the report declared.

"Many of the working poor remain subject to wage control. They should be exempted. If necessary, Congress should mandate this through additional, more specific legislation."

To be equitable, the report stressed, controls should be brought to bear in a stricter fashion.

"No executive who earned $200,000 or more in 1971 (including the value of bonuses, stock options and other such incentive compensation) should receive further increases in compensation of any sort for the duration of the program."

The report said, too, that every effort must be made to see that the consumer, smaller employers and nonunion workers have full access to the Pay Board and the Price Commission.

The committee called for more effective enforcement of profit margin regulations including an adequate staff and funds to police the 3,000 corporations required to make quarterly reports.

There should be no addition to the profit margin when costs increase, the report stated, urging that present Price Commission regulations which allow such additions be changed.

Refunds to consumers should be made to compensate for any overcharge resulting from Price Commission acceptance of individual firms' estimates of their own productivity up until the end of April the committee said.

"Where refunds are not feasible, equivalent payment should be made to the Treasury."

To bolster public confidence, the report recommended the following steps:

- Both the Price Commission and the Pay Board should hold more public hearings. (It noted that the Price Commission had violated the Economic Stabilization Act Amendments by refusing to hold hearings on a single, specific price increase.)
- The Price Commission should make publicly available all data submitted to it except that which legitimately can be classified as a trade secret.
- Consumers must be given meaningful direct access to the Price Commission.

"The procedure for filing all consumer complaints with local Internal Revenue Service officers, which are not prepared to handle this specialized work and which are fully occupied with other duities, is not proving satisfactory," the report declared.

Unions Encourage Clubs:

Retirees Emerging As Potent Force

Organizations of retired workers are springing up around the country with the object of making life a little more pleasant for their members while bringing an added service to their communities.

The origin of the groups goes back a number of years, but their continuing expansion stems largely from the efforts of unions encouraging retired members' clubs, an article in the Federationist reports.

"For many Americans," the May issue of the AFL-CIO magazine says, "the dream of enjoying the golden years of retirement is tarnished by the threat of poverty" as pension checks and soccial security benefits won't stretch beyond basic living costs.

The social and economic plight of the elderly has prompted many unions to extend assistance through the clubs to their retired members —many of whom helped build the unions.

"These clubs provide a wide range of services to their members, but also enable the members to serve their communities through volunteer programs," the article notes.

"Many clubs have developed into solid voting blocs to effectively lobby in local and state governments to improve conditions for the elderly," the magazine points out.

In numbers of cities, these organizations have brought about cut-rate vacation trips, reduced prices on medicines and other benefits for their members.

On the national level, the clubs are allied with the National Council of Senior Citizens. The 3-million-member NCSC works closely with organized labor and other liberal groups on national legislation to benefit older Americans.

A growing number of unions are stressing the organization of retired members' clubs to complement retirement programs, the article notes. The list includes the Machinists, Steelworkers, Ladies' Garment Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Painters, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Communications Workers and others.

"Retired members clubs began to multiply in the late 1960s," the Federationist says. It notes that the Machinists currently have more than 100 active organizations, and the IUE at the close of 1971 had doubled the number of such clubs to 85 in an 18-month period.

Additional encouragement for the development of the clubs came at the 1969 AFL-CIO convention, which called on affiliated organizations to activate and expand programs for older and retired members.

It has long been evident, the article notes, that retirement income is the prime problem of the elderly.

The average monthly social security payment for a single retired worker is currently $128, for a total annual income of $1,536. A retired couple receives $221, or $2,652 a year. But for the 2.5 million widows, the average payment is only $114 a month.

Pointing to the grim fact that more than one-quarter of the nation's social security beneficiaries are below the poverty line, the magazine cites the efforts of the AFL-CIO and the NCSC to push through Congress a two-step 25-percent increase in benefits.

"The political power of the elderly was demonstrated during the early 1960s in the struggle for Medicare," the article observes. It was the fight for Medicare that created the NCSC.

The magazine reports that a new political action organization of retired workers emerged in 1970. Called the Concerned Citizens for Better Government, the group is gearing up for the '72 elections by expanding registration and get-out-the-vote drives among union retirees in 40 states.

Record Profits Confirmed by Government first quarter to a seasonally adjusted rate of $91.6 billion, the Commerce Dept. said.

The increase from the fourth quarter of last year to the first three months of 1972 was the largest since the opening quarter of 1971 when a gain of about $11.4 billion —or 16 percent—boosted pre-tax profits to $83.0 billion.

The Commerce Dept. said that the Gross National Product rose $30.7 billion—or 12 percent—in the first quarter for an annual rate of $1,103.6 billion.

But part of this increase was due to inflation as the GNP price index climbed by 6 percent.

UNION MEMBERS confer with Pres. Henry L. Likes, center, of the Oklahoma AFL-CIO during the week-long Southwestern Institute for Young Trade Unionists in Little Rock, Ark. Several sessions were conducted by Pres. J. Bill Becker of the Arkansas AFL-CIO, who also is secretary-treasurer of the Southern Labor School. The school's program is coordinated by George T. Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Campus Labor Institutes Await 12,000 Unionists

College campuses are preparing for another flood of special summer students in the coming months as an expected 12,000 union members will be attending labor institutes.

More than 75 one-week sessions are scheduled by the AFL-CIO, its affiliates, and state and regional bodies for the 1972 summer school program. Most will be conducted on campuses with the cooperation of nearly 25 colleges and universities.

The curricula of the summer programs vary according to the objectives of the sponsoring national and international unions. But besides such core subjects as bargaining, organizing and leadership training, the focus will be on current issues and problems facing the labor movement.

Added weight in this presidential year will be put on political action, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education points out. And much of this will center on the Nixon Administration's economic policies as they affect workers and the unemployed.

Other bread-and-butter issues vital to workers will include the problems caused by foreign imports and multinational corporations, federal and state legislation and the lax enforcement of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Labor education in the United States traces its history back to the formative years of the trade union movement. But the wide-ranging programs that exist today were developed over the past 25 years through the efforts of international unions, colleges and universities and the AFL-CIO.

Among the more recent developments are the young workers' schools, which began four years ago as an experimental program of the federation's Dept. of Education.

The Southwestern Institute for Young Trade Unionists got a jump on the 1972 summer school season with a week-long session in Little Rock, Ark., Apr. 30-May 5. Another institute for young union members will be held in Columbia, S.C., June 11-16.

Other institutes have already been conducted this year by the Government Employes, Machinists, Boot & Shoe Workers and the Rocky Mountain Labor School.

AFL-CIO Education Director Walter G. Davis reported that preliminary plans are under way for an in-depth study of labor education programs in an effort to eliminate fragmentation and overlapping curricula that have emerged over the years.

The study will be turned over to a blue-ribbon task force composed of leading labor educators from unions and universities and specialists in adult education.

The study is expected to begin early next year and take about two years to complete, Davis said.

1 Million Jobs Seen Result Of Works Bill

A proposal to provide $5 billion in federal grants for construction of community water and sewer facilities was warmly endorsed by the AFL-CIO in a statement to the House Banking Committee.

The legislation, sponsored by Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.), would enable local and state governments to move ahead with projects that are already blueprinted but have been shelved for lack of funds.

"By one dramatic action," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller said, the legislation "could create at least one million new jobs in the United States and bring about a reduction of at least 20 percent among the five million Americans now without jobs."

He noted also that in many areas home building construction has been virtually halted because of inadequate sewage control facilities and the consequent pollution risk.

And a cutback in home construction, Biemiller told the committee, would also spread unemployment in related industries.

Furthermore, the AFL-CIO testified, the jobs created by the proposed legislation "would not be a boondoggle. Every project helped by this program would add to the nation's wealth and provide the trigger to far greater economic activity in the private and public sector."

Labor Backs New Services For Elderly

The AFL-CIO endorsed a series of bills designed to improve government services for the elderly, but stressed that "the priority need of our elderly population is increased income."

A statement submitted by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Andrew J. Biemiller to the Senate Labor Subcommittee on Aging urged that comprehensive legislation be drafted that would include provisions of three bills under consideration.

The proposed package would include establishment of an independent Office of Aging at the White House level and create an Assistant Secretary for Aging in the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

It would substantially increase federal grants under the Older Americans Act to fund such programs as homemaker services, home-delivered meals, and training for persons working in programs serving the elderly.

Other features would include a Gerontological Research Center, a national information and resource center, pre-retirement planning services, transportation services, multi-purpose senior centers and continuing education for older people.

Although social security legislation does not fall in the committee's jurisdiction, the AFL-CIO stressed the urgent need for passage of the 20 percent increase in social security benefits proposed by Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) and introduced in the Senate by Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) and 50 cosponsors.

CLC Votes White-Collar Organizing Fund

Ottawa — The Candian Labor Congress biennial convention approved a two-cent increase in per capita payments to provide a five-year fund of $1.5 million to promote white-collar organizing. The monthly per capita now goes from 13 cents to 15 cents.

As the convention wound up its five days of sessions, CLC Pres. Donald MacDonald said the fund was the most important decision taken by the 1,700 delegates. He said the CLC will hire staff for the drive starting this summer.

The convention adopted policy statements roundly criticizing the government of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau for mishandling the economy, charging that it had callously and deliberately created unemployment.

The statement also reiterated the CLC's stand that wage controls are inequitable and unjust.

One surprise was the first challenge of a CLC president since 1962. MacDonald defeated his challenger, James Bell, secretary-treasurer of the Nova Scotia Federation of Labor, by 549 votes to 380.

Two recurring themes ran through the convention deliberations: the threat of multinational corporations and the danger of restrictive legislation, including compulsory arbitration.

MacDonald discussed the problems posed by multinational corporations in his presidential address. So did Otto Kersten, secretary-general of the Internationl Confederation of Free Trade unions; Federal Leader David Lewis of the labor-backed New Democratic Party, and the AFL-CIO fraternal delegate, Peter Bommarito, president of the Rubber Workers.

All four stressed that the multinationals don't respect national boundaries, that their power is growing daily and that they present strong challenges to the labor movements of the United States, Canada and several other countries.

The convention adopted a resolution urging the executive council to promote the admission of unions now outside the CLC that are willing to abide by the constitution.

A policy statement on foreign ownership called for a strong federal agency that would screen all new direct investment as well as foreign takeovers of existing companies in Canada. It would have authority "to regulate the behavior of foreign-controlled enterprises, as well as the behavior of Canadian multinational corporations conducting business abroad."

A statement on energy said Canada needs "a national energy policy governing the exploitation, distribution and use of our energy resources," which it said should be brought increasingly under public ownership.

A resolution on housing charged that too many Canadians live in rat-infested slums and the country's housing situation is intolerable. The resolution called on public authorities to buy up more land and make it available for housing by leasing it or selling it at cost. It also urged rent review boards and said federal money now made available under the National Housing Act should be increased and go only to families earning $10,000 a year.

The CLC delegates also heard a report on a survey of standards of Canadian autonomy among international unions with members in Canada. Of 65 Canadian heads of internationals, who replied, 56 said their Canadian officers or members determine policies dealing with the Canadian affiairs of their union.

workers with a $1.60 floor, followed by yearly step-ups to $1.80, $2 and $2.20.

The Williams bill also would bring local transit workers, now excluded from overtime provisions of the law, under the same 40-hour workweek protection as other workers. They would achieve this over a three-year period.

Present law permits motels, hotels and restaurants to count tips received by employes towards up to 50 percent of the minimum wage. The Williams bill would limit the amount of tips that can be credited against a worker's minimum wage to 40 percent of the hourly pay floor.

Another feature of the Senate bill would extend the Equal Pay Act, which prohibits paying lower wages to workers of one sex, to executives, professionals and administrative employes who are now exempt.

The Williams bill slightly expands the current provision that retail, service and farm employers may—with the approval of the Secretary of Labor—obtain certificates to pay students 85 percent of the applicable minimum. It extends the same privilege to schools and colleges that provide part-time jobs for students.

But the committee firmly rejected the blanket sub-minimum wage sought by the Administration for all workers under 18 and for students under 21.

In other congressional developments:

- A controversial anti-busing amendment, labeled a retreat to segregation by the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups, continued to dominate debate over a House-Senate conference agreement on a multi-billion dollar higher education bill.

The Senate voted 63-15 approval of the conference report, as liberals split on the issue. Those who voted for passage argued that the basic college aid provisions outweighed the "damage" done by the amendment, which would bar court busing orders from taking effect until all appeals were exhausted.

In an earlier vote, however, the Senate refused by a 44-26 vote to send the bill back to conference with instructions to accept the even more rigid ban on busing for desegregation purposes that the House had initially adopted.

The House leadership put off early action on the conference report amid indications that it faced opposition both from a number of pro-civil rights congressmen and from those who considered the final version of the busing amendment too weak.

- Also put off was a scheduled House battle over a revenue-sharing bill drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee.

The bill would funnel some $29.5 billion federal funds to state and local governments over a five-year period under a formula related to total population, urban population, per capita income and tax effort. By a single-vote margin, the Rules Committee cleared it for the House floor under a procedure that barred any amendment or point of order.

The House leadership and Ways & Means Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) decided to pull the bill back when it appeared that it faced trouble from double-barreled opposition.

There were a number of congressmen who were prepared to oppose any revenue-sharing involving "no-strings" grants to states and absence of congressional oversight into the uses made of the funds.

And a bloc of powerful committee chairmen, led by Appropriations Committee Chairman George H Mahon (D-Tex.), were lined up to fight the bypassing of the annual appropriations procedure.

HUNDREDS OF STRIKERS assemble at the Farah Manufacturing Co. plant in El Paso, Tex., to urge fellow workers to walk out. The major manufacturer of men's slacks and sportswear has won a temporary court order to limit picketing. But demonstrations have been held in 11 major U.S. cities against the purchase of Farah products as the AFL-CIO urged support of the boycott.

Consumer Price Index Edges Higher in April

Higher prices for men's clothes, used cars, restaurant meals and household services pushed the Consumer Price Index up two-tenths of 1 percent during April, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increase was the same both before and after adjustments were made for seasonal price changes.

The April increase brought the CPI to 124.3 percent of its 1967 base, meaning that what cost $10 then now costs $12.43.

A comparison with the older 1957-59 period shows that consumers are now paying $14.46 for the same cross section of goods and services that sold for $10 then.

Increased costs left the average worker with three dependents with $95.31 a week in real spendable earnings, or 47 cents more than in March.

The Cost of Living Council released a report on the first quarter—simultaneously with the Labor Dept.'s report on April prices—in which Director Donald Rumsfeld said the wage-price control program is "proceeding satisfactorily" and is "on target at this stage."

Rumsfeld said he is confident that the Administration can reach its goal of holding inflation to a rate of 2 to 3 percent by the end of 1972. A statement by Pres. Nixon said the COLC survey for the first three months of 1972 "provides encouraging evidence that the nation continues to make progress in the battle against inflation."

But the BLS report on prices reveals that much of the damage already has been done, even though there were declines over the month in the cost of groceries, gasoline and mortgage interest payments.

For example, overall supermarket prices showed no change on an unadjusted basis during the month, but they remained 3.9 percent higher than they were in April 1971.

The price of meat, poultry and fish rose seven-tenths of 1 percent on an actual basis—which represents prices currently being paid—and when compared to a year ago, the price of meat was up 8.8 percent.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, supermarket prices dropped by one-tenth of 1 percent and the price of meat fell by six-tenths of 1 percent. But even on a seasonal basis, meat was costing the consumer 4.6 percent more than it did in January.

The BLS reported that the CPI rose at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 3.3 percent during the first, full five months of the Nixon Administration's Phase 2 controls.

New Orleans Teachers Vote On Unity Plan elementary, junior high and high schools, but neither organization represents a majority of the 4,500 teachers in the school system.

However, with the proposed merger, the majority representation would be attained, and the first objective of the new organization will be to negotiate a collective bargaining agreement with the school board.

Pres. David Selden of the AFT said that "all the New Orleans teachers have been treated as second-class citizens when it comes to collective bargaining."

"Almost every other urban school system of similar size in the United States has enough respect for its professional employes to deal with them on a collective bargaining basis," he stressed.

As an advocate of merger to strengthen the position of classroom teachers with school boards and local governments, Selden expressed confidence that the unification of the Orleans Education Association and AFT Local 527 would be "wholeheartedly" supported by the New Orleans teachers.

In recent years, the parish school board has rebuffed both organizations in their attempts to obtain a collective bargaining agreement on the ground neither represented the majority of the system's teachers.

The merger agreement closely parallels a unification pact in New York state that would bring together 195,000 members now represented by the NEA and the AFT.

Earlier, a merger was ratified by local organizations of the AFT and NEA in Los Angeles on an experimental basis. That agreement took effect Feb. 1, 1970, and is still in operation.

Merger discussions have been conducted by leaders of the two Orleans parish teacher groups since early March. The agreement was ironed out in about 10 sessions, officials reported.

Nat LaCour, president of AFT Local 527, would be president of the new organization, and Cheryl Eppling, who heads the NEA unit, would become executive vice president.

The deadline for the mail referendum is June 2.

CONVENTION

The Wyoming AFL-CIO has scheduled its 1972 convention for Cheyenne, Sept. 30.

Meany Rallies Support In Farah Strike, Boycott

"Their only crime is that the company has gotten a temporary order restricting picketing," the two union officials declared.

Police and armed company guards have been parading around the plant with sentry dogs, the union said. It charged that this was a blatant effort to intimidate the pickets and to discourage people inside the plant from joining the strike.

The ACWA also reported that the Labor Dept. has certified the walkout a legal strike and has notified the Immigration & Naturalization Service to prevent the importation of strikebreakers from across the Mexican border.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, in calling for increased support of the strikers, said, "We believe that the action of the company and the police is El Paso represents a deliberate effort to prevent these Mexican-Americans from achieving a better life and measure of dignity and security on the job."

Levy, who is coordinating the union's strike activities with Sanchez, reported that unusally stiff bonds are being imposed on the arrested strikers.

He pointed out that the normal bond for trivial misdemeanors in El Paso is $25, but the strikers are each being held on $400 bonds.

Ever since organizing activities began more than a year ago, the company has fought bitterly to keep the union out. It has fired key union supporters, refused to bargain when the ACWA won an election at one plant unit, and has refused to consent to broader representation elections.

In March, a trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board found that 19 workers at the El Paso plant had been illegally fired for union activity.

He recommended that the NLRB order their immediate reinstatement, full back pay from the time of their dismissals last year plus interest, and a directive to the company to stop discriminating against union members and interfering with the right of its workers to organize.

Management refused to comply and is challenging the recommendation to the NLRB.

The three teams of strikers on the road for the consumer information demonstrations have been highly successful, the union reported. Rallies sponsored by the ACWA have been held in New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Baltimore, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Boston, St. Louis, San Diego, Atlanta and Detroit.

In each of the 11 cities, informational picket lines were set up at major retail stores that promote the sale of Farah products.

State-County Wins 10th San Mateo Vote

San Mateo, Calif.—County clerical employes chose to be represented by the State, County & Municipal Employes in an election that marked AFSCME's 10th victory here.

Of the 1,038 employes eligible, 394 voted for AFSCME Council 57 while 304 chose the Peninsula Association of Public Employes and 51 voted for no union.

Union Label Show to Open In San Diego

San Diego—The 1972 AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show is preparing to open its doors on June 9 here.

Two weeks before the scheduled opening, Sec.-Treas. Edward P. Murphy of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. reported: "We're 99 percent ready to roll."

The show will feature about 350 displays by manufacturers whose products are produced by union labor under union contracts.

This year's exhibition will lay special emphasis on American-made goods, Murphy noted.

"We've never accepted anything for exhibit in this show that was made outside this country," he said, "but it's difficult now because so many American firms are manufacturing components abroad, using low-paid foreign labor."

Court Decision Imperils Strikers' Rehiring Rights

WASHINGTON RALLY was attended by more than 2,500 members of the American Postal Workers Union from across the nation who protested "bad faith" negotiations and grievance-handling on the local level. They also urged Congress to give postal workers the same bargaining and political rights as employes in private industry. Here, union members begin a march from the Washington Monument grounds to the headquarters of the U.S. Postal Service.

Labor Scores Rule as Aid To Employer

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to uphold the National Labor Relations Board and reject the precedent-smashing reasoning of a federal appellate court that held that an employer could not be compelled to reinstate strikers he illegally fired.

If the appellate decision were to stand, the AFL-CIO said, it would amount to "an invitation to employers to rid themselves of union activities through precisely the conduct" the National Labor Relations Act was intended to forbid.

"It permits an employer to single out strike leaders for discharge, secure in the knowledge that if he then hires replacements . . . the sole remedy for his unfair labor practice will be the slap on the wrist of a cease and desist order."

The case stemmed from a Teamsters strike at the International Van Lines in Santa Maria, Calif.

According to the undisputed facts, the employer fired four of his six workers the day after they struck in protest against the firm's stalling in refusing to agree to a union representation election.

The NLRB ruled that the workers were illegally fired for protected union activity, that the firings converted the strike into an unfair labor practice strike, and that the workers were thus absolutely entitled to their jobs back when they offered to return to work. If there had been no unfair labor practice, the employer would not have been compelled to rehire them if he had hired replacements in order to keep his business going.

The appellate court agreed with the NLRB that the firings were il-

No-Fault Bill Approved by Senate Panel

By Rex Hardesty

A labor-endorsed measure to establish a national no-fault automobile insurance system has been approved by the Senate Commerce Committee — despite the opposition of a powerful lawyers' lobby.

It would give states a maximum of two years to adopt no-fault legislation that at least meets minimum federal standards.

If the states didn't act, an even more stringent version of the program would go into effect. The state's only role in that case would be to administer the program.

Under the committee's no-fault concept, accident victims would promptly receive the money they need to pay their bills and make up lost earnings—without the need for lawyers and court suits to determine fault and liability. It should also mean, no-fault supporters contend, lower premium rates since the cost of determining liability would be drastically reduced.

The bill provides that an insured motorist could collect from his own insurance company for medical and rehabilitation expenses of up to $50,000 and for loss of income up to $75,000.

No determination of fault would be necessary to recover losses up to those amounts. But it would still be possible to go to court as under present procedures to seek compensation for losses above those limits. But an estimated 95 percent of injury claim cases would be settled without court action.

Of major importance, backers of the Senate bill say, is that claims for "intangible losses" of relatively minor amounts would not have to go to court. This would greatly relieve the backlog of court cases and expedite the settling of major cases.

"Intangible losses" are for such as pain and suffering and are often paid off readily by the insurance company—even in excess of the actual damage—in order to avoid the much more expensive procedure of fighting the claim in court.

The bill also requires insurance companies to make the no-fault coverage available to all motorists with a valid driver's license who pay "a reasonable part" of the premium as a down payment and it would be compulsory for motorists to have such coverage.

A motorist could lose his no-fault coverage if he failed to pay his premium or lost his driver's license, but termination for any other reason would have to be

54 Major Areas In New Jobless List

May marked the 15th consecutive month that at least one-third of the nation's major labor areas have been classified as suffering from "substantial" unemployment which the Labor Dept. defines as a jobless rate of 6 percent or more with that level expected to continue at least two more months.

The Labor Dept. announced the removal of Wichita, Kan., and Charleston, S.C. from list, leaving 54 of the 150 major areas so classified.

But the number of smaller areas classified as having substantial unemployment rose by 3 to 838.

Only six major labor areas had substantial unemployment when Pres. Nixon took office in 1969.

At Platform Hearings:

Quality of Schools Termed Key Issue

Boston—The AFL-CIO strongly reaffirmed its commitment to "equal opportunity for every child and young person to obtain a quality education," and called on all candidates and parties to provide the "national determination" to achieve that goal.

The federation voiced its views on education in an appearance here before the Democratic Party Platform Committee by Walter G. Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

The platform committee is holding a series of hearings in major cities to gather a wide cross-section of viewpoints. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presented the federation's overall platform proposals at initial hearings in Washington.

Davis stressed organized labor's "deep and long-standing concern for the public schools" both in terms of the national welfare and the needs of American workers. Describing the many elements that make up quality education and the broad range of educational needs, he emphasized that "millions of children and young people" lack such an education.

Davis reviewed the educational developments of the past few years and said:

"We must maintain existing federal programs at the full levels of funding presently authorized, but we must develop new federal programs to meet the new and deepening crisis situation which has seen city school systems close down for part of the school year, which has seen teachers paid in scrip and which has seen intolerable layoffs and cutbacks in the teaching profession."

On school busing, Davis asserted that it is a "false issue" that has been "exploited by those who would draw the nation's attention away from its genuine educational problems."

He stressed that busing is an educational tool that can be used well or badly. The key, he said, is what contribution busing can make to quality education.

Noting the problems facing higher education, Davis said in his statement that "no better form of student assistance has been devised than low-cost or free-tuition higher education." He urged that special attention be directed toward the development of community colleges within commuting distance of the student's home.

U.S. Plunging Into Record Trade Deficit

America's imports continue to exceed its exports and latest government figures point to the worst trade deficit in the nation's history.

Last year, the trade balance was $2.05 billion in the red—the first time in this century that the United States had a trade deficit.

This year is starting off worse.

The first quarter began with a record $1.5 billion deficit, and Commerce Sec. Peter G. Peterson said in a Meet the Press interview that "the second quarter will be our worst quarter with regard to trade balance."

Peterson said he thought the trade balance would improve during the final quarter of 1972, but the Commerce Dept. reported that in April alone, imports exceeded exports by $699 million.

That was the second largest

Federal Judge Raps Justice Dept., Dismisses Indictment of Seafarers

By Tom Castor

New York—A U.S. District Court judge has dismissed charges of making illegal campaign contributions against the Seafarers and seven of its top leaders, including Pres. Paul Hall.

In granting a motion by the union to dismiss the case, Judge Mark A. Constantino said the Justice Dept. had ignored repeated court orders to specify its charges against the union, thereby dragging the case out over 23 months.

That violates the union's and its officers' right to a speedy trial, Constantino held.

Furthermore, the judge ruled, the Justice Dept.'s withholding of pre-trial information on the charges hamstrung efforts to prepare a defense.

Taking note of the dismissal, the SIU said, "from the outset, we have shown that our political contributions to various candidates for public office are made openly. They are made legally. They are reported publicly."

"We don't intend to be scared out of politics," the SIU declared. "We think it is our right and our responsibility to remain active in this field."

The union makes political donations from a special political action fund—Seafarers Political Activity Donation (SPAD)—which is funded through voluntary contributions. It was founded in 1962.

SPECTACULAR GROWTH of the State, County & Municipal Employes—now 550,000 strong—is cited in the keynote address by Pres. Jerry Wurf to the union's convention in Houston.

Up 80,000 in 2 Years:

State-County Cites Continued Growth

By John R. Oravec

Houston—The continuing growth of the State, County & Municipal Employes resulted in the addition of 80,000 new members in the past two years, delegates to AFSCME's 19th convention were told.

But Jerry Wurf, president of the 550,000-member union, warned the 1,500 delegates against complacency. AFSCME, he stressed, bargains for many more state and local employes than it has signed up as members and "we've got to do something about it."

He said the union cannot wait for agency shop provisions to enroll the more than 1 million workers it now represents. Achieving a 100 percent membership is a key challenge the union faces in internal organizing, Wurf declared.

Wurf was re-elected by the convention to a fifth consecutive term. He was elected by acclamation with William Lucy, the new secretary-treasurer, immediately after the convention amended the union's constitution extending the terms of office for international officers from two to four years.

Lucy succeeds Joseph L. Ames, secretary-treasurer since 1966, who was elected to the newly created post of full-time chairman of AFSCME's judicial panel. The judicial panel was originally set up in 1965 to handle internal disputes and charges against violations of the union constitution.

Restructuring of the judicial panel was approved by voice vote and the constitutional change providing for four-year terms for the president, secretary-treasurer and international vice presidents was adopted in roll call vote by better than a 2 to 1 ratio.

In his keynote address, Wurf stressed the need for strong unionism. With the hostility of the Nixon Administration to workers clearly evident, he said, no institution is more important to the poor and the unrepresented than the labor movement.

Organizing problems extend beyond public employe unions, he noted, and called on unions of the private sector to intensify their organizing efforts.

Overall, only 25 percent of the nation's work force belongs to unions, he pointed out. "The ability of the trade union movement to its responsibilities in the future will depend heavily on its ability to organize the remaining 75 percent," Wurf declared.

Wurf cited as a stumbling block to increased organizing disputes among AFL-CIO affiliates and with unaffiliated unions. He said this "jurisdictional chaos" must be halted so resources are not wasted on intra-union warfare.

Wurf also called for federal legislation to protect the union rights of state and local workers.

"The real activity has shifted to the nation's capital," he said, "as we have learned that the rights and needs of public employes can best be protected not by individual states and local laws but rather through congressional action creating a national law to govern public employe relations."

"We must play a new game," Wurf told the delegates. "That game is federal elections—presidential and congressional. We are actively in both."

Public employes are generally treated as second-class citizens when it comes to federal labor laws, especially in the right to strike, Wurf said. Only two exceptions were made, he noted, when the government made AFSCME members full-fledged citizens by imposing the wage limits of the Pay Board and restrictions on political spending.

He assured the delegates that the union's political activities would play an important role in November in both the presidential and congressional elections.

Ames, as elected chairman of the restructured judicial panel, will serve a five-year term. Eight members of the panel will initially be appointed to staggered terms—two for five years, three for two years and three for one year. Thereafter, all terms will be for five years. Ames will receive the same salary as he has in the secretary-treasurer's position.

Lucy, Ames successor, has been a member of AFSCME since 1962. The 38-year-old Negro, a civil engineer, joined the AFSCME staff in 1966 as associate director of legislation and community affairs. He has been executive assistant to Wurf since 1970.

Three contenders for the Democratic presidential nomination were scheduled to address the delegates—Sen. Edmund S. Muskie in person, and Senators Hubert H. Humphrey and George McGovern, by telephone hookup from California where they were campaigning for the primary election.

Distillery Union Votes Doubled Strike Fund

Montreal—The 300 delegates to the 16th Convention of the Distillery Workers gave the incumbent officers a vote of confidence and additional bargaining and organizing leverage by doubling the Strike Fund to $1 million and providing for higher strike benefits.

The convention also kicked off the union's COPE campaign, giving the highest priority to a resolution on political action. Contributions at the convention added up to nearly one-third of the union's COPE quota.

The emphasis on COPE was underscored in the keynote speech by Pres. Mort Brandenburg and in an address by Sec.-Treas. George J. Oneto, both of whom were reelected to a new four-year term by acclamation.

Citing what he termed a "sorry parade of broken promises" by the Nixon Administration, including non-delivery on pledges to end the war, to straighten out the economy, to bring us together and to raise the quality of living," Brandenburg called upon the delegates to hammer home to union members the need "to throw out the Nixon crowd and to put in people who have human instincts, human reactions, human goals—and human programs to meet these goals."

Oneto, who serves as the chairman of the union's COPE committee, called for "redoubling of our efforts" to assure a victory next November "not only for organized labor but for America."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland spoke immediately after a defense of the Administration's economic policies by Secretary of Labor James D. Hodgson, who cited figures on employment and living costs to buttress his contention that "we are winning the battle against inflation." Kirkland commented that the data was not only "distorted" but reflected "a morbid propensity on the part of the spokesmen for the Administration never to explain what went wrong with their economic game plans and always to hear only bluebirds."

He noted that the Nixon policies had spurred "unprecedented profit-taking," one consequence of which was to "increase economic polarization in the form of an ever-widening gap between the haves and have-nots in the United States." He labeled "the last-chance offer" in the Administration's compulsory arbitration bill as "Russian roulette" whose "clear aim is to give the American trade union movement a shafting."

James C. Gildea, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, told the delegates that "a better America means a healthy America, and it means access to health and hospital care for everyone under a broad system of health insurance." He lauded the Kennedy-Griffiths Health Security Act as a proposal which would "provide health care for all Americans, with a minimum of red tape and with freedom from demeaning ability-to-pay tests."

A resolution on international trade—unanimously adopted by the delegates—pointed out that Canadian whiskey had led the parade of wines and spirits imported into the American market during the past five years, that such imports had generated work for both American and Canadian members of the union and that "a fair and equitable trade policy in the interests of all members of our international union" should be the DWU's legislative goal in Ottawa and Washington.

Convention delegates also:

- Endorsed the action taken by AFL-CIO representatives in withdrawing from the Pay Board.
- Proposed changes in the administration of the National Labor Relations Board "to make it effectively enforceable against employers and fair in disputes between employers and unions."
- Concurred with the AFL-CIO position on "world freedom and peace," an objective which can be "significantly furthered by effective cooperation with other nations dedicated to the defense of democracy and the promotion of peace, social justice, and human dignity."

20,000 Select AFSCME in Pennsylvania

Harrisburg—A unit of 20,000 white-collar workers employed by the State of Pennsylvania overwhelmingly chose to be represented by the State, County & Municipal Employes.

The election victory brought the number of Pennsylvania state employes represented by AFSCME to 62,000.

AFSCME has chalked up a string of victories in the Keystone state following enactment by the state legislature of a public employe bargaining law. Several previously unaffiliated organizations of government employes have merged with the union.

The state white-collar employes voted by a 7-1 margin for AFSCME representation with 12,449 voting in favor of the union, and 1,756 ballots for no union. There were 1,417 challenged ballots.

The white-collar unit, with eligible voters in every county of the state, was the last large group of state employes to vote on the union representation question. Two other large groups of workers—17,500 tradesmen and laborers and 21,500 health care and support services workers—chose AFSCME last year.

The union immediately announced that it would ask Gov. Milton Shapp (D) that negotiations get under way as soon as possible.

State agencies where the employes work include the Departments of Labor & Industry, Transportation, Health & Welfare and Finance.

Pilots Warn of Airport Safety Risks, Stress Poor Equipment, Facilities

Lives of airline passengers and crews are being risked far more than the public is aware because of poor facilities and equipment, the Air Line Pilots charged.

Participants in the 1972 ALPA Air Safety Forum concluded that many of these unsafe conditions are fostered by misplaced priorities of the Federal Aviation Administration.

ALPA Pres. John J. ODonnell called on the FAA, the airline industry and aircraft manufacturers to join with the union in achieving the mutual goal of greater air safety.

He said that while the ALPA may at times be impatient at the lack of progress, it does sympathize with the problems of others and is willing to cooperate.

A major concern of the ALPA emerged as the inadequacies of airports and safety facilities.

Capt. Lee Hines, who presided at a forum discussion, said, "I believe the American public would be shocked" if it had any idea of the varying degrees of safety from airport to airport.

While one airport may have every modern facility and safety aid available, Hines said, the next one may have no control tower, no radar, short runways, and shoddy fire and rescue equipment.

But while the ALPA has been trying for 40 years to bring attention to the problems of the airports and facilities lagging behind the development of aircraft, Hines noted that the public has been ignoring the conditions. He complained that the passenger is often more concerned with the dryness of his martini and quality of his steak.

One of the greatest unresolved menaces to air safety is the hijacker, O'Donnell told the forum.

Capt. Thomas Ashwood, chairman of the ALPA International Flight Security Task Force, noted that this is a major international problem. He reported that aircraft of 52 nations have been victims of hijackings or sabotage in the last 17 years.

During this period, 15,000 passengers and 1,500 crew members were affected, and more than 400 passengers and 50 crew members were murdered in hijacking and sabotage incidents.

Ashwood called for stricter security measures at airports, stringent controls on the sale of explosives and firm international agreements for the punishment of air pirates.

The ALPA presented its top safety awards to W. T. Alford of Dallas and Mya Shelton of Seattle for their contributions to air safety during the year.

Union Leader Dies In West Virginia

Charleston, W.Va.—Glen Armstrong, secretary-treasurer of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, died May 28 of a heart attack. He was 62.

Armstrong had been secretary-treasurer of the state AFL-CIO since 1965 and served as state COPE director since 1957. A member of the Typographical union who had been employed on the city's newspapers, Armstrong was director of education for the West Virginia State Federation of Labor prior to merger.

He is survived by his widow Geneva and two daughters.

Proposed by Hardy:

Service Union Convention Votes Expansion Program

John M. Barry

San Francisco—The 15th convention of the Service Employes adopted a broad-ranging program to strengthen the union and double its membership within the next few years.

The program, outlined by SEIU Pres. George Hardy in his report to the convention and his keynote address, calls among other things for expansion of the executive board and the union staff, creation of a strike fund, and increased activities in such areas as political education, legislative action and bargaining research.

To finance the program, the convention approved a boost of 50 cents in the monthly per capita payment, raising it from the 80 cents to $1.30, effective in September.

Hardy made it clear that the primary objective of the plan is to increase SEIU'S membership by "at least one-half million more members."

"When we have a million members," he observed, "then we'll really have the clout we need to win for those members the recognition, wages and conditions they deserve as such an important segment of the working population."

Following his address, the nearly 700 delegates turned to consideration of a series of resolutions and constitutional amendments designed to put the program into effect.

Also on the agenda were speeches by local, state and national labor officials and political figures, including Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) and Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), presidential aspirants campaigning in the state in quest of California's 271 delegates to the Democratic National Convention.

A 44-page report by the officers and executive board traced the union's growth in the four years since the previous convention from 372,000 to nearly 500,000 members, with some 80 charters issued to local unions in 19 states and two Canadian provinces.

Hardy, who took office as president on May 26, 1971, paid tribute to his predecessor, David Sullivan, for spurring SEIU'S growth and starting "most of the important programs that this international union carries on today."

In essence, Hardy suggested, his own proposals would build on many of the programs launched by Sullivan.

The major points approved by the delegates call for:

- Expanded organizing efforts to meet the SEIU's growing potential, especially among public employes, the health services industries and national corporations.
- Restructuring of the union to increase democratic participation by the membership, including expansion of the international executive board from 14 members to 35.
- An improved political education program, with five cents of the per capita increase earmarked for this purpose, half to go to the international and half to local unions and joint councils.
- Increased legislative activity, not only on Capitol Hill but also in the state legislatures and the city councils.
- Creation of a strike fund by earmarking 10 cents of the per capita boost to help local unions meet their financial needs in strike situations.
- Expansion of the research staff to develop a corps of negotiating specialists in key areas across the continent.
- A broader role within the SEIU for joint councils, state councils, regional and industry conferences.
- Improved programs of communications through meetings and conferences as well as publications.
- Expansion of trade union education and staff training efforts.
- Modernization of the union's administrative procedures, with particular attention to greater use of computers, "to cut the red tape as much as possible" and reduce the burdens on local officers.
- Creation of a building fund through allotment of 10 cents of the per capita increase with the view toward eventually constructing the SEIU'S own headquarters building.
- Development of an adequate staff of specialists on various aspects of trade union affairs, with improvements in salaries and fringe benefits to attract the needed personnel.
- Improvements in the affiliates pension plan, which covers officers and staff of local unions and joint councils.

In urging approval of the 50-cent increase in the per capita tax, Hardy noted that since 1947, the per capita has gone up only one-third while members' wages were more than doubling.

The higher per capita was widely supported and approved by voice vote of the delegates.

Australia's Strikes Rise Despite Arbitration Law

The Australian compulsory arbitration system—frequently cited as a model by those who advocate a similar plan for this country—is failing to keep industrial peace, according to a University of Sydney professor.

Although the Australian system determines minimum wages and conditions of employment for nearly 90 percent of that nation's workforce, time lost to strikes continues to increase, writes Kingsley Laffer in the May edition of Monthly Labor Review, publication of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Laffer is associate professor of industrial relations and editor of the Journal of Industrial Relations at the University of Sydney.

"In 1970," Laffer relates, "working days lost as a result of strikes totaled 2,393,700, compared with 1,079,500 in 1968. Last year, time lost increased substantially to 3,068,600 working days."

Compulsory arbitration, coupled with "the abolition of cost-of-living adjustments, which looks so well in economic models, has probably undermined the ordinary worker's security and accentuated his alienation, thus intensifying resort to direct action with its sometimes inflationary effects."

"Without doubt," Laffer writes, "there has in recent years been a drastic decline in the degree of acceptance of the authority of arbitration bodies as an alternative to the strike, as well as a setter of wage standards."

The author says that the essence of the matter is that Australian arbitration has been basically a paternalistic system.

"It has sought to do good to management, the unions and the community, and has to a considerable extent succeeded in this.

"But just as paternalistic managers in organizations tend to fail in the end through inability to understand and cope with the real issues in conflict with employes, so a paternalistic arbitration system is now finding itself unable to come to grips with the deeper issues underlying industrial disputes."

Laffer emphasizes that more sophisticated managements and unions "seem increasingly likely to find their own solutions to the problems confronting them."

"This almost certainly means that the recent growth in direct negotiations will continue and that emphasis will continue to shift to personnel and industrial relations management at the plant level."

Bakery Workers Pacts Set Pattern for 40,000

The Bakery & Confectionery Workers have won new three-year contracts on the Pacific Coast and in the East Central States which the union expects will set patterns for 40,000 union members in wholesale bread and cake plants.

Wage and fringe benefit packages in both cases average 6.2 percent a year with an additional agreement on medical-hospital benefits in the East Central pact. Ratification is under way and a union spokesman said approval is expected.

Still unresolved is the union's proposal for a workweek consisting of five consecutive days, Monday through Friday, so that baking plant workers can have the normal weekend enjoyed by others.

Union-management committees have been appointed on a national and on local levels to resolve this dispute by Oct. 1. If agreement is not reached by that deadline, the matter could become a strike issue, the union said.

The Pacific Coast agreement was negotiated with ITT-Continental and American Baking companies of California.

The 6.2 percent wage and fringe benefit increase will be based each year on the level achieved in the previous year.

Interstate Brands participated in original Pacific Coast negotiations, but refused to accept the terms of the package until the union struck its plant for two days.

The East Central States pattern was achieved with the management of the Paterson, N.J., plant of the ITT-Continental company.

Besides the 6.2 percent wage-fringe settlement, the union won an additional agreement that management would make the contributions necessary to maintain health and welfare benefits.

In the case of ITT-Continental, this would amount to 2.5 cents per worker per hour, but at other plants it could go as high as 12 cents, the union said.

The parties agreed to a provision which states "in the event that the agreed-upon contribution proves to be inadequate to provide the basic coverage and major medical program, the trustees of the fund are instructed to establish employer contributions at a level sufficient to provide said coverage."

Pryor Gains Senate Runoff In Arkansas

Little Rock, Ark.—U.S. Rep. David H. Pryor (D-Ark.), a third-term congressman and a labor-supported primary candidate for Arkansas' Democratic senatorial seat held by John L. McClellan, has forced the strongly conservative senator into a runoff June 13.

Pryor, 36, gained a runoff when McClellan failed to win a majority of the vote in a four-way contest for the nomination.

With nearly all of the state's precincts reporting, unofficial figures show that McClellan received 218,792 votes, or 44.6 percent; Pryor, 203,456 votes, or 41.5 percent; Ted Boswell, a liberal lawyer, 62,238, or 12.7 percent, and conservative businessman Foster L. Johnson, 6,295, or 1.2 percent.

Pryor said that Arkansas voters want "a new beginning" with a senator who "cares more about people" than a "brick-and-mortar concept of progress" which he characterized as McClellan's preoccupation.

Jewish Labor Committee Sessions Focus on Social, Economic Justice

Unity House, Pa.—The Nixon Administration is seeking "to restructure American society to tilt it from those who have too little to those who have too much," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told a human rights conference here.

Labor's job is to find "decent and dignified ways for the common people to live together and receive a fair share" of the nation's abundance, Kirkland told the Jewish Labor Committee's eighth Labor Human Rights Conference.

The 300 delegates pointed up the JLC's role in serving as a bridge between the unions, civil rights groups and the Jewish community, JLC Pres. Jacob T. Zuckerman said. Among the delegates were representatives of the garment unions, teachers, taxi drivers, boilermakers, hotel workers, meat cutters and civil rights and political activists.

A number of panels marked the three-day conference at the vacation resort of the Ladies' Garment Workers, including discussions on school busing, anti-semitism and equal job opportunities.

The panel on anti-semitism heard warnings against a new threat coming from white and black ultra leftists and extremists, with the new bigotry winning toleration in some respectable circles in the liberal community.

The panel on busing dealt with the problem of advancing school integration while countering the efforts of the Nixon Administration and George Wallace for political advantage.

The discussion on equal job opportunities heard AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director Don Slaiman assail Administration programs and other proposals to set up job quotas.

Black workers want equal opportunity, he said, not paternalism, and they have demonstrated that they can learn as well as any other group the skills necessary for employment in the building trades and other occupations.

Others participating in the panels were Albert Shanker, president of the United Federation of Teachers; Arnold Aronson, secretary of the Leadership Council on Human Rights; Emanuel Muravchik, executive director of the JLC; Earl Raab, executive director of the San Francisco Jewish Community Council; Irwin Suall of the Anti-Defamation League; Prof. Marvin Bressler of Princeton, and George Travers, associate director, Office of Federal Contract Compliance, Vice Presidents Shelley Appleton and Murray Gross of the ILGWU and Ben Fisher, director of contract administration for the Steelworkers, chaired the panels.

The Job Gambit

WE SEEK A REJECTION of unemployment as an instrument of national policy. Today, the worker and his job are being openly bartered with disastrous consequences.

It is the worker who is told he must sacrifice his job to fight inflation. The worker is told to sacrifice his job to clean up the environment. Or that he must sacrifice his job so that others can purchase allegedly cheaper imported goods. He is told to sacrifice wage increases so that profits can go up; he is told to produce more and want less.

Workers are understandably weary and bitter when their jobs are little more than pawns manipulated by corporate and governmental money managers. What the money managers disregard is the fundamental importance of jobs to the American economy. The wages a worker earns and spends in the marketplace and the tax dollars he pays are the backbone of America's dynamic economy.

Thus, what America needs is jobs—more jobs, better jobs, at decent levels of pay. These jobs should come from the private sector in a growing, expanding economy. But when the economy is not growing or not expanding sufficiently, then the government must assume the obligation of being the employer of last resort. With the vast backlog of unmet public needs in America, these jobs are essential to the public interest.

The only policy that makes any sense is one that increases employment, rather than unemployment.

Today, millions of people who want jobs don't have them, and uncounted hundreds of thousands have given up hope of finding work or are working only part-time because full-time work is not available. Additional hundreds of thousands work full time but receive so little in wages that they must go on welfare to exist.

In fact, no one really knows how many millions of Americans are unemployed, underemployed or discouraged from seeking employment. Fifteen million were out of work at some time during the last 12 months—a waste of productive capacity and consumer capacity this nation cannot afford. A policy that increases unemployment is indefensible.

A JOB AT A DECENT WAGE is still the most effective route out of poverty. No worker, working a 40-hour week, year round, should receive such a pittance that he should be forced to turn to welfare. That is why we believe that an adequate minimum wage covering all workers is the best single step this country can take to alleviate poverty. The benefits and protections of the Fair Labor Standards Act, absolutely essential to the working poor, have been seriously eroded in recent years.

Welfare reform is vital if America is to eliminate poverty. The present system fails those who need welfare and is a continuing drain on the limited resources of state and local governments.

We find abhorrent proposals that would require welfare recipients to work for less than an already inadequate minimum wage. Rather than lift people out of poverty, such proposals only drive them further into the trap of poverty. What is needed is a federally paid basic family benefit of at least $3,000, rising to no less than the poverty level within a few years.

Essential to welfare reform must be a federally funded community-controlled system of day care centers for the children of welfare mothers and other working women. Day care centers would permit these women to obtain work knowing that their children are adequately supervised and receiving broad-range health and education programs.

Handbook to LBJ's Presidency Captures Its Essential Spirit

By John P. Roche

MANY YEARS AGO one of the grand old men of American historical scholarship gave me some advice: "In the preface to your book," he said, "never thank your friends for their help by name. If you do, no editor will send them the book to review, so your enemies will get first licks."

I bring this up because I want to throw myself on the mercy of the court by stating at the outset that Harry C. McPherson, Jr. is one of my closest friends and he has written a wonderful book. And, though perhaps I am not sufficiently self-critical, I don't believe that my judgment of the book, "A Political Education" (Atlantic, Little Brown), is significantly influenced by friendship.

In 1956 Harry McPherson went from Texas to Washington to work for Sen. Lyndon Johnson. After holding a series of positions in the Defense and State Departments, he wound up in the White House as Special Counsel to the President. He and I shared a suite of offices and, more important, a set of basic convictions about the proper direction American policy should take.

For more than two years we were in almost permanent caucus and it soon became clear to me that, perhaps because of shared origins, perhaps because of poetic intuition (Harry had wanted to be a poet, but got sidetracked into law), McPherson understood Lyndon Johnson better than anyone on the White House staff with the possible exception of George Christian.

Moreover, the fact that Harry began on the Hill with Johnson gave him a different time-frame, a different basis of evaluation. I, for instance, could never understand the President's obsession with the Congressional Record—an advance copy, annotated before dawn by some poor staff member, was delivered to the bedroom every morning. Harry told me: "That's our leader's world—and part of his problem."

A profound insight: Johnson never really made the transition from the closed politics of the Senate to the wide open politics of the presidency. The Congressional Record was a sort of symbolic link with a universe where he knew all the rules, all the mine fields.

While in form "A Political Education" is an autobiography, in fact it is a brilliantly perceptive commentary on some of the wildest years in American political history. Unlike the Nixon White House, which seems to be run on a rigid staff pattern, the Johnson operation was highly personalized. You never knew from one day to the next what the Old Man was going to throw at you.

THE CONSEQUENCE of this existential administrative behavior was that a number of us got involved in almost anything that was currently on the burner, but Harry and George Christian were really inside—Harry because he drafted most of the President's major speeches; George because, as press secretary, he had to know what to tell the school of barracuda lurking in the press lobby.

Thus McPherson's book covers an enormous range of material from foreign policy to ghetto riots. It is virtually a handbook to the Johnson presidency. Finally, it contains a portrait of that strange, complex, talented, perverse man in the Oval Office that I consider virtually definitive. A President who loved to have his ego caressed—but despised sycophants. Who could unnervingly shift from roaring megalomania to profound and perceptive self-doubts. Who had a reputation for tyranny but couldn't swing the axe—even on outspokenly disloyal subordinates.

Harry McPherson has caught the essential Johnson, warts and all, but in a spirit of critical affection which alone sets this book apart from the polemical literature that has passed for commentary on LBJ.

Agencies Mount Major Attack On FTC Deceptive Ad Policy

By Sidney Margolius

THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION, which in recent years has become the most vigorous government agency in defending consumers, now is approaching a critical stage in its consumer-aid role as the result of growing attacks by the advertising industry.

FTC's developing problems have been multiplied by public unawareness of the attacks on the commission; by a recent court decision restraining some of the commission's activities, and by the impending departure of some of its key personnel. These officials arrived at the FTC only a couple of years ago but now seem to think they have done what they can.

The advertising industry itself, led by the American Association of Advertising Agencies, has begun what appears to be an all-out attack on the FTC. What really worries the ad men is FTC's recently initiated policies of requiring advertisers to run commercials correcting ads found to be deceptive, and to provide substantiation of advertising claims at the FTC's request.

Thus, last year the FTC got the ITT-Continental Baking Co. to run corrective ads explaining that Profile bread does not really have fewer calories per ounce than other breads. It merely has seven fewer calories per slice because it is sliced thinner.

More recently the canner of Ocean Spray Cranberry Juice Cocktail has agreed to run ads for a year to clarify claims that it has more "food energy" than orange or tomato juice. The company will explain that it didn't mean more vitamins, merely more calories.

The ad agencies also are worried about the FTC's new substantiation policy. For example, the commission has complained that ITT-Continental's claims that Wonder Bread "builds bodies 12 ways" doesn't mean it has any special nutritive values. What bothers the ad men on this issue is that they may no longer claim unique properties for products that are much the same as all others. Almost any other bread of the same type as Wonder Bread has the same "body-building" nutrients.

The advertising industry is trying to use the fact that the FTC had to withdraw one recent complaint to damn the commission's recently intensified war on deception. The FTC had charged that DuPont's "can stabbing" demonstration for its Zerex anti-leak anti-freeze did not really prove Zerex will stop leaks in car-cooling systems under normal operating conditions. The FTC also charged that the commercials failed to reveal that Zerex may damage a cooling system.

The FTC later withdrew the charge that Zerex would stop leaks but let stand the complaints of possible damage and of inadequate pretesting. (The product subsequently was reformulated in an effort to eliminate such potential damage.) This solitary instance of reversal has become a main weapon of the ad men's counterattack.

THE SPECIAL IMPORTANCE of continued vigorous activity by FTC is controlling deceptive TV advertising that has caused a great deal of economic harm to the public. Television has been the vehicle for a long list of deceptive products from the earlier storm window promotions to the many current misleading commercials for patent medicines and toiletries.

Not the least of the victims of this deception, which often is accomplished by the omission of material facts, are children. They have been subjected to manipulation by commercials for high-priced toys and breakfast cereals. Another group that has been a special target of manipulative TV advertising is teenagers. They have been victimized by the many cosmetics and toiletries ads which play on their feelings of insecurity.

FTC's efforts also have been hurt recently by lack of consumer awareness. One of the most revealing is the reversal FTC recently made in its proposal to prohibit "negative option" sales plans often used by book and record clubs. Unless you take the initiative to notify the club that you don't want the book or record, it is sent to you automatically. When the FTC proposed to eliminate this selling method, which exploits the fact that buyers may be busy or forgetful, the sellers argued that the fact they have so many subscribers showed that they don't mind the "negative option."

Since there was virtually no support from consumers for outlawing the negative option, the FTC now has changed its proposal to require that merchants who sell this way clearly disclose to consumers the terms, and give them at least ten days to return the rejection cards.

FTC also has been handicapped by a recent court ruling that it did not have the authority to require gasoline companies to display octane ratings on pumps. The gasoline companies had gone to court to challenge the proposed regulation. FTC has said it will appeal the decision and will go ahead with other pending industry regulations to require sellers to provide more information on other products.

The pending resignations of members of the FTC Bureau of Consumer Protection also may weaken FTC's efforts at least temporarily. The bureau has pushed the policy of requiring that companies run corrective ads for claims found to be misleading.

In Low-Income Housing Deals:

Real Estate Speculators Cash In On Massive Federal Subsidies

WHILE SPECULATORS reap big profits from federal programs to help low-income Americans buy and rent decent homes, continuation of the badly needed subsidies is in doubt, and taxpayers are stuck with a huge loss, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison charged.

Major blame for the "massive scandals" and abuses of the federal subsidy housing programs falls on the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, which "has simply not enforced its own programs," Denison declared in a network radio interview.

"The fast-buck boys have moved in and taken over these subsidy programs for their own benefit," Denison asserted, and much of the intended benefit for low-income families is lost. He said the federal government now holds some 36,000 housing units—most of them in inner-city areas—that had been given no more than "cosmetic treatment" by speculators and sold at inflated prices to low-income families.

"The speculator skims his profits off the top and disappears . . . the federal government is stuck with the mortgage for 40 years, and the family is without a home," he stressed.

Denison warned that discontinuing the subsidy programs would "be penalizing the very persons for whom the programs were intended," and that a much better approach would be "far more aggressive pursuit of the wrongdoers."

He said that HUD Sec. George W. Romney goes around the country telling business groups that "the greatness of tomorrow is up to the business groups," but he fails to point out that "it's the business group itself that is causing the programs for which he is responsible to be so racked by scandals and to be threatened now in the legislative process."

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program Labor News Conference, Denison refuted the Administration's claim that labor is the major factor in rising housing prices. He pointed out that in the last decade, the cost of labor in the total price of a dwelling has been cut nearly in half, while both the price of land and the costs of financing have doubled.

Denison was questioned by William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Michael Posner, of Reuters news agency.

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE DEBATE OVER international trade policy is heating up. A good section of the news media insists on dealing with such worn out cliches as "free trade" and "protectionism" that have no relevance to the world in which we live.

Most startling, perhaps, is the determination to ignore this nation's trade deficits which have reached frightening proportions. Last year, for the first time in 79 years, the U.S. suffered its first trade deficit—$2 billion. In the first quarter of 1972 alone, the deficit reached $1.5 billion.

The impact of the trade picture on U.S. jobs cannot be accurately ascertained. In fact, it has been largely ignored by the Department of Commerce's Bureau of International Commerce and other government agencies.

When George Shultz, recently nominated to be Secretary of the Treasury, was Secretary of Labor he made some estimates on the job displacements. The AFL-CIO updated these estimates and concluded that for the five-year period, 1966 to 1971, 900,000 job opportunities were lost in the trade field.

However, this does not cover the recent period of increasing trade deficits so that the full impact can be only surmised.

For the most part, organized labor has been pretty well united in its efforts to combat the erosion of U.S. jobs. The AFL-CIO is supporting the Burke-Hartke Bill. The United Auto Workers' resolutions in the trade field take the same general approach.

Since World War II—and especially in the last 10 years—there have been new and significant developments in international trade:

● Multinational corporations, most of them American-owned, have become powerful world economic factors. They are the outgrowth of U.S. technology and capital investment being exported by the American corporations at the cost of tens of thousands of U.S. jobs.

These one-time U.S. corporations do not even look upon themselves anymore as American. This was explained some months ago by Robert Stevens, executive vice-president of the Ford Motor Co. for foreign operations. He said:

"It is our goal to be in every single country there is, Iron Curtain countries, Russia, China. We at Ford Motor Co. look at a world map without any boundaries.

"We don't consider ourselves basically an American company. We are a multinational company. And when we approach a government that doesn't like the U.S. we always say, 'Who do you like? Britain? Germany? We carry a lot of flags. We export from every country.' "

● The U.S. market is still largely open for trade while others are now managing their economies so that they provide not only direct and indirect subsidies for exports but direct and indirect barriers to imports.

● The composition of U.S. exports has shifted from largely finished, manufactured products providing tens of thousands of jobs —to raw materials.

This country cannot permit the steady export of jobs and technology and growing trade deficits. Steps must be taken to equalize trade relationships between the United States and other nations. There are many ways that this can be accomplished.

One, of course, is to remove the tax advantages which, in fact, spur global runaway firms. Our tax and tariff laws actually provide incentives for U.S. corporations to manufacture abroad.

Secondly, the entire operation of multinational corporations should be brought under tighter control. Transfer of licenses and patents to foreign producers should be far more severely limited as one important move.

Other steps must be taken, too, but no real solution is in sight if the problems are dealt with along the outdated concepts of free trade versus protectionism.

BIG PROFITS for the fast-buck boys are flowing from abuses of federal subsidy housing programs, but little help for low-income Americans who need decent homes, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Ray Denison, center, charged on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were William Eaton, left, of the Chicago Daily News and Michael Posner of Reuters news service. The AFL-CIO produced interview is broadcast Tuesdays on Mutual radio.

Machinists Airlift Food to Seattle

Seventy tons of food were donated, collected and shipped to Seattle's hard-pressed unemployed through a joint labor-management "We Care" project sponsored by Machinists District 141 and United Air Lines.

In Seattle, where one of every four breadwinners was unemployed this Spring, a program called "Neighbors in Need" channelled the foodstuffs to the jobless workers.

The unemployment rate in the Seattle area has been around the 13 percent level for more than a year because of sharp cutbacks in the aerospace industry. The Boeing Co., a major employer in Seattle was particularly hard hit, laying off as many as 80,000 workers.

These photos show how the "We Care" project operated in San Francisco's United Air Lines base. The scene was repeated across the nation at United installations by many of the 24,000 members of IAM District 141.

Food items are packaged and loaded; glass containers are specially packed.

After sorting and packing, foodstuffs are loaded into a handling cart and pushed to a freight container.

Rail Unions Urge Funding Of Safety Law

The first national railroad safety law—unanimously passed by Congress in 1970—is in danger of being emasculated by Pres. Nixon's failure to seek sufficient funds to enforce it, rail unions warned.

In testimony submitted to House and Senate Appropriations subcommittees, the Congress of Railway Unions urged lawmakers to increase the "pitifully inadequate" money called for by the Administration to enforce and administer the statute.

Specifically, CRU proposed inceasing the current number of 154 safety inspectors and supervisors in the Federal Railroad Administration—"essentially the same number as existed prior to the law's passage"—to 350. Nixon's fiscal 1973 budget seeks funds to increase the number by 51 inspectors and supervisors.

Jim Snyder, national legislative director for the United Transportation Union who testified for CRU, also urged an initial appropriation of $3.5 million to implement a section of the law authorizing federal funds on a 50-50 matching basis to help states in their role of enforcing safety.

He produced a copy of a letter sent to Nixon back in February 1971 by the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners asking for an initial appropriation of that amount to aid 34 states which had requested certification for funds.

Despite this call from the states for the money, Snyder pointed out, the President has not asked "for a single dollar" to help them, and his 1973 budget for FRA again omits any request for funds for that purpose.

Citing the "shocking statistics" of 8,095 train accidents in 1970 in which 2,225 persons were killed and 14,505 were injured, Snyder said, "we felt that many of the horrible safety problems on railroads would soon be solved by passage of the law, but apparently our hope has been in vain."

"We are faced with the dilemma of Congress having unanimously enacted a strong safety law, but the Administration's failure to seek sufficient funds to make the law effective," he concluded.

Labor Board Caseload Rises To New High

A record 11,675 cases were filed with the National Labor Relations Board during the first three months of the year, the highest number for any quarter. It was the first time the quarterly caseload passed the 10,000 mark.

All types of cases, including unfair labor practices and election petitions, were reflected in the upsurge, the NLRB said.

The caseload for the January-March period represented a 22 percent increase over the first quarter of 1971.

The NLRB said it received 7,487 charges of unfair labor practices and 4,188 election petitions.

Some 5,195 of the unfair labor practice charges were filed against employers while 2,292 were filed against unions.

And of 1,939 representation elections held during the period, unions won majority designation in 1,094, or 56 perecnt, up considerably from the last quarter of 1971 when unions won designation in 53 percent.

The end of the quarter saw 13,792 cases of all types pending.

Potofsky, Rosenblum to Step Down:

Clothing Union Convention Focuses on Political Action

Miami Beach—The overriding urgency of labor political action dominated the 28th convention of the Clothing Workers here.

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, in his keynote address, charged that the Nixon Administration's record "on the war, on inflation and unemployment is bad." He added that the "single most important issue facing the nation in the next five months is the November election."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told the 1,500 delegates that in the election campaign this fall "the American people are going to send a message—declare themselves for progress and against reaction."

The convention, itself, marked the end of an era. Both Potofsky, 77, and Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum, 85, declined to accept renomination for new terms. Both have held their present offices for the past 26 years.

Said Potofsky: "It is now time to allow a new generation to take over the leadership of the union."

Rosenblum said that "the great gains of our glorious past were possible only because of a dedicated membership. Today, the loyalty of our membership is needed more than ever. So, too, the idealism, the strength, the unity of our organization."

Nominations for general officers will be made later in the convention and the referendum election is scheduled for September.

It was the upcoming November election which permeated speech after speech at the convention.

"This year," Potofsky said, "we must take the lead in electing a new President, a man who merits our trust and our faith; a man who will once and for all eliminate credibility gaps; a man who will chart a new path of peace and well-being for all Americans."

He tagged as "just an ocean of empty words" the Nixon promise of four years ago "that he was going to restore economic stability, reduce inflation and unemployment."

Potofsky listed other "failures" of the Nixon Administration in such fields as taxes, low-wage imports, child care, minimum wage, decline of the Supreme Court, health care, and weak job safety enforcement, among others.

Kirkland, in calling for strong labor political action, also leveled blasts at the Nixon Administration on a number of fronts.

"For generations," he said, "labor has struggled for a fairer distribution of the proceeds of our society. That's what collective bargaining is all about. Now this Administration, committed to the forces of privilege, is seeking a redistribution of wealth—but to the rich and from the poor."

He lashed into the New Economic Policy of Nixon, saying that "under the guise of fighting inflation, workers have been made the scapegoat of inflation, the Administration has developed a highly effective operation for fleecing the poor to aid the rich."

The convention heard from the Administration, too. Sec. of Labor James D. Hodgson scored the labor press for reporting that the Nixon Administration has not acted in the interest of the workers.

When he claimed that American workers were finding that wage-price controls were helping them, a visible groan rose from the delegates, most of them women.

Ironically, it was this same claim by Pres. Nixon at the AFL-CIO convention last November which resulted in the same expressions of disbelief by the delegates at that convention.

The clothing industry is being particularly hard hit by low-wage imports and runaway plants moving to other countries. Delegates devoted considerable time to this problem.

"We must stand up and tell the economists and the so-called liberals in Congress," Potofsky said, "that we intend to protect what it took us generations of effort and sacrifice to build. Are we asking too much of our liberal friends?"

He praised the AFL-CIO for setting up a task force to push for the passage of the Burke-Hartke trade bill. This bill, Potofsky said, "provides quotas to protect our conditions against disruptive increases in imports and regulates various areas of international trade, particularly multi-national companies."

The ACWA leader stressed that the fight for Burke-Hartke "is a job for us all" and urged letters to members of Congress, to newspapers, radio and television.

"Your communities must hear from you," he said.

Another issue before the convention was child care. The union has spent thousands of dollars of its own money establishing child care centers. The Baltimore and Chicago Joint Boards have received wide acclaim for their quality comprehensive child care programs.

The convention passed a resolution "deploring" Nixon's veto of comprehensive national child development legislation, saying that the federal government must play a major role in this field. Rep. Patsy Mink (D-Hawaii), sponsor of the child care bill, was applauded as she pledged to continue the fight.

Strong emphasis was placed also on organizing the unorganized. Potofsky reported that more than half of the union's income is spent on organizing. In the past two years, 11,500 new members were organized, mostly in the South and Southwest.

The ACWA is now seeking strong support throughout the nation in its strike against the Farah Manufacturing Co. with plants in San Antonio and El Paso, Tex. Almost 3,000 workers struck the big pants manufacturer after 19 union leaders were fired.

Later in the convention, delegates will vote on establishing an emergency defense fund to meet the challenge of costly disputes.

Other speakers scheduled to appear before the convention include Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Pres. Donald MacDonald of the Canadian Labor Congress, Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), Rep. William R. Anderson (D-Tenn.) and Harold Ostroff, executive vice president, United Housing Foundation.

A GENERATION of leadership of the Clothing Workers welcomes AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland to the union's convention in Miami Beach. Frank Rosenblum, left, the union's secretary-treasurer, and ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, right, announced they will step down this year after 26 years in their present offices.

Smedley Appointed to New Department Post

Lawrence T. Smedley has been named associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, serving under Dept. Director Bert Seidman.

Smedley has been an assistant director of the department since 1962 when he joined the AFL-CIO staff. Holder of a masters degree from the University of Michigan, he previously worked as a union researcher and organizer.

Retired Couples Feeling Pressure of Inflation

High prices continued to afflict those least able to cope with them as the government's lower and intermediate budgets' for retired couples showed a 6.5 percent increase from the spring of 1970 to autumn of last year.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the average budget for a retired couple living in a city ranged from $3,319 a year at the lowest level, to $4,776 at an intermediate level and to $7,443 at a higher level.

The BLS "moderate" budget for a typical urban family of four was up only 3 percent as of last autumn.

The BLS announcement of the retired couples' budgets stressed that they "are not intended to represent a minimum or subsistence level of living," and a spokesman for the bureau indicated that the figures are a rough average of how much income it takes to live at the three levels.

A retired couple is defined by the BLS as a husband, age 65 or over, and his wife.

"They are self-supporting, living independently in their own home, in reasonably good health and able to take care of themselves," according to the BLS profile.

"The family has for each budget level, average inventories of clothing, housefurnishings, major durables and other equipment," the BLS said.

The budgets pertain only to urban couples. There are no budgets available for rural families.

The BLS said that equivalent budget levels varied widely among cities and regions with the lowest in small cities and in the South and the higher levels in the largest metropolitan areas.

Food and shelter were the biggest items in all budgets with food accounting for between 28 and 30 percent of the budgets. Housing represented about 40 percent of expenditures on all three levels.

BLS Budgets at 3 Levels For Retired Urban Couple

Following is a summary based on Bureau of Labor Statistics estimates of budgets at three levels for a retired couple living in a city in the fall of 1971:

	Lower budget	Intermediate budget	Higher budget
Food	$ 942	$1,255	$1,579
Housing	1,160	1,673	2,620
Transportation	225	438	797
Clothing and personal care	267	429	650
Medical care	424	427	429
Other family consumption	158	262	517
Other items	143	287	566
Personal Income Taxes		5	285
TOTAL BUDGET	$3,319	$4,776	$7,443

NLRB Limits Rights Of Replaced Strikers

The National Labor Relations Board—with member John H. Fanning dissenting—ruled that replaced economic strikers are not eligible to vote in an NLRB election conducted more than 12 months after the beginning of a strike.

"We find that only replaced former economic strikers who are actually reinstated by the eligibility date of the election shall be entitled to vote," the board ruled. Chairman Edward B. Miller and members Howard Jenkins Jr. and Ralph E. Kennedy made up the majority in the decision.

The ruling overturned an NLRB regional director's opinion of who was eligible to vote in a decertification election sought by the Wahl Clipper Corp. of Sterling, Ill., against a local of the Machinists.

Fanning would have upheld the regional director's determination that 19 former strikers should be eligible to vote even if they had not yet been reinstated by the company because they have "a reasonable expectancy of reinstatement within the foreseeable future."

Fanning maintained that the replaced strikers should be viewed in the same light as laid-off employes because there is a reasonable prospect that they would be recalled based, in this case, on normal company turnover.

But the other members of the Labor Board disagreed, stating "it seems to us that the parallel with laid-off employes is not entirely apt."

The majority declared that the strikers must wait for an improvement in their employer's business, plus the termination of replacements "which is highly speculative if, indeed, it is to occur at all."

In his dissenting opinion, however, Fanning asks, "how . . . can it be said that the interest in the election result differs between a laid-off employe and a former striker?"

"My colleagues muster a difference by relying on the necessity for the departure of replacements, surely an argument of limited applicability in this age of accelerated automation and diminishing specific skills."

Fanning stated that the board ignored precedent and in doing so was "acting in an irresponsible manner."

The case dates back to an eight-month strike beginning in November 1969 in which all 98 employes of the bargaining unit took part.

Replacements were hired for the strikers, and the replaced strikers were put on a "Replaced Strikers List." Many on the list were reinstated, but 29 had not been by the time the decertification election was ordered. It was their eligibility to vote that was in dispute.

Court Ruling Called Peril to Striker Rights

legal and that the workers involved had not been replaced before the dispute was thus converted into an unfair labor practices strike.

But its apparent reasoning was that the strikers who were fired—even though illegally—were not entitled to the protection accorded to unfair labor practice strikers.

Under the appellate court interpretation, the workers who were not fired but who stayed out on strike protesting the illegal dismissals had an absolute right to be rehired. But the workers who were illegally fired had no such right, the court held.

The NLRB petitioned for and was granted a Supreme Court review of the decision. And the AFL-CIO brief strongly backed up the appeal, citing numerous past precedents in urging the Supreme Court to overturn the lower court action.

The case is expected to be decided by the Supreme Court in its fall term.

Senate Nears Vote:

ITT Ties Highlight Kleindienst Debate

The Senate opened debate on confirmation of Richard G. Kleindienst as Attorney General, with Administration supporters pressing for a quick vote and opponents arguing that nearly two months of hearings had left key questions unanswered.

At Senate Judiciary Committee hearings witnesses had testified to a tangle of political influence exerted by the giant ITT conglomerate, reaching into the inner circles of the White House and ending with an out-of-court settlement of an antitrust suit filed by the Justice Dept. An incriminating memorandum under the name of an ITT lobbyist who was never brought before the committee, linked the settlement to a big contribution to the Republican convention fund.

Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R-Neb.), ranking Republican member of the Judiciary Committee, opened the case for confirmation of Kleindienst with a speech denouncing his accusers.

During the hearings, Hruska said, "the committee was compelled to listen to irrelevant, repetitive and often impertinent testimony."

Opponents argued, to the contrary, that the committee hearings had not dug deeply enough to resolve the doubts that had been raised as to Kleindienst's suitability for the nation's top law enforcement post.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged the Senate to return the nomination to committee for further hearings dealing with the "substantial questions" that have not been answered.

And Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), presenting the opening argument against confirmation, told the Senate that the overall record of Kleindienst — even apart from the ITT case—raises a fundamental question as to whether he should be entrusted with power over "the rights and liberties of all Americans."

In other areas:

• House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills, joined by Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, introduced a bill that would force the rewriting of federal tax laws over the next three and one-half years.

The bill would repeal virtually all exemptions and exclusions from taxable income—a list that includes both loopholes under fire from tax reformers and non-controversial items such as an extra exemption for the blind.

A package of 18 existing exemptions would be repealed as of 1974, another 18 the following year and a final group of 18 in 1976.

Thus, Congress would be forced to rewrite a large portion of the tax code from scratch—a prospect that some observers see as an incentive for tax reform and others fear would open a Pandora's Box that could result in new and greater inequities.

• The Senate voted 40-36 to allow continued U.S. imports of chrome from Rhodesia—despite a United Nations embargo on trade with that country. The Administration was on record as opposing the chrome purchases. But Sen. Gale W. McGee (D-Wyo.), who led the fight against breaking the boycott, charged that the White House had refused to "pick up the telephone" and urge Republican senators to oppose the loophole.

Steel companies had lobbied for the right to import Rhodesian chrome, even though other sources of supply are available. The Steelworkers opposed the Rhodesian import amendment.

Senate Unit Approves No-Fault Insurance

accompanied by an offer of insurance from an assigned risk pool.

Collision damage when no one is injured would also be compensated without determination of fault, but coverage for such losses would be optional and not compulsory. A pool would pay damages inflicted by uninsured motorists.

A bill similar to the one approved by the Senate committee has been introduced in the House, where hearings have been completed but no date set for committee action.

The bill passed the Senate committee by a 13-4 vote and had to overcome the opposition of many insurance companies, trial lawyers and the Nixon Administration. The Administration, while endorsing the concept of no-fault, had recommended that the states be given more time before enactment of no-fault becomes compulsory. Three of the four senators who voted against it were Republicans.

Four states now have various versions of no-fault in effect, but none of them meets the minimum standards set down by the new bill.

And the standards will be even tougher if a state fails to act and has the federal law imposed on it. In that case, the no-fault policy must cover the motorist for all medical-rehabilitation and loss of income coverage up to $1,000 a month, with no ceilings on that amount of loss.

In this respect, the law that would be imposed on the states paralells what was provided in the original bill by Senators Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) and Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.). The Commerce Committee altered the Magnuson-Hart provisions to allow for state enactment and administration of the law, however.

Other provisions of the Senate committee's bill provide for:

• Suspension of the ceiling on benefits when a minor child is a survivor of a fatal accident;

• Consumer protection and information on the actual rates being charged and publication of the company's claims-loss data;

• The states to set up adequate rehabilitation services for accident victims and improved emergency medical systems;

• A motorist to carry his own no-fault policy protection with him as he drives into states with varying laws;

• Protection of the insured motorist from hit-and-run drivers or insolvent insurance companies through a pool into which all companies pay according to the amount of business they do in the state. The protection against uninsured motorists would be financed the same way.

U.S. Plunging Into Record Trade Deficit

deficit for any one month, the all-time high having been set last October at $821 million.

For the first four months of the year, the deficit totals $2.2 billion, almost guaranteeing a larger year-end deficit than last year.

Both imports and exports dropped last month with exports falling more sharply. The Commerce Dept. said a drop in the export of large jet aircraft was partly responsible for the decline.
